York Region report approves new cemetery

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Toronto's Jewish community is getting a major new cemetery to keep up with its growth.

York Region says it will approve the redesignation of 80 hectares (200 acres) of rural lands and farmland in the City of Vaughan for use as a Jewish cemetery.

Plans call for between 70,000 and 90,000 grave plots for the Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park, also known as Pardes Shalom. It will be the largest Jewish cemetery in the Toronto region.

The project is planned for an area about one mile north of the existing Pardes Shalom cemetery. It will be located between Bathurst and Dufferin streets, south of King-Vaughan Road.

The next step is for the City of Vaughan to approve the re-zoning.

A report by York Region's planning committee says the current Pardes Shalom is not big enough to meet the Toronto Jewish community's future needs.

Pardes Shalom, which opened in 1977, contains an estimated 36,000 plots. Of those, more than half have already been used or allocated, the report says.

It adds that Pardes Shalom has experienced an average annual increase in burials of over 16 percent.

Given that, and the future growth and location of the Jewish population, "the need for another cemetery in this general location appears justified," the report notes.

The report relies on a study by Pardes Shalom, which used statistics culled from the 1991 federal census, and on demographic projections by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The studies show that 90 percent of the Jewish community in the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) is concentrated "within a relatively narrow corridor" extending through Toronto, North York and into Vaughan, Richmond Hill and Markham.

It is projected that this corridor will continue northwards, primarily along Bathurst Street, "as the Jewish community continues to grow at a rapid rate."

Within the GTA, 15.3 percent of the Jewish population is aged 65 and older, which is five percent higher than in the general population, the York Region study cites.

From 1981 to 1991, the number of seniors in the Jewish community grew from 18,000 to 25,000, a 35 percent increase.

William Draimin, president of Pardes Shalom, says the existing cemetery's plots will be spoken for by the year 2020.

Draimin says Pardes Shalom currently conducts some 500 burials a year.

"We have to look forward," he said, especially given that Pardes Shalom is the only cemetery in Toronto, to his knowledge, that provides plots to unaffiliated Jews.

It's estimated that half of Toronto Jewry is unaffiliated.

Pardes Shalom's ownership is split between the Jewish Federation and the 52 synagogues, societies and organizations that have sections there.

Pardes Shalom first optioned the privately-owned property nearly three years ago.

About a third of the property will not be used for cemetery purposes. A wooded area and some wetlands designated an Area of Natural and Scientific Interest will be set aside for environmental reasons.

Continent-wide celebration of Shabbat set for March 20-21

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nearly 65,000 Jews across North America are expected to experience a real Shabbat, by taking part in the second Shabbat Across America program, on Mar. 20 and 21.

Organized by the National Jewish Outreach Program (NJOP), Shabbat Across America has the support of all four denominations.

Over 650 synagogues are expected to take part, in major cities like Toronto, Montreal, New York and Los Angeles, and smaller places like Anchorage, Alaska.

Each program will include services, singing, Shabbat meals, learning and good fellowship.

Rabbi Ephraim Buchwald, founder and director of NJOP, described Shabbat Across America as "an exciting way of reintroducing friends and family members to a practice that has been with, and unified, our people for over 5,000 years, and which we hope will be with us for at least 5,000 more."

The idea, according to a media release, is that the experience "will infuse thousands of non-practicing Jews with a greater appreciation for their tradition and commitment to Judaism."

Support has come from the Reform movement's Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the United Synagogues of Conservative Judaism, the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation and Rabbi Haskel Lookstein, spiritual leader of the influential Orthodox synagogue Congregation Kehillath Jeshurun in New York.

A resolution signed by representatives of the three organizations and Rabbi Lookstein notes, among other considerations, that Shabbat is crucial to the survival of the Jewish people; that it "marks a separation from the rest of the week;" that it is a time to bond with family and to strengthen Jewish family values, and that it is a time to express our love of G-d, family, friends, fellow human beings, the world and life.

Melanie Notkin, marketing director of National Jewish Outreach Program, told The CJN that last year, 400 synagogues, 17 in Canada, representing some 40,000 people, took part.

This year, she expects 60 percent greater participation. "That means close to 65,000 people, people who would normally not celebrate Shabbat," she said.

Congregations in Canada taking part are Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Temple Kol Ami, Temple Har Zion, Beth Tzedec, Anshei Minsk, Kehillat Shaarei Torah, Downtown Reform Minyan, Livnot U'Lehibanot, Solel, Or Hadash and Shaarei-Beth El in the Greater Toronto area; Beth Jacob in Kitchener; University of Western Ontario in London; Temple Shalom in Waterloo; Young Israel of Chomedey, McGill University Hillel and Temple Emanu-El-Beth Shalom in Montreal; and Shaaray Tefilah in Vancouver.

Vigils draw attention to plight of agunot

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Cora Cohen's father secured her freedom for $25,000 after she spent 13 years in marital limbo.

The Montreal woman is one of three former agunot (women denied a Jewish divorce) featured in Untying the Bonds...Jewish Divorce, a 40-minute documentary that had its Ontario premiere last week at the fifth annual community vigil for agunot.

The educational evening, held at the Borochov Centre on the eve of the Fast of Esther, attracted close to 200 people, including about a dozen men. It was the largest turnout in the vigil's history.

Similar vigils were scheduled to be held in Calgary, Winnipeg, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem within the week.

The new film is aimed particularly at lawyers, social workers and women's shelter volunteers who help Jewish women, said Evelyn Brook, the Montreal-based president of the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, who moderated the evening. "We need all of them to know about Jewish divorce law and how important it is for most Jews to have a get."

A Jewish woman who remarries without receiving a Jewish divorce is considered an adulteress, noted Montreal scholar Norma Joseph in the film. Children of the subsequent marriage are considered mamzerim and are permitted to marry only a restricted category of other Jews.

In the Middle Ages, said Joseph, communities would encourage recalcitrant husbands to grant their wives a get, to the point of refusing them burial rights and the permits that would allow them to work in the non-Jewish community. (Under Jewish law, a husband must initiate the get.)

Sanctions are less effective today, said Rabbi Reuven Poupko in the film, because there is no central synagogue structure. "Even if I [impose sanctions on] somebody, they'll go to another synagogue."

Former agunah Lyla Miller said in Untying the Bonds that she has spoken to her daughters about a prenuptial agreement so they don't find themselves in her situation.

"We can't allow Judaism to continue in the modern world with this blemish on it," said Joseph.

Rabbi Edward Goldfarb, spiritual leader of Shaarei Beth El in Oakville and mesader gittin of the Beit Din of the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto, attended the vigil as an audience member. During a question and answer session following the screening, he took issue with some of the efforts made thus far on behalf of agunot.

"I think putting pressure on individuals is a band-aid solution at best. The core problem is the Orthodox rabbinate," he said.

"I would further submit that the get law [Canada's Divorce Act, amended in 1990 to ensure that divorcing spouses remove all barriers to religious remarriage before the civil divorce] was and is the wrong legislation at the wrong time. It has alleviated the plight of many women, but it is taking the Orthodox rabbinate off the hook.

"To suggest that the Chief Rabbinate is incapable of issuing a takanah [decree] that would make it possible for a woman to initiate a get action, to me, begs credulity in today's world. The pressure should be properly directed to the Orthodox rabbinate."

The coalition has in fact been working at "maintaining a dialogue" with Orthodox rabbis and there has been progress, said Brook.

Rabbi Emanuel Rackman, former chancellor of Bar-Ilan University, is part of a controversial beit din set up last year in New York. "They have helped a few agunot by annulling marriages," Brook told The CJN.

Among the representatives of Jewish women's organizations to light candles in solidarity with agunot were, from left, Noreen Shelson of Jewish Women International; Roz Fine, National Council of Jewish Women; Paula Schipper, Na'amat; and Corinne Hammerschlag, Womens League for Conservative Judaism. [Frances Kraft photo]

She emphasized during the program that rabbis are reluctant to issue annulments and do so only under very specific conditions, which must be substantiated.

"The pressure is on the Orthodox rabbinate, and in some cases they are responding," she said.

"If a band-aid solution saves lives today, that is what we need to do until we have a cure, and the cure will come as long as we keep raising our voices."

Copies of the film are available from groups affiliated with the coalition: Emunah Women, Hadassah-WIZO, Jewish Women's Federation, Jewish Women International, Na'amat Canada, National Council of Jewish Women and Women's League for Conservative Judaism, Canadian Seaway branch.

Lamentable pattern

A heavy blanket of new tension fell on the bus stations, marketplaces, checkpoints and hitchhiking posts in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza last week. On March 10, three Palestinians were shot and killed by two Israeli soldiers at the Tarqumiya roadblock near Hebron. According to press reports, the soldiers opened fire because they believed a terrorist act was unfolding. The car carrying the three workers almost ran down the soldiers' commanding officer and seemed to be headed directly toward the soldiers' position at the fence. Immediately after the shooting, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Yasser Arafat to convey his condolences.

Even though the unfortunate deaths appear to have been the result of human mistake, Palestinians poured out onto the streets in violent protest, incited, most observers believe, by fundamentalist Islamic leaders. For five days they burned tires and hurled bricks, rocks and petrol bombs at patrolling Israeli soldiers.

On the morning of March 13, a bomb exploded beside a vendor's stall near the Damascus Gate just south of the Old City. Fortunately, no one was killed. Four Palestinians were slightly injured. Police believe that the bomb exploded prematurely and that it was intended for a destination for a target inside the Jewish area of the city. Later that day, Sheik Hamed Bittawi of Nablus called the Tarqumiya incident a massacre carried out by Zionist occupiers and that there could never be any coexistence between Palestinians and Israelis.

As if on cue, the next day, Saturday, a parcel bomb exploded in a park in Afula near the town's central bus station. Eliyahu Baliti, 53, lost both hands and suffered facial injuries when he tried to remove the suspicious object to a place of safety.The pattern is lamentably familiar. Tragedy begets violence; and violence begets more tragedy. But if peace is ever to take root in this battle-scarred landscape of suspicion and fear, newer, more humane responses to tragedy and loss must be cultivated by Palestinian leaders than the constant call to deadly violence. To advocate better, more civilized leadership from the Palestinians is not to condone illegal, or reckless behavior on the part of Israelis. But the leaders of Israel do not foment or incite violence.

The same cannot be said for the leaders of the Palestinians.

A core of decency

There is a deep core of decency among Canadians that governments can neither suppress or ignore. Two recent incidents made that very evident.

In Alberta last week, the Conservative government of Ralph Klein attempted to put forward legislation that was intended to limit the amount of compensation to the victims of Alberta's infamous eugenics sterilization program of the mid 1930s. The public outcry was swift and severe. The government's grotesquely heavy-handed approach to saving money at the expense of the mistreated, hapless individuals whose very lives and dignity were so brutishly abused by the state was mercilessly condemned. The proposed legislation was withdrawn.

In Ontario, a week earlier, the Conservative government of Mike Harris had attempted to limit the amount of compensation to the three surviving Dionne quintuplets, now impoverished and frail, for the exploitative, commercialized treatment they suffered at the hands of the Ontario government in the 1930s and 1940s. Harris had originally offered the three sisters a "take-it-or-leave-it" offer of $2,000 each per month. Here too, the public outcry was swift and severe. Here too, the government's grotesquely heavy-handed approach to saving money at the expense of mistreated, hapless individuals was also mercilessly condemned. The government altered its offer to $4 million in compensation and apologized to the sisters for its past and present misbehavior.

We take heart that the politicians were made to understand that decency and morality still have a place in public life other than as footnotes to a budgetary entry on that famous bottom line of the ledger sheet.

Study role of all professions in Holocaust

Re: Article on my work on the history of medicine in the Third Reich (CJN, Jan. 22).

There are two points which I wish to clarify. The first concerns Pernkopf Anatomy and the investigations of the University of Vienna. A critical role was played in this endeavor by the Israel Holocaust and Martyrs' Authority Yad Vashem. Indeed, it is doubtful that the University of Vienna would have undertaken the probe into the Pernkopf atlas if it had not been for Yad Vashem's leadership and initiative.

The second point concerns the proposed Centre for Holocaust and Genocide Studies at the University of Toronto. It is our hope that this centre would deal not only with the role of medicine, but with that of other professions such as law, anthropology and architecture. While medicine has played a critical role, we cannot ignore the complementary roles played by the other professions. For example, it was lawyers who wrote the sterilization law and the Nuremberg racial laws, and it was the judiciary and the police that ensured their implementation.

Messianic lessons in rebirth of Israel

I read with much interest your supplement, "Israel Jubilee." One editorial particularly attracted my attention: "Messianic significance seen in rebirth of Israel." (CJN, Feb. 12)

I believe too that 50 years ago we entered the messianic era. The following facts attest to it: the historic vote on Palestine partition on Nov. 29, 1947; the incredible victory of our independence: one million against one hundred million; the unexpected collapse of Communist Russia for the liberation of our three million brothers; the enormous chance to be supported by the most powerful nation of our present time.

Don't you think those miracles are from a Divine source?

Our prophet Isaiah, in chapter 40, said: "Speak tenderly to Jerusalem and cry to her that her warfare is ended, that her iniquity is pardoned, that she has received from the Lord's hand double for all her sins."

That can be applied perfectly well to our times: 20 centuries of suffering ending with the horrible Holocaust. Yes, we have been pardoned because, as said the prophet, we already have paid dearly for our sins.

A Jewish registry benefits continuity

A letter in The CJN (Feb. 19) decries the existence of a registry of "authentic" Jews, said to be in development in Israel. I share the reader's discomfort with this registry, but at the same time, I recognize that for those who want their children to marry Jewish, such a document may one day become necessary.

A generation ago, the lines were much clearer regarding Jewish status, but now, with the introduction of patrilineal descent, non-halachic conversions and widespread intermarriage, the question of who is actually a Jew has become increasingly confusing.

This is not about religious coercion and it has nothing to do with the rights of any Jewish group. It is simply about preserving the Jewish nation so that our children and grandchildren will be able to marry Jewish.

Clarifies closing date for Branson

I want to clarify some facts in the story, "Branson closure to be delayed" (CJN, Feb. 12). In its final report last summer, the Health Services Restructuring Commission directed North York General Hospital to take over management, operation and governance of North York Branson Hospital, and to close it as an inpatient facility by June 1999. The inpatient programs and services will move to North York General, Humber River Regional and York Central hospitals. The Branson site will be redeveloped into an ambulatory centre with daytime services.

During the transition period, our top priority will be to keep the Branson site open until the hospitals that will receive its services have time to properly plan for an increase in the number of patients. In some cases, building expansions will need to be completed. Should the construction period go beyond June 1999, we will discuss an extension with the Restructuring Commission.

We expect the Branson site will be open for approximately two to three years from now, not from the 1999 date, as the article stated. We will not be able to announce a definite closing date for some time to come, as there is still substantial planning to be completed. I can assure you, however, that North York General Hospital is committed to keeping the community fully informed as decisions are made.

A fifty year search for security

By BARUCH GUR

Israel's security has always been one of the central, most sensitive issues for the Jewish state. It is impossible to discuss Israel's internal or external relations without an understanding of Israel's overarching quest for security.

The State of Israel won its independence after a bloody war with the Arabs of Palestine and neighboring countries. The war lasted approximately 1½ years and the small Jewish population of approximately 600,000, suffered more than 6,000 fatalities.

During the course of the war, many settlements fell, including Gush Etzion and the Old City's Jewish Quarter in Jerusalem. The outcome during the initial phase of the war was far from clear, but the trauma of the War of Liberation left an indelible mark on Israel's entire veteran Jewish population.

David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister who also served then as minister of defence, set down Israel's first security guidelines. The new set of circumstances in which Israel found itself after the War of Liberation gave the concept of security new meaning. Prior to the war, security had meant organizing countermeasures against local Arab action. After the war, the danger had increased to include possible attack from neighboring Arab countries whose armies might try to destroy the fledgling state.

It was now Zionism's supreme task to have Israel prepare technologically and financially to combat this newer, more comprehensive threat to its existence.

But the new state's borders were not yet secure; Israel undertook a policy of retaliatory actions against the many repeated Arab attempts to undermine its sovereignty and security by means of infiltration, skirmish and terror.

Retaliatory action by Israel was based on the principle that repeated acts of murder were to be met with a military response. Army units would cross the border and hit military, and at times even civilian, targets in the country from which the terrorists had struck. The purpose of the policy was to demonstrate that, although Israel could not protect each and every citizen in its border areas, the Arab country from which the terrorists had been launched would not escape the consequences.

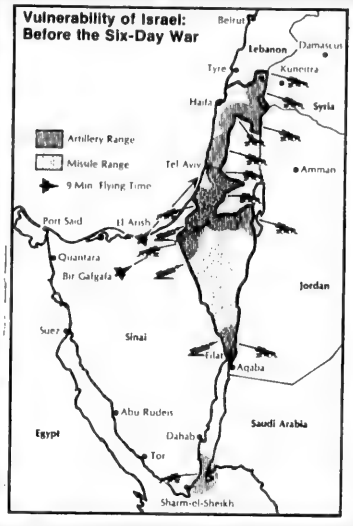
Policies to ensure Israel's security were based on the principle that Israel's army was a defensive force, as its name, the Israel Defence Forces, implies. The IDF was created to act as a deterrent and to "hold the fort" for a short period in case of attack, until the reserves could be mobilized to carry the war into the enemy's territory.

The 1956 Sinai campaign was a turning point in the development of security concepts. The government of Israel decided that a preventive war was preferable to waiting for the enemy to attack. Moreover, there was a desire to take advantage of the international situation, favoring a political and military pact with Great Britain and France to attack Egypt.

The IDF acted effectively and powerfully. However, it became clear that Israel's army was not sufficiently modern and that its manoeuverability was limited. The armored corps proved to be the central combat force on land; all the other branches of Israel's military demonstrated a singular lack of effective mobility.

The Sinai Campaign ended in an Israeli victory. However, from a political and diplomatic standpoint, it became clear that the Franco-British pact, without U.S. participation, was unreliable. Indeed, American intervention brought about a general withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula.

From 1955-56 onwards, the Middle East became a hotbed of international conflict. The tension between the major powers was also felt in the region.



The Six Day War broke out in June 1967 and resulted in a swift, tremendous Israeli victory. The Israeli Air Force demonstrated its total superiority in the skies and the IDF proved itself to be unrivaled in the entire Middle East. During the war, the IDF wrested Jerusalem, Judea and Samaria from Jordan, the entire Sinai from Egypt and the Golan Heights from Syria.

The political situation leading up to the Six Day War had underscored Israel's sense of lack of security and there was a pervasive fear that the state's days might be numbered. The resulting victory, however, led to euphoria based on a feeling, finally, of security for Israel.

However, the euphoria was not to last. After the overwhelming defeat suffered by the Arab armies during the Six Day War, Israel and Israeli interests abroad became the target for terrorist acts, such as attacks against airline offices, aircraft and even Olympic athletes.

In March 1969, the War of Attrition began. It reached a climax in the intensive operations of the Israeli and Egyptian armed forces beyond both banks of the Suez Canal.

On Aug. 7, 1970, the war ended. The Egyptian army suffered a serious trouncing, but the War of Attrition was also hard on Israel. The morale of its civilian population was adversely affected. Indeed, there was no possibility of a decisive military victory, for this was a static war, whose principle components consisted of artillery fire fights, ambushes, commando incursions and aerial bombings.

As a result of the Israeli Air Force's deep-penetration strikes in January 1970, the Soviets became more heavily involved in the war, mainly by setting up a sophisticated network of anti-aircraft batteries near the Suez Canal. By the end of the War of Attrition, the Soviet Union had some 15,000 military personnel stationed in Egypt.

For its part, Israel established the Bar-Lev line along the canal, consisting of a massive array of bunkered fortifications.

Golda Meir's government took a hard line with Israel's Arab neighbors, relying on the IDF's increasing military might and the sense of secure borders and strategic depth.

After the Six Day War, Yigal Allon drew up a peace plan calling for a political and defence-oriented solution to the Israel-Arab conflict by means of territorial compromise. As a practical step, Israel began to implement the operational part of the plan, known as the Allon Plan, by urging and approving the establishment of settlement posts within a strip along the Jordan Valley that would have to remain in Israeli hands.

The main principle underlying the Allon Plan was to delineate secure borders for Israel within which there would be a minimum of non-Jewish residents. Israel's eastern frontier would be the Jordan River and a line running down the middle of the Dead Sea in its entirety. The mandatory border running the length of the Arava would remain as it was before the Six Day War – a 15-kilometre strip including the mountain ranges west of the Jordan Valley. Allon's plan became the cornerstone for any political negotiations with the Palestinians, the Arab countries and the United States.

The Yom Kippur War took Israel by complete surprise and left Israel's citizenry stunned and dismayed. It was initiated by Egypt and Syria on Oct. 6, 1973, and lasted some three weeks. Nearly 3,000 Israeli soldiers were killed, approximately 8,000 were wounded and 300 were captured. Practically every Arab state took part in the war, including Algeria, Morocco, Iraq, Libya and Kuwait.

The war, which broke out as a result of a prolonged political impasse, caught Israel in an atmosphere of complacency, without appropriate military preparedness.

The IDF struck back at the Arab armies, but due to its undermined international political position, Israel was forced to relinquish its military gains, even to the point of withdrawing from areas it had conquered during the Six Day War.

Syrian forces overran the Golan Heights and the settlements proved to be a security nuisance rather than defensive positions. Everyone was taken totally by surprise, and the IDF had to organize itself in the Galilee in order to gain the initiative. The Syrian incursion caused great consternation, mainly because of the area's proximity to Israel's population centres. The strategic importance of the Golan Heights to Israel's security was demonstrated unequivocally.

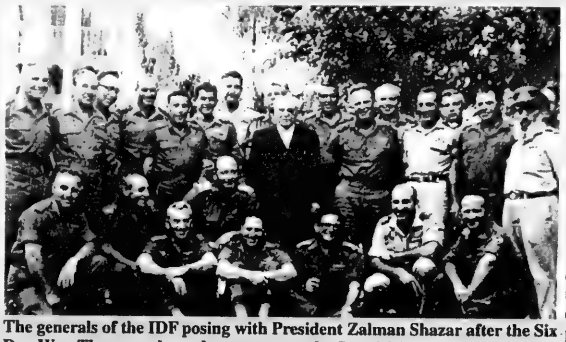
The question of secure borders has always been the key issue in any debate related to a general peace arrangement between Israel and the Arab states.

Israel has always demanded that a peace agreement give it borders recognized by its neighbors that are as strong a bulwark as possible from sudden attack and aggression. Israel's demand has been enshrined in UN Security Council Resolution 242, which states, inter alia, that the countries of the region have the right "to live in peace within secure and recognized borders."

Until the Six Day War, Israel's boundaries were not considered secure; thus, the pre-emptive-strike strategy was developed – conducting a pre-emptive war and carrying it into enemy territory as quickly as possible.

After the Six Day War, Israel's frontiers were considered more secure. The territories under Israel's control since June 1967 have added an important dimension to the time needed to mobilize its army reserves.

With the appearance of modern weaponry, however, such as long-range ground-to-ground missiles, the concept of secured borders has been completely altered. There is now a debate among military personnel as to whether the availability of missiles requires a country to remove its army from population and economic centres. This issue gained much attention in 1982, when IDF forces invaded Lebanon and then withdrew after capturing a great deal of Lebanese territory.



The generals of the IDF posing with President Zalman Shazar after the Six Day War. The map above demonstrates why Israel felt insecure before the Six Day War. Photo and map from A History of the Israeli Army Ze'ev Schiff, MacMillan, 1985.

The peace agreements with Egypt and Jordan, as well as the establishment of the Palestinian Authority, have created new conditions for Israel's security. The Oslo accords established a new atmosphere thought to be conducive to solving security problems. However, the process has not been in effect for a long enough period of time. The assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, followed by the rise to power of the Likud, have slowed down the process, once again raising basic questions regarding Israel's security.

Israeli citizens are almost equally divided between those who believe that the Oslo process will lead to peace and security and those who feel otherwise.

Division over the security issue continues to be one of the most sharply debated questions within Israeli society.

Reminiscing about Israel

For the past two weeks, I've been travelling through Israel. Virtually, that is. In reality, I have not left Halifax.

Instead, I've been flipping through my many photographs of my trips to Israel. You see, for one of my courses, I have to design a Web site. Mine is about Israel and my favorite places there.

By Viva Press in Halifax

I have a section on Israel's National Parks Authority Sites, because I have always enjoyed the sites I've visited, they are interesting and informative, and I don't think enough people know about them.

The last time I visited Tel Megiddo was in 1994. At that time, I was volunteering with my friend Nomi on Kibbutz Afiq in the Golan Heights and we went to quite a few sites during our four months in Israel.

Megiddo, which lies at the head of a mountain pass at the western end of the valley of Jezreel, was an important strategic site throughout history and the scene of many biblical battles. Interestingly, Megiddo is often mentioned in second-millennium documents and in the Bible. In the Christian Bible's Book of Revelations, it's marked as the site of the last great battle of the world: Armageddon (a corruption of the Hebrew words Har Megiddo).

I can still picture us walking up the hill to where the ruined structures of the fortified "chariot city" built by king Solomon in the 10th century BCE are still partly intact. We also checked out remains of a building from the period of King David, ancient stables for almost 500 horses and remains of the Temple of Astarte (1900 BCE).

But the most impressive and memorable site at Megiddo is the ancient water system dating from the ninth century BCE. The visitor can walk down the almost never-ending staircase into the shaft, which is sunk through the rock to a depth of 120 feet. There, a tunnel that runs for a distance of 215 feet to a spring, takes you out to the front gate. This water system ensured the water supply for the defenders in time of siege.

Bon voyage

The National Parks Authority has preserved the site and made it accessible to tourists.

Meanwhile, Hammat Tiberias, located on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, has always been known for its healing hot springs – there are 17 of them in Hammat. Spas were being built here in the 18th and 19th centuries.

While all of Israel is an archeological paradise, the ruins of the Hammat synagogues are unique, because the six ancient buildings are constructed one on top of the other.

The mosaic floor that was part of three separate synagogues is the main attraction. The mosaic contains three inscriptions in Greek and one in Aramaic, and some partly damaged Hebrew words. The upper part of the mosaic depicts the Holy Ark with a seven-branched candelabra and other ritual objects on either side. There is also a picture of the sun god Helios riding a chariot, which shows the influence of Hellenism on the designer.

The museum there explains more about the site and the healing powers of the springs.

In total, there are about 40 sites groomed by the National Parks Authority. I've been to 19 of them. Some of my other favorites were Beit She'an, Belvoir and Tel Arad.

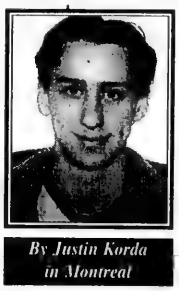
If you've visited Israel before, but have never been to one of the National Parks sites, you're missing out. After all, the parks authority has helped make these sites accessible to you. The bigger attraction sites like Masada and Caesaria are interesting; however, there are fewer tourists at some of the less popular sites. These are the ones I prefer to visit.

I hope I've persuaded you to visit some of these sites. If not, while looking through my photos again, I've convinced myself that it's time to return to Israel and check out some more of these sites.

Photos can't take the place of actually visiting a locale, but they're good for reminiscing. So, crack open that album and bon voyage.

Making a dream come true

In the past month, I have come to appreciate the potential power we students hold. I realize that there are many people who will live their whole lives without ever realizing any of their dreams. On the other hand, while still young we have already made a dream come true – not just any dream, but one I feel is especially meaningful at this stage in my life. The Wake-Up Tour has given me a surreal feeling from the very beginning.



By Justin Korda in Montreal

It has now been nearly a year since a group of students first conceived of the idea of this tour. Now, as the tour is actually underway, reality is beginning to step forward as I am forced to take a step back and observe what my peers and I have actually accomplished in the past year.

When we first embarked on this adventure, we did not know what was in store for us. We did know, however, that we felt something was lacking. We finally realized that boredom, passivity and apathy had replaced the excitement, activism and joy we felt were associated with our Jewish heritage.

As the Wake-Up Tour has hit the road, I can see that the name we chose has proven to be better suited to it than I could have ever imagined or even hoped. Never before have I seen so many students working together so energetically for a common cause. Students have abandoned any feelings of passivity and have traded them in for the aggressiveness needed to get this project off the ground. For the first time, I am seeing Jewish youth come together for an event that does not centre around a religious holiday or the fight against anti-Semitism. We Jewish students are uniting for the first time, or at least the first time for my generation, in order to celebrate our identity and nothing else.

At the beginning this project held a special place in the hearts of only a few students. However, the Wake-Up Tour has grown and expanded. I am proud to be able to say that there are now people whom I have not met, whose names I do not know and have never heard, to whom this project means just as much as it does to me. The Wake-Up Tour quickly developed a strong following of students throughout North America, and all were ready to get involved and act in order to make sure that the tour would be playing soon at a venue near them.

Amazingly, students were able to organize themselves and cooperate to realize this common dream. As anyone who has ever tried to arrange a concert, let alone a tour, would know, there was a tremendous amount of work to be done. Yet so many students were getting involved that we were able to break the work down into smaller units. Different individuals took responsibility for the many different areas that were all essential to the proper functioning of the tour. This display of pure energy coupled with support from several community groups and individuals have allowed us all to see this production come together.

It is not simply the work that helped us accomplish something. Rather, it was an accomplishment in its own right, because the students persevered in a shared goal. The actual tour is not just the culmination of all of our months of hard work. It is a celebration of one goal already accomplished.

The Wake-Up Tour represents more than a mere concert. It marks a moment in time where students have made a decision to challenge themselves to fulfil and maximize their potential. It symbolizes a generation's claim to a power that they want to possess because it has direct value for them. These milestones could never have been reached without the youthful and vibrant vision of students who wanted to contribute to their own destiny. By never using the word impossible – a principle which can be credited to one of the tour's original founders – a translation of idealism into reality is taking place.

Dreams can come true, and the surest way to make it happen is to wake up.

Laying on of hands

The word "touch" refers to physical contact. But we say: "I was touched by his words," which conveys an emotional contact only. Perhaps nowhere else is this confluence of meanings demonstrated more clearly than in a process of healing that involves not only an emotional exchange, but also a physical one.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

An experience in the Jewish realm was recently reported by a close friend of mine, Rabbi Stephen Franklin, who heads a congregation in New York. In many ways he was, and still is, a traditionalist – both in his personal life and in his perception of how a religious service touches the hearts of the worshippers.

I was therefore interested when in a recent bulletin of his congregation I found an article about laying on of hands – something that I would not have expected him of all people to do. But I will let you read excerpts from the column that he wrote to his congregation, which I publish with his permission.

"It was with trepidation that I involved myself in healing beyond the mere offering of prayers. With the Talmudic precedent from tractate B'rachot 5b of Rabbi Yochanan healing Rabbi Chiya by putting his hand in his, I further attempted to legitimize my role as a conduit of divine healing. Uneasy and fearful, I truly did not know if congregants in need of healing would involve themselves in the process. As I listened to our cantor, choir and organ join forces in a glorious rendition of Meir Finkelstein's Psalm 84 … and then walked about the sanctuary as Cantor Garfein sang Debbie Friedman's Mischeberach, I felt light-headed. Emotion overwhelmed me as so many people in need of healing lined the aisles to put their outstretched hands in mine. When our gazes met through tear-filled eyes… during the touching of hands, I was absolutely convinced that some energy had passed from the Realm beyond us all to me and through my hands to those seeking healing for themselves and for loved ones and friends.

"I was amazed at myself. Where was the old religious rationalist I thought I was, the seeker after an amalgam between science and religion? Perhaps my rationalism had had blinders, because I recently have learned about a parallel in physics. A professor of physics at my undergraduate alma mater, Williams College, William Wooters, four or five years ago daringly predicted a seemingly mystic possibility in the rationalist's sanctuary of quantum mechanics. According to Wooters, it is possible for something called "quantum teleportation" to occur. Quantum teleportation means that a particle of electromagnetic energy, a photon, can suddenly find its qualities completely duplicated by another photon, at a distance from it, and with absolutely no connection between the two photons. Wooters' theory has just been demonstrated, actually proven, in a physics laboratory at the University of Innsbruck in Austria.

"No one quite understands how this quantum teleportation, this transfer of energy, takes place, but take place it does. Our services of healing might well be utilizing a teleportation of energies, even for people at a distance from the room of the prayer recitation, to influence the healing process."

The Kirshner File

A life rich in ambition and upward mobility

By Sheldon Kirshner

Henry Grunwald's life, rich in turbulence, ambition and upward mobility, is the archetypical success story. A Jewish refugee from Austria, he immigrated to the United States in 1940, perfected his English, became a copy boy at Time magazine, rose in the ranks and finished an illustrious career as ambassador to his former homeland.

It's quite a tale and the loquacious Grunwald milks it dry in his massive autobiography, One Man's America (Doubleday, $41.95).

Born and bred in Vienna, he was the scion of a fairly assimilated middle-class family whose breadwinner, Alfred, was a respected librettist. The Anschluss, Germany's 1938 annexation of Austria, shattered their cozy existence in one fell swoop. Grunwald was thrown out of school, while his father was arrested by the Gestapo and then released.

Fleeing Vienna, the Grunwalds found refuge in Czechoslovakia and France. Then, thanks to a Canadian visitor's visa, they reached New York City via Morocco and Portugal.

In America, Alfred Grunwald floundered, a fish out of water. But his son flourished, seamlessly adapting to his new milieu, honing his "passable" English so that he could be a playwright, studying at New York University and editing the student newspaper.

Although he was far from the killing fields of Europe, the Holocaust intruded. Having read accounts of the unfolding mass murder of Jews, he slept badly and was tormented by nightmares.

While still at university, Grunwald took a part-time job at Time as a $4.50-per-night copy boy. Upon graduating, he worked as a reporter for a trade union journal. But, being bored by the routine, he returned to claim his old position at Time. Fortune smiled on him, and by 1945 he had made the masthead as a staff writer. Interestingly enough, his first significant pieces were about the 1946 Nuremberg war crimes trials.

Despite his standing at Time, Grunwald considered journalism as a way station on the road to playwriting. Perhaps, as he infers, his yearning stemmed from occupational dissatisfaction. Time printed few of his overseas dispatches and those which saw the light of day were mangled by overzealous editors.

Though he eventually grew restless, Grunwald soldiered on. His perseverance paid off when he was named assistant managing editor. Within a few years, he was Time's first Jewish managing editor. Later, he was appointed editor-in-chief.

Clearly, the magazine's founder and publisher, the legendary Henry Luce, liked him. In some quarters, Luce was considered an anti-Semite. Grunwald takes exception to this accusation, claiming that Luce was genuinely interested in but relatively ignorant of Judaism.

Grunwald, who flirted with Roman Catholicism briefly, was alienated from the rituals and practices of Judaism and deplored "Jewish tribalism." But ultimately, as he explains at some length, he learned to appreciate Judaism.

During the late 1960s, he visited Israel, and while he was skeptical about the ability of Zionism to reverse 2,000 years of diasporic history, he was impressed by Israel's will to survive.

Israel figured in Grunwald's "most painful" experience at Time. In the wake of the 1982 Lebanon War, Ariel Sharon — the Israeli minister of defence — sued the magazine for alleging that he had instigated the Lebanese Christian massacre of Palestinian refugees at Sabra and Shatila. The case dragged on for two years and tarnished Time's reputation.

In his concluding chapter, Grunwald describes his ambassadorship in Vienna, which coincided with the election of Kurt Waldheim as Austria's president. Anti-Semitism was in the air and Grunwald received scurrilous letters attacking him, the United States and Israel. Nonetheless, Grunwald claims he achieved his diplomatic objective: taking " the strain out of the atmosphere between Washington and Vienna." Not bad for a Jewish boy who was hounded out of Austria by the Nazis.

Classic Coen clone

As a film buff, I have always enjoyed the dark, zany humor of the Coen brothers, Joel and Ethan. Their latest movie, The Big Lebowski, now playing at Cineplex Odeon theatres, may well be their most uproarious film.

What I liked best about it, apart from its Byzantine plot concerning mistaken identity, were its offbeat characters. The Coens possess a genuine knack for dreaming up outrageous screen personalities, and Walter Sobchak, brilliantly portrayed by John Goodman, is certainly a classic Coen clone.

Supposedly a Polish Roman Catholic convert to Judaism, he's a Vietnam vet, a burly bear of a man with a brushcut and goatee who wears baggy shorts and black combat boots and is given to bursts of profane language.

Incongruous as it sounds, Sobchak is Jewishly observant, constantly reminding everyone within earshot that he is "shomer Shabbes." Fast with epigrammatic phrases, he quotes Theodor Herzl ("If you will it, it is no dream"), perceives Jewish history as a straight line from "Moses to Sandy Koufax," and exhibits a low tolerance for anti-Semites.

Quite a guy.

Law of the land governs

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

As residents of Canada, we are mandated by Jewish law to obey all facets of Canadian law. This requirement is based on the talmudic principle of Dina Demalchuta Dina, that the (civil) laws of a government are binding upon its citizens.

The application of this principle ranges from full compliance with all tax laws, to conforming with customs regulations or following one's particular code of professional ethics.

What if there is a conflict between Jewish and secular law? While Jewish law spells out the financial responsibilities vis-a-vis business transactions, the parties involved may agree to be guided by their own rules and regulations even if they contravene those of the Torah. After all, it is their money.

In fact, unless explicitly stated otherwise, it is understood that Jews operating in Canada plan to follow Canadian law. Employer-employee relations are a case in point. According to Jewish law, a hired worker must be paid daily and any delay is considered a serious violation of Jewish law. Since this is not the common practice here, it is understood, unless explicitly stated otherwise, that upon accepting a job, a worker waives his right to daily payment, and hence Jewish law permits employees to be paid on a bi-weekly basis.

While Dina Demalchuta may impose different obligations upon us, may one use Canadian law to avoid obligations which Jewish law would otherwise impose?

A prime example relates to the laws of bankruptcy. In order to let debtors have a fresh start, western society developed the notion of a bankruptcy discharge. Jewish law, however, knows of no such notion. A debt owed remains so until it is paid off. In addition, Jewish law – in contrast to secular law, which treats all secured creditors equally – stipulates that creditors are to be paid in the order in which advances were made. No payment is made to the second creditor until the first one is paid in full.

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein ruled that Dina Demalchuta Dina is applicable to bankruptcy law, and hence an early creditor who seizes assets to satisfy amounts outstanding must return them to the bankruptcy court for proper distribution, even though this runs counter to talmudic law.

Rabbi Feinstein limits his ruling to the status of the creditors once a bankruptcy is declared. He does not address the question of when or even whether one may declare bankruptcy. However, it appears to me that a declaration of bankruptcy, at least from a moral, if not a legal point of view, can only be considered by the extremely indigent.

An analysis of the laws of debt repayment leads one to such a conclusion. Jewish law states that when debtors claim that they are unable to satisfy a debt, an accounting must be given of all of their assets. Beyond basic necessities, all assets are then sold to satisfy one's debts. This would include such items as one's home – one can easily live in a rented home – car, any investments (including RRSPs), books and fine China.

Jewish law also considers all assets of the family unit as one. Therefore, the common technique of placing assets in the name of a spouse does not absolve the debtor from the obligation to use those assets to satisfy debts owing. While this may seem harsh, Jewish law considers payments of outstanding debts to be a very serious matter. Any excess over very basic subsistence must be used to satisfy one's financial obligations.

The above notwithstanding, a Jew who does declare bankruptcy is absolved from paying all debts. What if such a person had the good fortune to turn things around? Should previously written-off debts be paid? Here too it would appear to me that while perhaps this is not required by the letter of the law, restitution should be made.

Jewish law has always emphasized – particularly in financial matters – the need to act beyond the letter of the law. How can G-d-fearing Jews with a hefty bank balance look themselves in the mirror knowing that a legal technicality, not even recognized in the codes of Jewish law, absolved them from making good on prior financial commitments? Therefore, if and when conditions warrant, full restitution should be made.

A complex personality

Dr. Freud, A Life,* by Paul Ferris (Random House, $45).

When Sigmund Freud died in 1939, W.H. Auden wrote these familiar words of tribute: "To us he is no more a person/ now but a climate of opinion." Indeed, Freud's name became an adjective to describe human nature. Through his use of the technique of psychoanalysis, he attempted to uncover the unconscious hidden motivations behind human behavior.

Before Freud, when a person thought anything, he thought he knew what he was thinking, but since Freud, said the English magazine Punch, "When a man thinks a thing, the thing he thinks he thinks is not the thing he thinks, but only the thing he thinks he thinks he thinks." The concept of the "Freudian unconscious" had a radical effect upon medicine, the arts, religion, education, criminal law, child-rearing, and attitudes toward sex and marriage.

In 1905 Freud published a slender volume entitled Three Contributions to the Theory of Sex. Suddenly he became the subject of violent controversy. Few people had shown any interest in his earlier book on dreams; nor were many interested in his second book, Psychopathology of Everyday Life, in which Freud demonstrated how the slip of the tongue, the forgetting of a name or an object, the mispronunciation of a word, and even getting into an accident might be subtly motivated by desires one had wished to repress. These important discoveries were ignored as the public began to associate his name with sex.

The Viennese public looked upon him as a salacious pornographer and his own colleagues in psychiatry labelled him demented. Physicians asked for Freud's expulsion from the city's medical society because he inquired into the sexual life of his patients. Freud's reply was to publish more evidence in support of the theories for which the Victorian prudery of his time was unready.

Paul Ferris is a British writer with many works of fiction, reportage and biography to his credit. What is noteworthy about this book are its portrait of Freud as a flawed personality and the author's use of new research and findings about the man, his work and his world.

The reader discovers in this sympathetic but always critical study how Freud's major ideas have undergone a process of rejection or revision by new advances in psychology and chemistry.

"In the second half of the century, psychology has come to recognize alternatives that don't depend on the grinding Freudian mechanisms of repression and conflict. Freud's solution to the riddle was no more proof against time than anyone else's. His monument is his search for one."

In a chapter entitled A Fanatical Jew, Ferris delves into Freud's attitudes towards and feelings about his Jewishness. Freud assured a correspondent in 1935, "I have always held faithfully to our people and never pretended to be anything but what I am." He was an unbeliever, but responded to anti-Semitism with a stubborn reiterated assertion of his culture and tradition.

Ferris does not probe deeply into Freud's often complicated ideas. Instead, in this non-technical and accessible biography, he presents the portrait of a complex, stoic, creative personality – as mysterious a creation as any of the subjects that crowd his case histories.

He also discusses Freud's conclusion that the memory of his patients of childhood sexual abuse was largely fantasy, and how that decision has led to widespread and contentious dispute.

At the end of his task, Ferris confesses that "working on his book has taught me the inexhaustible nature of the subject. Freud is what you want him to be."

A passage across the ocean

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

How many of us below the age of 60 have been obliged to experience an ocean voyage on anything even remotely less luxurious than the Queen Elizabeth II?

For our immigrant ancestors who crossed the Atlantic by ship, the crossing was often a gruelling, claustrophic experience, filled with a mixture of anxiety and hope. Most, of course, were obliged to endure the cramped and uncomfortable conditions of steerage class.

For many, the voyage was characterized by sickness and sometimes hunger owing to a lack of suitable kosher food. The travellers also felt much sadness at the thought of loved ones left behind – mothers and fathers and brothers and sisters whom they would likely never see again. They would have also felt great apprehension about what their lives would become once they landed in America or Canada – tempered, usually, by the great joy experienced when suddenly, after a week or 10 days at sea, land was sighted and the ship steamed into port.

Ships' passenger lists provide a few factual details about the voyages and those who made them. Such details, however, while highly useful to the genealogical researcher, tell only a small part of the human story.

One of the best first-person accounts I have read of an immigrant's ocean crossing was written by Abraham Cahan (1860-1951), the legendary early editor of the Yiddish Daily Forward; the passage is contained in his classic novel of Jewish-American immigrant life, The Rise of David Levinsky, which the Forward serialized before its publication in 1917 (reissued as a Penguin paperback in 1993).

"Who can depict the feeling of desolation, homesickness, uncertainty and anxiety with which an emigrant makes his first voyage across the ocean?" asks Cahan's protagonist, David Levinsky, one of a multitude of steerage passengers making their way from Bremen to New York.

"When Columbus was crossing the Atlantic, on his first great voyage, his men doubted whether they would ever reach land. So does many an America-bound emigrant to this day. Such, at least, was the feeling that was lurking in my heart while the Bremen steamer was carrying me to New York.

"Day after day passes and all you see about you is an unbroken waste of water, an unrelieved, a hopeless monotony of water. You know that a change will come, but this knowledge is confined to your brain. Your senses are skeptical."

Levinsky professes a fear of the sea and feels himself in the grip of a "vast, uncanny force." He copes by reciting Psalms, especially when "the pitching or rolling of the sea" is most pronounced. But his discomfort is transformed into hope as the ship approaches America.

"When the discoverers of America saw land at last they fell on their knees and a hymn of thanksgiving burst from their souls. The scene, which is one of the most thrilling in history, repeats itself in the heart of every immigrant as he comes in sight of the American shores.

"The immigrant's arrival in his new home is like a second birth to him. Imagine a new-born babe in possession of a fully developed intellect. Would it ever forget its entry into the world? Neither does the immigrant ever forget his entry into a country which is, to him, a new world in the profoundest sense of the term and in which he expects to pass the rest of his life."

For the fictional Levinsky, the ordinary landscape "was utterly unlike anything I had ever seen or dreamed of before. It unfolded itself like a divine revelation. I was in a trance or in something closely resembling one."

Family tree researchers wishing to find a particular passenger list for an arrival at a Canadian port should write to the National Archives of Canada, Manuscript Division, Genealogical Section, 395 Wellington St., Ottawa K1A 0N3. Indicate the names of your ancestors and any children with them if known, and – again, if known – their rough ages, the name of the ship and the year and port where it landed.

Reform women to host feminist seder

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Women for Reform Judaism will host its third annual Miriam's Seder on April 5 at the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ)/Leo Baeck Day School building in Thornhill.

The afternoon event, with rabbis Ariel Friedlander of Holy Blossom Temple and Daveen Litwin of Temple Sinai, will feature music and will follow a feminist Haggadah updated by the two rabbis.

"It gives us the chance to bring together tradition and innovation," said Rabbi Litwin in an interview.

Seder imagery lends itself to a variety of situations, said the rabbi, who has participated in women's seders, black-Jewish seders and Palestinian-Jewish seders before moving here from the United States last August.

"The stories speak to so many experiences," she said. "There is an ongoing process of bringing women's voices back to our tradition."

The $25 tickets ($18 for students) include traditional seder fare and Passover desserts. A portion of the proceeds will be donated to the CCRJ camp.

"It's a very warm celebration of Pesach and a very moving event," said Janice Babins, who is involved in organizing the seder.

Time for more Jewish funnies

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's still the happy month of Adar so...there's still time for more Jewish humor on the Internet.

One of the greatest weapons of Jews is the ability to laugh in the face of the most incredible adversity. Here's an excerpt from the book, Jokes of Oppression: The Humor of Soviet Jews [http://www.aronson.com/Judaica/humor.htm]:

"Shapiro, we know you have a brother abroad," said the KGB official.

"I do not," Shapiro protested.

"Don't lie to us, Shapiro. We even have these letters from him addressed to you and postmarked Jerusalem," the official sneered.

"Ah, you don't understand," explained Shapiro. "It's not my brother who is abroad; it is I!"

Why the Jews – and humor? In his book Jewish Humor: What the Best Jewish Jokes Say About the Jews [http://www.amazon.com/exec/obidos/ISBN=0688110274/], Rabbi Joseph Telushkin asks, "Is there one sentence that can capture the essence of Jewish humor? I'm afraid not. How could one statement encompass jokes about Jewish mothers, reckless and rude drivers in Israel, and anti-Semites? Indeed, 150 years of Jewish jokes and 2,000 years of folklore and witticisms, have the uncanny ability to express truths that sociological or other academic studies usually miss."

Chicago's Spertus Museum recently dealt with the Jewish tie to humor in its exhibition Let There Be Laughter! Jewish Humor in America [http://www.jewishmuseums.com/humor.htm]. And the next time you're in Australia, you may want to enrol in the University of Melbourne course Jewish Humor: From the Bible to Broadway [http://www.unimelb.edu.au/HB/subjects/131-285.html].

Sometimes truth is funnier than fiction. At least something that was passed off as being true. Did you know that the Israeli military is secretly training combat units to use slingshots and that the idea comes from a 10 year-old descendant of David, the biblical slayer of Goliath?

Or that archeologists have discovered a fossilized apple core from the Tree of Knowledge? Or that Israeli researchers are studying the "Samson Syndrome," a baffling disorder which makes men weak after a haircut?

Well, they're all true – if you believe what's written in American tabloids. Last year, the Jerusalem Report surveyed some American tabloids for news from the Holy Land that the networks and the big media somehow missed [http://www.virtual.co.il/news/news/j_report/97aug07/cover.htm].

For genuine humor, the Israeli Politics and Humor is a large bilingual site with bite [http://www.geocities.com/CapitolHill/4980/]. And don't forget the huge Dry Bones cartoon gallery [http://drybones.org.il/GALLERY.HTML].

Leonard Mayzel Lodge to mark 50 years as part of B'nai Brith

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A gala birthday bash is being planned to celebrate the 50th birthday of B'nai Brith Canada's Leonard Mayzel Ontario Lodge (LMOL), and organizers are looking for past members to join current ones at the celebration.

The event, a dinner-dance, will be held May 3 at the Inn on the Park. David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada, will be the keynote speaker, as the dinner will also celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary. A video history of the lodge will be shown, and memorabilia will be on display.

In 1948, Toronto's third B'nai Brith lodge was organized by a group of young men, all alumni of Aleph Zadik Aleph (the boys' division of the B'nai Brith Youth Organization) and all under age 22. Annual dues were $7.

The opening meeting was held at the Royal York Hotel. These days, meetings are usually held at the B'nai Brith building on Hove Street, which was built in part with money raised by the lodge.

One of the members' first projects was to send a telegram to Ottawa praising Canada's recognition of the new State of Israel, according to a lodge history written in 1987 by longtime member Merv Cohen.

Now 71, Cohen is 50th anniversary chair and a past president. He joined Ontario Lodge, as it was then known, in 1951. The name was changed following the 1954 death of lodge member Leonard Mayzel in a motor vehicle accident.

Although Cohen joined primarily for social reasons, Jewish pride in the nascent State of Israel also played an important role. "You've got to remember, Israel had just been formed. There was a strong feeling of Jewish identity in Toronto. People were joining Jewish organizations," he said in a recent interview.

Over the past half-century, it is estimated lodge members have put in hundreds of thousands of hours volunteering and have raised over $2 million for B'nai Brith and a wide range of Israeli and Canadian charities.

Merv's son Eric, 38, who is LMOL's president, had been involved in some of the lodge's community volunteer work when he was younger. He joined in 1982.

"When I installed him as president, that was quite an emotional night for me," recalled Merv. His brother Basil, who is also a past president, was assistant installing officer for the occasion.

Eric has continued the family tradition by taking his young daughter to community service events.

Over the years, the lodge has taken disabled children from Bloorview Hospital on annual picnics, run Christmas parties for residents of the now-defunct Vaughan Glen Hospital and Chanukah parties for nursing home residents. They have also organized outings to sporting events and places like Wonderland for special education students at the Kadima School and patients of the Hugh MacMillan Rehabilitation Centre, among others.

"A lot of our members became very attached to people we helped over the years," said Eric.

Current activities include bringing coffee to police officers staffing the annual RIDE program, to show their support.

"In 50 years we've supported a lot of organizations, from blood donor clinics to the Wellesley Hospital burn centre," said Merv.

A few years ago, when they were keeping track of volunteer hours, lodge members were contributing a total of over 1,200 person-hours per year.

In addition to community service, LMOL boasts baseball teams, bowling leagues, social and educational events and family programs.

Today there are almost 400 members (mostly men, although membership was opened to women about 10 years ago). They range in age from 20-something to over 70. Five of the original 52 charter members still belong, and a dozen have indicated they will attend the reunion.

Invitations have been sent to California, Pennsylvania, Florida, Alberta and Ottawa. Among the former members organizers would still like to find are Irving Aiken, Max Diamond, Earl Grossman, Gordon Kideckel and Frank Risman.

For more information about the 50th anniversary, contact Merv Cohen at 416-633-9092 or e-mail [102731.3573@compuserve.com].

Link between film, Torah concepts discussed

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hollywood movies help shed more light on the teachings of Torah than one might think.

That was the premise of Aish's Learn-a-Plex, a program held recently at Aish Hatorah in Thornhill.

Lori Palatnik, Rabbi Yossi Michalowicz, Rabbi Mitch Mandel, and Rabbi Ahron Hoch discussed the popular films Crimes & Misdemeanors, starring Woody Allen; Field of Dreams, starring Kevin Costner; Phenomenon, starring John Travolta; and It's a Wonderful Life, with Jimmy Stewart.

The movie theme was carried throughout the building, which sported movie posters and snack bars.

The baseball field, as idealized in Field of Dreams, said Rabbi Michalowicz, is "a tremendous Jewish metaphor."

"Like the Torah, the lines between what is 'in' and what is 'out' are fairly clearly drawn, although there are many interpretations within those lines; customs are tailored to the locale; an outdoor game leaves players to the mercy of the weather and of HaShem, just like Sukkot does; and the focus is on a central point – the pitcher's mound or the Torah."

"And there is another connection," he added tongue-in-cheek. "Why does Yom Kippur always come out during the world series?"

Field of Dreams, about a man who listens to voices telling him to build a baseball field, deals with "that voice, that vision, that comes to all of us, those far from Judaism, or just far from where you want to be," the rabbi said, "even if you are not looking for it, or don't want it.

People let the most important moments in life pass them by, he said, using the scene where Kinsella's family, who simply can't see what is happening in the field, tell him not to make them feel stupid.

"It's like after you have had an incredible experience with Yiddishkeit, like a Pesach seder, a memorable Shabbat or a moving shul experience, and your family thinks you are putting them down by enthusing about it."

It is significant, Rabbi Michalowicz said, that Kinsella's wife gave him the room and opportunity to fulfil his dream, until eventually she was able to partake of it too.

The movie warns against distinguishing between worthwhile and transitory dreams. The doctor, played by Burt Lancaster, had to give up his dream of being a baseball player, but recognizes that that is not a genuine tragedy – "the real tragedy would have been if I could only have been a doctor for 10 minutes."

The doctor realizes the important things in life may not be indulging one's dreams. "Abraham stopped talking to G-d in order to welcome guests – he saw that it was more important to communicate, to be G-dlike. Similarly, the doctor, given the chance to have his heaven (play in the baseball field), realizes he must leave that dream to save a little girls' life. He is the real hero."

It's the concept of doing things " le'shem shomayim, for the sake of heaven, not for what's in it for me," the rabbi explained.

The sequence with the doctor also points to the idea that doing a good deed can result in good fortune for you, Rabbi Michalowicz said. "If Ray Kinsella hadn't gone looking for Midnight Graham [the doctor] his child's life might not have been saved."

Although It's a Wonderful Life, the story of a man who thinks his life has been a failure, is set at Christmas, it has an important message for Jews, according to Rabbi Hoch – no one is born to be a failure, and no one who has friends is truly poor.

George Bailey constantly struggles between what he wants to do and his need to do the right thing. "He always chooses the right thing," Rabbi Hoch said.

The movie shows the tremendous impact of the choices we make. "Because he saves his brother Harry, Harry saves 230 people trapped on a transport, and that makes a difference for who knows how many other people," Rabbi Hoch says.

It is important to note, Rabbi Hoch said, that when Bailey returns home after the angel shows him how much poorer the world would have been without him, "nothing has changed, except his attitude.

"Life will be played out, not by external events, but by our attitude towards them. That is a very Jewish concept. Pirkei Avot, Ethics of the Fathers asks Who is the Wealthy Person? And answers He who rejoices in his portion."

The importance of choice is also important in Crimes and Misdemeanors, while Phenomenon continues the exploration of the journey toward one's potential, other sessions showed.

Music's more than just work for Beth Emeth's Louis Danto

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Cantor Louis Danto, cantor at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue for 24 years, knows first hand the ironies of life.

As a 10-year-old boy in wartime Poland, Danto received a scholarship to study music in Minsk. When Germany invaded, the students were taken to Russia to continue their studies; while he was there, his parents and four brothers and sisters perished at the hands of the Nazis.

"From one side G-d gave me the gift of music and from the other he took away my family. That is the irony of life," said Danto in an interview shortly before he received the degree of doctor of music honoris causa from the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

The degree, granted by the board of directors at a special convocation held recently at the seminary, was given in order to recognize publicly the contributions Danto has made to the profession and to the Jewish community during his career as a cantor.

"It is exciting and gratifying that after so many years the Seminary has chosen to honor me among the very few who have received this degree," says Danto.

At the age of eight, Danto, now 69, began singing in the synagogue and knew immediately that he wanted to be a cantor. After the war, when he discovered he had lost his family, he went to Rome to continue his musical studies.

Painting by David Nemztov

Cantor Louis Danto

"I was possessed by music. Even at that young age, I knew I had an uncommon voice and I trained in the bel canto system of singing. I learned to use my voice like a musical instrument."

In 1950, after discovering he had an uncle in New York, Danto was sponsored to come to the United States, where his uncle, recognizing his talent, wanted him to become a singer in a night club, "where he thought I could get rich. Even though I was only 20 years old, I knew what I wanted and that was not it.

"Before I had left home, I had promised my parents I would become a cantor and so I entered a yeshivah to study liturgy. There was no question what I would do with my life."

From the time he was a young child, he says, "I have been driven by music. I have always moved in that direction. My voice and my personality are one, and in the end, it is music that saved my life."

While living in Cleveland with his wife Nechama and three young children, Danto auditioned for the chair of the ritual committee of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. "From the minute I accepted this position," he says, "I knew that it was a wonderful, cantorial oriented congregation. They are planning a special Shabbat to recognize my degree."

He does not see music as his life's work. "To me it is not work. Imagine, I'm doing what I'm passionate about and I'm getting paid for it, but of course, don't tell my congregants how I feel," he laughs.

Danto, who in 1984, sang at a televised concert at Maple Leaf Gardens before Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip and an interfaith audience of 16,000, has also sung in numerous concerts in North America and Europe.

While on an east European tour to Moscow, Leningrad, Odessa, Kiev and Budapest, he discovered manuscripts of classical Jewish songs, which he recorded on his Gems of the Jewish Operetta and Masters of the Jewish Art Song of the Saint Petersburg School.

His recent works include Arias and Songs of Love, recorded with the State Opera of Prague during his 1995 concert tour of Europe, and I Heard a Voice from Heaven, recorded with violinist Rivka Golani. In December of last year he released the new CD, Music from the Soul of a People.

CJC region launches forum on pluralism, unity

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Moshe Ronen

TORONTO — In response to a concern cited as a critical need, A Forum on Jewish Pluralism and Unity was set up recently by the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The creation of the forum was unanimously approved by the region's executive, which includes representatives of all shades of religious and lay opinion on Diaspora-Israel relations.

"I don't believe it. There is no debate and instead we obviously have a consensus," said an unbelieving Moshe Ronen, region chair, who proposed the forum.

A lay facilitator is to be named to get the forum up and running, said Ronen. Some of its meetings will be open and others in camera to allow free expression.

"It is saddening and ironic that we tirelessly struggle for the tolerance and acceptance of others in our multicultural society, while intolerance seems to exist openly within our own community." Ronen said.

The forum should play a vital part in bridging differences of opinion within the Jewish community, he added.

Though he did not mention any specific issues the forum would face, the debates over the process of conversion in Israel have exposed serious splits in the community.

The region has already started on a healing process with its Israel Affairs Committee, Ronen said. At its meetings, Peace Now, Yesha and those in between sit together and talk and learn from each other.

"The committee debated the peace process, ways of combatting terrorism and the status of the territories, and it has reflected on the assassination of a prime minister. The group sponsored many informational breakfast meetings involving personalities from all sides of the debate. Infighting and disunity have always led to hurtful and harmful consequences for us all."

In reply to a question, Ronen said the idea of the forum may be adopted by Jewish communities in other parts of Canada.

Suggestions about who should be the facilitator were received by executive director Bernie Farber, who noted that members of the Israel Affairs Committee were divided on a proposal that Rabbi David Hartman be considered.

Two names put forward by executive members were Prof. Emil Fackenheim, a former CJN columnist who lives in Israel, and Rabbi Emanuel Rackman, former chancellor of Bar-Ilan University, who now lives in New York.

"We must be careful in choosing a facilitator. Some rabbis are not acceptable to everyone," said Fredelle Brief. "This is a long-term project and we've taken a long time to get to this point."

Discussion of a facilitator is premature in the opinion of former MPP David Rotenberg, who described the forum as "a baby step forward."

Leo Baeck students exposed to tragic face of poverty

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The suburban kids of Leo Baeck Day School recently came face to face with the reality of urban poverty at their annual learnathon.

Principal Zita Gardner said the idea of the learnathons is "to give kids the opportunity to connect to the community – to feel a part of the Jewish community."

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El and chair of the Leo Baeck board, introduced the students to the hard facts: In Toronto, one out of five people live below the poverty line; out of a population of 30 million in Canada, two million children are poor.

The youngsters then broke up into workshops led by community representatives Gordon Wolfe of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS); Bob Smolkin of the Out of the Cold program at Holy Blossom Temple; David Gladstone, former principal of Ryerson Public School in downtown Toronto; Susan Jackson of UJA Federation; and Jackie Kott-Wolle of Mazon Canada.

It was Kott-Wolle who probably got the most personal reaction with her story of a little boy in an inner city school, who had skipped breakfast, not because he slept in or just didn't like eating breakfast or was dieting, all of which the children could relate to, but because it wasn't his turn to eat that day.

She pointed out that when those on a fixed, low income have an emergency, even a toothache, the money for it does not come from funds set aside for luxuries like vacations, entertainment and toys, but from the food budget.

Jackson stressed the loss of dignity and self esteem that often comes with the loss of employment.

Gladstone said that Ryerson staff had provided its poor students with breakfasts, peer tutoring, clothing, toy and skate exchanges and a hotline to help them deal with their emotions and their problems.

The Out of the Cold program at Holy Blossom, part of a city-wide effort by churches (and that one synagogue) to help the homeless, is held every Thursday night, Smolkin said.

Guests, as Smolkin called them ("They are called guests and are treated like guests"), can get clothing, a place to sleep for the night and food – dinner for that night, breakfast the next morning if they stay, and a bagged lunch.

"The lunch has more than enough for a meal. So they can share with someone else. It gives them a feeling of dignity," Smolkin said.

Wolfe stressed that JF&CS also tries to maintain the dignity of its clients, such as by sponsoring the Just a Second Shop, where they can get good quality clothes for very little, and by helping children go to camp.

All the speakers emphasized that people were seldom poor because, for instance, of some weakness on their part, but rather because of lack of education, the poor economy, being recent immigrants or belonging to a family who had been poor for generations.

In a dramatic conclusion to the day, Rabbi Bielfeld took out a Torah and explained that Jews have the obligation to help others, not just because we feel sorry for them or because it isn't fair that some have so much and others so little, but because "it says in the Torah that the world belongs to God, and we are only tenants.

"The Jewish reason is that it's in the Torah and the poor have a claim on us. We don't give charity because it makes us feel good, but tzedakah, from the word tzedek, justice, because it's the right thing to do."

Since the learnathon the students have been discussing what they can do to help the poor. Some suggestions have been making place mats for the Out of the Cold program, adopting an inner city school, running a car wash or bake sale to benefit Mazon and holding a children's clothing drive.

Lou Ronson to receive BBC human rights award

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lou Ronson rests his chin on his hand, his mind going back more than seven decades as he reflects on the impetus for his involvement in human rights issues.

The Toronto-born son of Russian-Jewish immigrants, Ronson first encountered anti-Semitism at age 10 when he was ostracized by his new classmates after moving to Port Colborne.

Now 83, Ronson has played a significant role in the fight against racism. The driving force behind the 1970 creation of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, he has devoted virtually all his adult life to related issues.

On April 6, the League will present Ronson with its rarely bestowed Special Human Rights award and inaugurate the Lou Ronson Human Rights Scholarship Fund, in conjunction with its annual Media Human Rights Awards ceremony.

"Lou Ronson has for so many years been a champion of human rights," said Karen Mock, national director of the League. "We consider him a mentor and a real leader in the field. This is a way to ensure that we continue to get young people involved and inspired by his leadership."

The scholarship will be used to fund human rights education for students and teachers of all ethnic and religious backgrounds through vehicles like student internships and the league's Holocaust and Hope study program in partnership with the Massuah Institute for the Study of the Holocaust, located near Tel Aviv.

Ronson, a former chair of Canadian Friends of Massuah, is gratified by the affiliation.

Lou Ronson

"It's very important for all of us to have [non-Jewish] Massuah students understand what the Holocaust was all about and how to be vigilant against any such repetition in the future," said Ronson in an interview at B'nai Brith Canada's offices.

During the war, Ronson served in Canada's armed forces. He changed his name from Rosenblatt on the advice of a non-Jewish officer.

As a young man in university, he used to read about the activities of B'nai Brith's U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL) in his father's B'nai Brith bulletins. "I made up my mind that when I graduated, that was what I was going to get involved in."

After joining the organization's only Toronto lodge, he became involved in its ADL volunteer committee.

When he was a student at Toronto's Jarvis Collegiate in the 1920s, he and fellow Jewish students had endured slurs and snide remarks from certain students and even teachers.

Later, as a chemical engineering student at the University of Toronto, he was told outright by some employers that they didn't hire Jews. It took him a year to find his first job.

As executive vice-president of Sunshine Uniform in the 1950s, Ronson put his own beliefs into practice by instituting an innovative "Democracy in Action" program. His numerous employees, representing a variety of ethnic groups, would meet with their peers to discuss human relations and human rights issues.

To Ronson's satisfaction, the program turned out to be a wise business move. "I was prepared to give up employee time. That cost us money but I felt it was a worthwhile investment in cultivating people." He attributes low employee turnover to the program.

A former vice-chair and a former commissioner of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, Ronson also served on the City of North York's Committee on Community, Race and Ethnic Relations (1988-1991). He was international vice-president of B'nai Brith from 1988 to 1992 and has taken a leadership role in organizations like Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, the Canadian Technion Society and Mount Sinai Hospital.

He credits his parents and community leaders in B'nai Brith's first Toronto lodge as role models. His mother raised funds to build Mount Sinai Hospital on Yorkville Avenue. "My parents always taught me the most treasured possession anyone could acquire is a good name."

When Ronson was a young man, his peers in the Jewish community "more or less accepted" the prevailing anti-Semitism, he recalls. "It became our way of life."

The fledgling ADL volunteer committee tried to influence politicians and opinion holders, Ronson said. "In a way I think it brought out the best in our Jewish youth. There was a challenge.

"You had nobody to complain to. There was no human rights legislation. There was nobody to protect us other than ourselves.

Other minorities also experienced discrimination, noted Ronson. "There was a time, in my lifetime, when firms in Toronto wouldn't hire Protestants, and there were others who wouldn't hire Catholics."

The "real answer," Ronson believes, is "to build a society where there's no discrimination. Then you won't need a human rights commission. It's improved, but we still have a ways to go yet."

Heschel School celebrates 'chai' with Purim bash

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Toronto Heschel School, an arts-based multi-sensory Jewish day school, recently celebrated chai – its first 18 months in operation – with a family Purim bash at the Ontario Science Centre.

The highlight of the evening was a benefit preview screening of the new OMNIMAX film, Thrill Ride. Some 300 people were on hand for the festivities, which also included a magic show, a raffle, donut making and a visit by Sesame Street's Elmo.

Looking at the crowd, school co-founder and principal Otto Baruch Rand told The CJN it was hard to believe that "two years ago the school was only a dream. The reality is more beautiful than anything anticipated."

The school opened in September 1996 with 52 students and doubled its population in the second year; the enrolment will rise to 170 next year and there's a waiting list of 70, Rand said.

He added that the school was recently selected as a finalist for a grant worth up to $400,000 (US) to be awarded to nine schools across North America by the Partnership of Excellence in Jewish Education, an American agency that promotes schools demonstrating excellence and a leadership role in the field of Jewish education.

"This is a real honor, considering the school is less than two years old," Rand said.

A former principal of the A.J. Heschel School in New York, he said he felt there was a place for a similar school in Toronto with "state of the art education."

Rand said he was able to recruit "a dream team" of professional staff and to enlist enough community support and student enrolment to open the school within six months.

He first approached Gail Baker, a former teacher at the Dr. Abraham Shore Academy She'arim Hebrew Day School, who shared his philosophy on education, and she agreed to co-found the school with him.

Shortly after Baker, now Heschel School's director of general studies, came on board, Rabbi Larry Pinsker of Darchei Noam and his wife Marlee, a Heschel kindergarten teacher became involved.

"Gail Baker's colleague, Judith Leitner, who pioneered the integrated art program at She'arim, also joined the founding team along with pre-school teacher Ellen Kessler, whose dream was to teach at a school where gardening and nature studies would be an integral part of the curriculum."

Thrill Ride

To make the school "palatable," he needed to find an observant Judaic studies director, who was committed to an egalitarian and interdenominational approach to Judaic studies, Rand said. "The person who immediately came to mind was Rachael Turkienicz, who is known as an outstanding teacher."

He said Rabbi Irwin E. Witty, the former director of the Board of Jewish Education, made the shidduch between Heschel School and the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, the school's current location.

Rabbi Witty was very helpful and supportive because he felt the school would attract families that might not otherwise consider a Jewish day school, Rand said.

He said Rabbi Pinsker organized three public information meetings, after which a group of interested parents helped to provide the initial start-up funds.

"They had faith in the idea and ...by June, we had sufficient enrolment to start the school."

The founding staff all agreed to work for partial salaries, Rand noted.

It was an investment in the future for them, he said. "They all had faith that the school would grow and succeed."

Yiddish classes draw 75 children

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Children's books can be a good way of learning Yiddish, according to Naomi Miller-Tureck, coordinator of the Yiddish classes for children sponsored by the North York and York Region Boards of Education and the Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation.

A Hebrew teacher for students with special needs at Temple Har Zion and Beth Sholom Synagogue, Miller-Tureck says she is anxious to upgrade her Yiddish skills and so she sits in with the classes.

"I learn along with the kids," she said, adding, "I think children can benefit from both Yiddish and Hebrew."

The three classes with a total of 75 children, are held Sundays from 9.30 a.m. to 12 p.m. at the Finch campus of Associated Hebrew Schools.

They cover kindergarten age in one class, grades 1, 2 and 3 in another, and grades 4 to 7 in the third.

Most of the students are enrolled in Jewish Day Schools (Associated, Bialik and Netivot Hatorah), with a small number in public schools. For the latter group it may be their only exposure to the Yiddish language, culture and heritage, Miller-Tureck said. Instruction is given in Yiddish whenever possible.

The teachers are Shavey Tishler (kindergarten), Ruth Gerlock (grades 1 to 3) and Marc Kates (grades 4 to 7).

The York Region Board of Education sponsors two of the classes based on the large number of pupils from Thornhill, while the North York Board sponsors the third.

Special events such as Purim shpiels and a Chanukah party are funded by the UJA Federation Yiddish committee. One of these will be the appearance March 22 of Yiddish folksinger Lenka Lichtenburg.

There is still time for parents to enrol their children in the free classes.

"We welcome all newcomers," Miller-Tureck said. She can be reached at the Yiddish hotline, 416-635-2883, ext. 700.

USDS committee addresses student bullying at school

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When 10-year old Aviva Kornhauser, a United Synagogue Day School (USDS) student, was in Grade 2 she was bullied by a group of her classmates. The girls refused to let her join them at recess because she was bigger and taller.

Her mother Debbie Kornhauser reported that Aviva – she attends USDS Bayview Campus – often came home crying. "She would ask me, 'Mummy is there something wrong with me?'"

Kornhauser said she didn't know how to help Aviva. "It was an awful feeling."

When she spoke with the teachers, Kornhauser said, she learned that the bullying, which only occurred in the school yard, was not easy to catch. "Exclusion is very difficult and stressful. It's much more difficult for the teachers to detect... Luckily my daughter's teachers were very sensitive."

She said experts tend to view bullying as a form of physical, psychological or verbal aggression, as well as imbalance of power; the victims generally have difficulty defending themselves.

"A person is being bullied when he or she is exposed repeatedly over time to negative actions on the part of one or more persons."

Aviva's problems with her peers persisted in Grade 3, although not to the same degree as Grade 2. By the end of that academic year, Kornhauser raised the issue of bullying at a Parent's Association (PA) meeting. Other parents came forward with similar concerns. The association then agreed to sponsor Kornhauser's attendance at a conference on bullying at York University that summer.

The following September, she and a small group of parents approached the school administration to have an anti-bullying committee formed. USDS education director Lucy Cohen supported the request. In October 1996, the committee, which Kornhauser has chaired since its inception, was established.

Today the committee has grown to 18 members and includes representatives of the teaching staff, parents and administration as well as a social worker from Jewish Family and Child Services.

The committee first turned to York University Prof. Debra Pepler, an expert on bullying, who was hired as a consultant. She helped the group to determine the needs of the school and to adopt a strategy.

Last year Pepler met with the teachers to sensitize them to the issues of bullying, and in September 1997, she began a three-part training program with them. She also spoke at a PA meeting.

With Pepler's guidance, the committee developed a specific policy on bullying for the whole school. "We created an addendum to the school's official code of behavior with respect to bullying," Kornhauser explained.

Essentially the statement makes it clear that bullying behavior of any kind is unacceptable and that everyone has the right to learn in a safe environment and be treated with respect, she said.

She stressed that the clarification of the code of behavior was in accordance with Jewish values, where children develop a sense of respect for others. "The school is committed to fostering derech eretz (respect) as a primary focus."

Many of the teachers have incorporated aspects of the anti-bullying program into the curriculum, Kornhauser said. For example, on their own initiative, both of her daughter's Judaic and general studies teachers – Aviva is now in Grade 5 – have started working on developing empathy among the students.

Before the winter break, the committee sent all the school's families educational information and advice geared to parents of children victimized by bullying at school. The committee is now finalizing a procedures manual that has been in the works for almost a year.

All three USDS campuses will eventually have a copy of the manual, which details the roles and responsibilities of the various members of the USDS community and describes types of bullying behavior and the corresponding consequences, many of which are educational, Kornhauser said. "There are different degrees of bullying behaviors and the consequences will reflect that."

The changes have been gradual, but Kornhauser said the atmosphere at school feels different. "We have some incredibly supportive parents and staff... Everyone is dedicated to making this happen."

Recently the Grade 2 students discussed bullying in class and made anti-bullying posters. "It was such a wonderful thing for me to walk in the hall and to see all these anti-bullying posters. I was bursting.

"Thankfully Aviva has come through it... She has a group of friends now. I don't want to see anybody else have to suffer the way she did."

Gray named as Millennium Man

OTTAWA — He's now known around these parts as the Millennium Man. The federal politician chosen to lead Canada into the year 2000 (5760 according to the Jewish calendar) – or at least to organize the country's millennium celebrations – is none other than Herb Gray, the veteran Windsor MP who is now deputy prime minister.

It's a somewhat ironic choice considering the man talking all about "a gift to our young people of new opportunity and confidence in the future" has been around the House of Commons longer than anyone else.

Along the way, the 66-year-old Gray has also set a string of firsts for Canadian Jewish politicians – first Jewish parliamentary secretary, first Jewish cabinet minister, and of course, first Jewish deputy prime minister. And no one was more surprised when he was chosen to coordinate the millennium celebrations than Gray himself.

When he was named deputy prime minister after last June's election, he expected his job would be to fill in for Prime Minister Jean Chrétien in the Commons and at cabinet meetings and to put out political fires among duelling ministers.

Little did he think he'd also be in charge of spending $160 million over three years for the 2000 celebrations.

"When the prime minister asks you to do something like this, you can't really refuse, and the more I thought about it, the more I thought this would be a very exciting challenge and I'm very glad I'm undertaking it," Gray said with typical understated loyalty.

Asked if he thought it ironic that the longest-serving member of Parliament is in charge of planning for the next millennium, he replies with his normal wit, "Well, I think it's encouraging, as does Jean Chrétien."

Chrétien was his usual expansive self when asked why the senior statesman Gray was chosen for the millennium job: "He's a good man."

So there Gray was last week, sitting side by side with Chrétien under the two giant totem poles in the Great Hall of the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull, to unveil the federal plans. The glitzy ceremony included flashy brochures; a catchy slogan, Sharing the Memory, Shaping the Dream; singing school children; and other kids live via a video hookup from Newfoundland and British Columbia, who will explain their dreams for the new millennium.

Chrétien of course got all the quotes and cute photos in the newspapers. "Canadians don't want a big millennium blowout with nothing to show for it the morning after but a hangover and a lot of bills," the PM said.

"We're not creating a big government bureaucracy, not setting up a bunch of large government-sponsored celebrations, not building cold official monuments, but ensuring that millennium projects across the country are, to coin a phrase, of the people, by the people and for the people, because this magic moment does not belong to governments or politicians. It belongs to the people."

So it was left to Gray to put the flesh on the millennium bones. Ottawa will not direct events, he explained, and there will be no big "bricks and mortar projects." Rather, it will help coordinate, fund and facilitate plans by communities, volunteer groups, provinces and the private sector.

The focus will be on young people, and at the federal level, each government department has "innovative and inspirational" events planned, such as a 24-hour playwriting contest, a virtual time capsule, the planting of the Millennium tree and a coast to coast concert on New Year's Eve 1999.

Ottawa will set up a temporary Millennium Bureau to coordinate events and has launched a Web site that includes a clock counting down the seconds until the year 2000.

"Today, I'd like to extend an invitation to Canadians everywhere. In thousands of Canadian communities, let's find thousands of opportunities to take stock of our past and look ahead to our future, to preserve and enjoy our natural heritage, to honor the generous traditions of Canada's diversity and to make a lasting difference in our own lives as well as the lives of others."

Despite the pomp and circumstance of the occasion, Gray naturally couldn't resist a few examples of his well-known dry sense of humor. He explained that since his appointment as the man for the millennium, he has constantly been asked whether Canada will have "just one big party" like the Centennial celebrations in 1967.

Quipped Gray: "I don't know why people are always asking me about parties. I think my colleagues will agree that I don't really have a reputation, at least as yet, as a party animal.

"And I don't think I've yet become Canada's equivalent to Martha Stewart."

When the Stewart line only garnered mild laughter from the crowd of politicians, diplomats and schoolkids, Gray was undeterred. "See, I told my staff people wouldn't get that one," he quipped.

Well seriously folks.

Researcher proposes study of Israel's coal-fuel pollution

By MELANIE COLLISON
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Israel's air has become polluted from industrial activity, particularly since the Iranian revolution in the early 1980s, when coal began to replace oil as a source of energy.

A prominent Calgary scientist has become concerned about this problem and believes that the local Jewish community can play a role in its solution.

Dr. Fari Goodarzi, principal research scientist and team leader in environmental studies in the Federal Department of Natural Resources, said a valuable first step in cleaning up the pollution is measuring its effects. To that end, together with Israeli partners, he is raising funds to conduct a research study on the impact of coal-burning industry on air quality.

The benefits would be fourfold: A large number of young Israelis would gain scientific training, the health of the population would be improved, industry would be helped and Canada's reputation would be enhanced in Israel, Goodarzi said in a recent interview at the Institute of Sedimentary and Petroleum Geology-Geological Survey of Canada, located at the university research park.

Goodarzi became aware of the environmental impact of Israeli industry when he was lecturing on the environmental aspects of fossil fuel at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, in Beersheva. He was there at the invitation of Prof. Shimon Feinstein, who has visited Calgary over the past decade to participate in a research program on hydrocarbon occurrence in the Western Canadian Sedimentary Basin. Canada and Israel have a memorandum of understanding for scientific exchanges.

University-based scientists and officials from industry and government who sat in on Goodarzi's lectures realized that there may be some environmental impact from industrial activity in Israel.

Goodarzi and Feinstein visited various plants formally and informally – a pilot project for burning oil shale, a coal-fired power plant and coal supply depot, and decided they wanted to do a formal study.

"Israel doesn't have any coal. It has actually very little source of energy except for some oil shale. So they buy all their coal from Colombia or South Africa and other countries through the Coal Supply Corporation," Goodarzi said. "Coal is a very secure source of energy for Israel because it is abundant worldwide and many countries are willing to sell it to them.

"The Coal Supply Corporation provides the coal to the electrical utility for the generation of electricity."

However, the coal imported for Israel's power plants may not be as clean as that used in power plants in Alberta.

Furthermore, the burning of coal may harm the environment by the emission of elements and particulate matter. This is an unknown factor that needs to be addressed in Israel.

"To be environmentally concerned, a country needs to be prosperous and educated," Goodarzi said.

That's where he believes Canada can be of help.

Along with Israeli industry and government officials, Feinstein has been looking into the possibility of conducting an environmental study. Industry is willing to provide some funding.

"If we can initiate the program, then Israelis will support it," Goodarzi said.

"What we want to do is work with organizations such as the electrical utilities board, to determine the environmental impact of burning [coal, oil shale and oil]. This study includes the amount and nature of [various] elements in the coal and coal ash."

Some elements dispersed by the burning coal are positive, such as boron, which helps vegetation grow. In addition, valuable elements such as germanium become concentrated in coal ash and can be extracted and used by the metallurgical industry.

The study would measure the amounts of elements released into the atmosphere by industrial activities such as coal-burning, and how much impact that would have on the land.

"The particles we breathe are micron-sized. Depending on the nature and size of the particles, human beings may encounter some health hazards. This important point will also be addressed in the proposed research program."

Cost estimates are based on similar work in Canada, but not-yet-known variables bring into question the initial estimate of $300,000 per source of pollution.

Goodarzi expects to take four or five years to study up to a dozen sites. "We're hoping to start in 1998," he said. "We can start on a small scale."

The mechanism for measuring emissions is amazingly simple. Goodarzi starts with clean local moss placed in a one-foot by two-foot mesh envelope six feet above the ground. The moss absorbs the same pollutants as the plants on the ground, but because the moss filter is a clean, known substance, the changes it goes through can be measured over time.

"We can study the size of particles and see what elements they contain; we know the length of time, how much material we use and the surface area; so we can calculate the impact."

Goodarzi also wants to study the groundwater around oil shale deposits to see whether it is safe to drink, because organic matter in water can affect human health. "We may need a medical team to tell us what's going on," he said.

"The important thing is to get people from the electrical board and coal supply company and the environmental department to work with us."

Those salaries would therefore be covered, rather than adding to the cost of the study.

In trying to raise funds for this research project, Goodarzi has spoken to various representatives and individuals within the Jewish community.

Religion a force for unity: panel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Religion can be a force for unity and love, according to a recent interdenominational panel.

The discussion – Judaism and Christianity in the Year 2000 and Beyond: Is Religious Tolerance Possible? – was co-sponsored by Congregation Shaarey Zedek, which hosted the event, and the New Leadership Division, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

The panelists included Holocaust survivor Philip Weiss; the Shaarey Zedek's Rabbi Allan Meyerowitz; Father Sam Argenziano, the parish priest of the Holy Rosary Church on River Avenue; and Rev. Karen Toole-Mitchell, a United Church minister best known for her columns on the religious page in the Saturday Winnipeg Free Press.

Weiss pointed out the direct connection between Christianity's long history of repression and persecution of Jews and Hitler's Final Solution. Until this century, Weiss said, Jews were encouraged to shun dialogue with Christians.

"I was once of the opinion that it was impossible to deal with Christians," he said, "but I have changed my position. We Holocaust survivors have a responsibility to make Christians aware of what tolerance is all about."

As a survivor, he noted, he has lived through an era of bigotry and hatred espoused by his Christian neighbors – but he also experienced examples of unselfish Christian love from complete strangers. He condemned the official Christian leadership for remaining silent and passively acquiescing in the face of the Holocaust, although he noted that some brave individuals did speak out.

"Christian-Jewish relations must be based on the freedom to believe what you will as long as it doesn't adversely affect anyone else," he said. "It is immoral to sacrifice the happiness of others for your religious convictions. It is the height of insolence to expect others to share your religious beliefs. Spiritual blindness cannot lead to blessings."

Rabbi Meyerowitz spoke mainly of love. "All the major religions are religions of love," he said.

"People ask where was God during the Holocaust," he said. "I ask where was man? How was Hitler allowed to destroy the Christian god of love? The Holocaust was a horrible event, but the power of love did eventually win."

Father Argenziano interpreted dialogue as meaning "accepting and tolerating the other as real. You can't just give it lip service," he said. "You have to live tolerance and love every day."

Father Argenziano charged that until recently most Christians did not understand Christian scripture properly nor know who was speaking.

"People are shocked now when priests get up and put Jesus in the proper historical context," he said. "There was a whole body of non-knowledge, even some lies, that our people have grown up with. Prayer is the real teacher, not church law."

The second Vatican Council, which ended in 1963, changed the way the Church views Jews, he noted. Catholics were encouraged to get to know and learn to appreciate Jews through discussion and dialogue.

Rev. Toole-Mitchell knows what it is like to be in a minority. She grew up in Winnipeg's north end among Jews and other ethnic groups. She grew up with a bigoted father and an open-minded, kind-hearted mother, she said. She was attracted to the United Church, she added, because of its emphasis on justice.

She said she sees religion as a two-edged sword that can bring out the best and the worst in people. The word "discrimination," for example, she defined as meaning "to discern, to be distinct, to sift apart." While being distinct and separate has positive connotations, it can result in violence and extremism when it leads those who set themselves apart to view themselves as better than the others or "right"whereas others are "wrong."

"Jesus sent missionaries out to encourage people to seek God," she said, "not to seek followers for himself. Religion should be a powerful force for the unity of all people as creations of divine love."

NIGHT OF A LIFETIME LIGHTS UP TORONTO

Toronto's pride in Israel's accomplishments will be celebrated as never before next month with an unprecedented entertainment gala called Night Of A Lifetime.

The giant birthday party and multi-media extravaganza, sponsored by the 160 member Israel at 50 Consortium, under the auspices of the Consulate General of Israel and UJA Federation, will take place on Thursday, April 30 – Yom Ha'atzmaut, 7:30 p.m. at the National Trade Centre at Exhibition Place, Coliseum Arena. Tickets can be ordered by calling (416) 872-1212.

"The event is insprired by the unity and solidarity that all of us share," said Murray Koffler, who is co-charing The Night Of A Lifetime with his wife Marvelle. "It's a unique chance to reflect on how much our community's partnership with Israel has accomplished."

Producer Bob Benia, known for his successful Unique Lives and Experiences series, is in charge of the evening's five-star entertainment, which includes performances by Israeli singing sensation Yoel Sharabi, Toronto's leading cantors: Yaacov Motzen, Benjamin Maissner and Paul Kowarsky, as well as a forty piece orchestra conducted by Boris Brott.

Award winning actor Al Waxman will host the two-hour program, which also features cellist Ofra Harnoy and other musicians, dancers, and singers. A live satellite link to Israel's historic festivities, narrated by Academy Award winning actor Gregory Peck, will heighten the mood of celebration as thousands gather for this once-in-a-half century occasion.

"I am absolutely thrilled to be a part of this most spectacular event," said Benia, who recently ran a full-day of creative planning meetings and rehearsals at the Coliseum, along with hundreds of performers.

"The three tenors – Kowarsky, Maissner and Motzen – standing on the 40 x 50 foot stage was such a beautiful metaphor reflecting the unity of the Jewish people," Benia added. "The tremendous way in which this program is coming together is testament to the dedication and compassion of our Jewish community."

Countdown to Israel's 50th

Toronto's City Hall served as the backdrop for an historic raising of the Israeli flag last week, signaling the final countdown to Israel's 50th anniversary and community wide celebrations.

The crisp, clear March day provided just enough wind to keep the blue and white Star of David waving against the Nathan Phillips Square sky for all to see. Even the sun showed itself, although intermittently, above the crowd of community members, diplomats, local personalities and other dignitaries in attendance.

The flag raising, carried out, among others, by, Gordon Quitt, a veteran of the War of Independence, marked the official beginning of the 50 day countdown to The Night Of A Lifetime extravaganza celebration on April 30 – Israel's Independence Day.

Also in attendance at the March 12 ceremony were: Julia Koschitzky, Chair of local Israel at 50 celebrations, Jehudi Kinar, Consul General of Israel, Toronto Councillor Milton Berger, and Author Ben Wicks.

Grade 4 student Roanne Bossin was also on hand to read her award winning entry for the Junior UJA Fabulous 50 composition contest.

Walking into History

Participants at this year's UJA Federation Israel 50 Fun Walk and Israel at 50 Festival, Sunday, May 24, will be stepping into history.

Each year, UJA Federation's Walk for Israel draws thousands of community members, raising hundreds of thousands of dollars to help Jews in need. More than $150,000 was raised last year.

This is the first time UJA Federation has changed the traditional walk route and moved it away from the Bathurst Street corrider. Checkpoints, which used to be regularly stationed along the route until recent years, have also been reinstated.

Rain or shine, participants will begin their 7.5 km trek from Nathan Phillips Square with a musical send-off by Liberty Silver and the Original Stars Band. The stream of striders will then work its way westward along Dundas Street, through Kensington Market and old Jewish Toronto, south onto Strachan Avenue and all the way through the Princess Gates at the entrance to the CNE grounds.

In a few weeks, a corps of volunteers will spread out across the city targeting schools, youth groups, libraries and malls to raise awareness about the Walk.

"We expect this to be one of the largest events of the year," predicts Fran Grundman who is co-chairing the UJA Federation Israel 50 Fun Walk with Jeff Cohen and Corey Mandell.

"This is a very big year for our community," adds Grundman. " So it's only fitting that the Walk will be bigger and better than ever."

Royal Handshake

The Royal Bank of Canada recently held a reception honouring Israel's 50th anniversary at its downtown Toronto head office. Vancouver gets ready to celebrate Israel's 50th

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The chair of an umbrella group overseeing preparation of events here to mark Israel's 50th anniversary said the upcoming celebrations will be of lasting benefit to the Lower Mainland Jewish community.

Judy Mandleman, who chairs the British Columbia Lower Mainland Jewish Community Celebrating Israel at 50 committee, said that the group has already accomplished a great deal, although it has been in existence for only a few months.

The planning committee comprises representatives of more than 50 local Jewish organizations, including all synagogues and schools.

Mandleman who assumed her position in August of last year, has "sat on the board of virtually every communal organization at one time or another." Between 1993 and 1996, she was national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO.

It was after her stint as president that she was "bothered to learn that many of the Jewish newcomers to the Lower Mainland did not feel a strong sense of community. Hearing that took me by surprise. I was born and raised in Vancouver, and I have always felt a strong connection with the Jewish community."

Mandleman said that she hopes Israel's anniversary celebrations will help create a stronger sense of unity and community involvement.

One of the first events to mark the anniversary is the April 23 performance of the Israel Camerata Jerusalem Orchestra at the Chan Centre for the Performing Arts at the University of British Columbia.

"When Vancouver impresario Michael Noon, who isn't Jewish, found out 1998 was Israel's 50th anniversary, he decided to bring the orchestra to Vancouver. When our committee heard about his plans we were delighted. It was as if we had received a gift. We're helping to promote the concert, even though it isn't our event."

The committee is sponsoring a community fair May 3 at the Richmond Centre Mall, organized by Connie Permack. More than 25 Jewish organizations are participating and it will include stage performances, music and dancing.

The annual Walk with Israel which will follow its customary route through the Oak Corridor in Vancouver, beginning and ending at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, takes place May 24. The walk will be followed by an Israeli street fair at Beth Tikvah synagogue in Richmond.

The main event, coordinated by Beth Tikvah choir master Joan Cohen, takes place April 30 at the Orpheum Theatre. A Time To Rejoice is the story of Israel presented in music and dance by community choirs and dance groups.

Mandleman said that some 300 performers will assemble on the Orpheum stage for the grand finale of the evening, Ayn zo aggadah ("If you will it, it is no dream"), written by Broadway composer Andrew Lippa. Following the performance there will be a satellite link-up with celebrations in Jerusalem. Tickets are $8.00.

Granatstein named head of war museum

OTTAWA — Jack Granatstein, one of Canada's foremost military historians, has been named director of the troubled Canadian War Museum.

Granatstein, professor emeritus of history at York University, will become director and chief executive officer of the museum on July 1.

His appointment won praise from Adrienne Clarkson, chair of the Canadian Museum of Civilization Corp., and from the National Council of Veterans' Associations.

The 58-year-old professor and prolific author had served on an academic advisory committee to study the composition of a Holocaust museum in Ottawa, along with other prominent Canadian Jewish historians Irving Abella and Michael Marrus.

The Canadian War Museum was at the centre of a storm in recent months for considering the addition of a Holocaust gallery as part of its $12-million renovation and expansion.

Last month, the Canadian Museum of Civilization, which oversees and administers the war museum, announced it will drop plans for the Holocaust wing, favoring instead a separate venue dedicated to the Holocaust.

That pleased Jewish and veterans groups. Veterans had argued against the wing, saying the Holocaust was not part of the Canadian war experience. Jewish groups opposed a Holocaust gallery because they had not been properly consulted about it, and because they favored a freestanding Holocaust museum in Ottawa.

The Senate's subcommittee on veterans' affairs heard a week of emotional testimony from Jewish groups, veterans and museum officials. Its recommendations are still due.

Winnipeggers call for savings plan to aid disabled children

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Helen Steinkopf and Winnipeg Jewish community leader Harold Buchwald are leading a campaign to persuade the federal government to initiate a Registered Disabled Peoples' Savings Plan, much like the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan of the late 1970s and early 1980s.

"Children with Down Syndrome, for example, often live with their parents until they grow up," Buchwald explains. "When they become adults, they are generally not able to live on their own financially.

"Helen's idea is that the parents or grandparents of these children receive tax incentives to put money away until such time that the interest will be able to support these children in a home of their own or community home."

The widow of former Winnipeg Jewish community leader Maitland Steinkopf, Helen Steinkopf – who has a child with Down Syndrome – and Buchwald, began working on this campaign two years ago. Last year, they presented their plan to the National Council of Disabled Persons.

Now they are taking it nationwide urging Canadians who support the proposal to write their Members of Parliament.

Awaiting constitutional decision from Court

The CJN recently discussed the case with four constitutional law experts and scholars. In general, these scholars, from four different regions of the country, agreed with the objective underlying the federal government's reference to the court, but expressed mixed reviews of the manner in which it presented its case.

Prof. Bruce Elman of the Faculty of Law at the University of Alberta in Edmonton welcomed the court challenge as "an important step to determining what the rules of potential secession are.

"We've become so focused on the issue of whether Quebec will leave, that we haven't given enough thought to the mechanism by which it could leave."

Unlike some observers, Elman does not believe the case will play into the hands of separatists.

"If confronted [by a unilateral declaration by Quebec], we know where we would stand."

He concedes the move is "very high risk and political, but so are court decisions on other matters, like abortion and capital punishment."

Prof. Brian Schwartz teaches constitutional law at the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg. He is also a staple of Winnipeg's open-line radio shows, who believes Quebec has no right to secede unilaterally – under either Canadian or international law – echoing the positions argued by Yves Fortier, counsel on behalf of the federal government before the Supreme Court.

In his most recent book, Last Best Hope: Quebec Secession and Lincoln's Lessons for Canada, Schwartz compares Canada's current situation with the situation preceding the U.S. Civil War. He concludes that Quebec independence would have to be negotiated within the current constitutional framework, meaning an independent Quebec would have to guarantee minority and other rights.

The author told The CJN that any attempt by Quebec to pull out of Confederation by itself would be "unjust, unprincipled and arrogant," and a "breach of the rule of law."

Schwartz was emphatic, saying that Quebec's unilateral withdrawal would be "anti-democratic" and would carry "real potential for chaos and violence" because it would "write off" millions of loyal Canadians inside Quebec, including the overwhelming majority of Jews.

He dismisses the argument that the court should not be considering what many say is a political issue.

"How you break up a country is not purely political. It's a question of fundamental legal points. To suggest otherwise is reckless."

In the meantime, Schwartz suggests in his book that there should be a drive to establish a renewed, "visible [federalism] that convinces Quebecers that the federal system is superior and can protect minority rights."

Prof. Joseph Magnet, of the faculty of law at the University of Ottawa provided an analogy to help understand some of the feelings in Quebec. He told The CJN the issue "is easier to understand in Jewish terms.

"If Israel's Jewish character was threatened, different arrangements would have to be made. This is the feeling in the hearts and minds of French Quebecers."

Whatever the outcome of the legal reference, Magnet does not believe the Supreme Court's ruling will settle the question once and for all. He called it a "fight to the finish."

Magnet, who advises the government on constitutional matters, said he views the case as a strategic move by Ottawa to give it some manoeuvering room.

Despite his belief that minorities – especially Jews – should try to look at things from a French Quebecer's point of view, Magnet feels that Ottawa's "constant tinkering" with constitutional matters over the past 30 years has created "insatiable demands" by Quebec.

According to Prof. Irwin Cotler of McGill University, the federal government's arguments before the court were too narrow.

By asking the court to avoid dealing both with aboriginal rights and with how a unilateral declaration of independence would affect the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Cotler said Ottawa actually undercut its own case.

"The Charter is fundamental to this case," said Cotler, a former president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

When the federal government's lawyer asked the court to keep in mind, but not rule on, aboriginal rights, Chief Justice Antonio Lamer shot back: "You say we should have it in our mind, but not talk about it."

To Cotler, that hurt the force of the federal government's argument, as did Ottawa's reluctance to address the impact unilateral secession would have on Canadian citizens in Quebec.

Ottawa's case "was not fully and adequately argued. They had a better case than the one they presented," Cotler said.

He said Ottawa's position was "redeemed" by written arguments submitted later, by wider arguments presented by the provinces and territories, and by questions posed by the nine justices.

A ruling by the Supreme Court is not expected for many months.

Galganov slammed for remarks on Bouchard

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Radio broadcaster and anti-separatist activist Howard Galganov's campaign against Premier Lucien Bouchard's being a guest speaker at a Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region (CIC-Q), dinner celebrating the 50th anniversary of Israel reached a level of rhetorical excess last week that prompted four major Jewish organizations, as well as the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC), to issue statements deploring his remarks.

Galganov, who has a show on station CIQC weekday mornings, has been hammering away against the organizers of the May 4 parliamentary dinner for inviting Bouchard, not so much because he is a separatist, but because of his "ethnocentric nationalism," which Galganov feels has made all those in Quebec who are not of old French stock unequal citizens.

But Galganov went too far, in the opinion of FEDERATION CJA, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), the Communauté Sépharade du Québec (CSQ) and the MHMC, in an editorial that gave the strong impression he was comparing the Parti Québécois (PQ) government to the Nazis.

Attacks are unwarranted

In a joint statement, the groups said: "The main crux of Mr. Galganov's editorial is to draw parallels between the behavior of Premier Bouchard and of the government of Quebec and that of the Nazis. In that, he is tragically wrong and his vicious attacks are completely unwarranted.

"While Mr. Galganov is entitled to his political opinion, including criticizing the official organizations of the Jewish community, we denounce his gross and defamatory exaggerations that demean and trivialize the memory of the Holocaust."

A few days later, B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) issued its own statement that such comparisons "make the Holocaust banal" and wrong the survivors who were its witness.

The federation, CJC-Q, CSQ and BBC are represented on the CIC-Q.

In the editorial, which was aired at least twice, Galganov argues that Israel was created because of the Holocaust and that the Holocaust was the worst expression of "ethnocentric nationalism" ever and the ultimate act of the hatred Jews had suffered for centuries, therefore Bouchard, "as the leader of Quebec's most culturally divisive and ethnocentric party," is an inappropriate guest speaker.

Galganov said he may protest the dinner, to be held at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, by standing outside in the striped uniform worn by inmates of concentration camps.

Galganov said he has been inundated with people supporting his position, suggesting the "elites" behind the dinner are out of touch with the grassroots. (The Equality party criticized the CIC-Q's choice as well, although on the grounds that a leader with "a record of division and animosity" is not a fitting choice at a celebration of a "mature democracy" like Israel.)

Galganov also objects to the community's holding a parliamentary dinner in Quebec because it suggests the province has the status of a country. If Bouchard had simply been invited to the community-wide 50th anniversary celebration April 30 at the Palais des Congrès to give greetings, he said he would not be so angry.

CIC parliamentary dinners in honor of Israel's anniversary are being held only in Montreal and Ottawa (where the annual dinner is planned for November), said CIC national executive director Rob Ritter.

All Quebec MNAs and MPs, as well as some other prominent Quebecers, are invited as guests of the CIC-Q to the Montreal dinner, said CIC Quebec director Philippe Elharrar. Anyone else can attend by buying a $175 ticket.

Evening celebrates Israel

Israeli ambassador to Washington, Eliahu Ben-Elissar, is the other main guest speaker for the occasion. Remarks will also be delivered by Quebec Liberal leader Daniel Johnson (who has announced his retirement from politics), CIC-Q chair Thomas Hecht told The Canadian Jewish News.

He said the evening will underscore Israel's many achievements since its founding.

The evening will also pay tribute to the economic and cultural ties between Quebec and the Jewish state. As a symbol of those ties, the l'Orchestre symphonique de la Montérégie, which is co-sponsoring the dinner, will perform a selection of Israeli compositions accompanied by an Israeli violinist currently studying at New York's famed Juilliard School.

Other guests will include Israeli ambassador to Canada, David Sultan, Israeli consul general to Eastern Canada, Daniel Gal, and Quebec international affairs minister Sylvain Simard.

Hecht said among those serving on the committee organizing the gala dinner is Jean-Claude Scraire, chair of the Caisse de Dépôt et Placement du Québec, to which Hecht was appointed one year ago.

Elharrar pointed out all the member organizations of the CIC-Q approved Bouchard's being a speaker at the dinner. "Mr. Bouchard is the democratically elected representative of Quebec. That's the reality. It's only normal he would be invited to represent Quebec," he said, noting that Bouchard has "always been supportive of the State of Israel." He recalled, as an example, a speech Bouchard, then a Conservative cabinet minister, made in the House of Commons during the 1991 Gulf War.

CJC-Q chair Reisa Teitelbaum said she realizes many in the community are not pleased with having Bouchard as a guest speaker, but a distinction, she believes, must be made between political disagreement with a government and recognition of the office of premier.

There is also nothing questionable in the CIC's holding a parliamentary dinner in Quebec, she said. Just as CJC meets with both federal and provincial governments, so does the CIC have a mandate to conduct Israel advocacy at the provincial level, she said.

BBC regional director Robert Libman thinks that any juxtaposition of the PQ and the Nazis is "crazy and shows an ignorance of history." However, he does believe the CIC-Q made a "mistake" and showed "a lack of political smarts" in making Bouchard "the focal point" of a dinner, given what a sensitive subject he and his government are among many Jews.

Winnipeg BBYO to hold reunion

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The resurgence of B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) in Winnipeg is one more sign that Winnipeg's Jewish community – once in decline – may have turned the corner.

Membership in the six chapters in the city has increased to 230 this year, the highest number in five years, says Brian Katz, chair of the adult advisory board.

"We try to keep program costs at a reasonable level so that no Jewish teen is prevented from participating for financial reasons," Katz says.

"In the past, we have done some small scale fundraising to help offset costs. Because our membership has grown so much however, we are finding that small fundraising projects will no longer do."

As a result, Red River Region BBYO is planning its first ever major fundraising event – an alumni reunion on April 17 – at which the organization will be honoring longtime supporters Earl and Cheryl Barish.

Hollywood producer and ex-Winnipegger Allan Blye will be the Master of Ceremonies, and special guest will be Sam Fischer, head of BBYO International.

"Earl and Cheryl and their families have been quiet and generous supporters of B'nai Brith and BBYO for a long time," says Katz, who was a member of the first AZA chapter in Canada.

The pair helped found the Yachad Couples Unit of B'nai Brith in Winnipeg, Katz says, and "they epitomize philanthropy."

Reunion organizers hope to see as many as 500 former members come out for an evening of reminiscing and renewing old friendships. Katz says that the initial response was good.

"We hope to start an endowment fund from the evening to generate scholarships for teens and subsidies for leadership training," Katz says.

"BBYO is a community service and cultural organization and a training ground for the next generation of community leaders," he says.

McGill Jewish studies program receives $2 million in donations

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish studies department of McGill University has been in decline for some years, but this will be reversed with a $2-million donation from two families, the largest single gift to the department in its 30-year history.

The donations were made by two prominent philanthropic Jewish families. The Jack Cummings Memorial Endowment for Jewish Studies and the Leanor and Alvin Segal Endowment for Jewish Studies, each worth $1 million, were recently established by Norma Cummings, the widow of Jack, and their children Steven Cummings and Nancy Cummings Gold, and Leanor and Alvin Segal, CEO of Peerless Clothing Inc.

Department chair Eugene Orenstein said the money "could not have come at a better time." Recent budget cuts, necessitated by shrinking government grants, have reduced the department's full-time teaching staff from eight to five, and that became effectively four when professor Barry Levy was appointed dean of the religious studies faculty. Courses have been dropped and the Jewish teacher training program, unique in Canada, has been in peril for a couple of years.

There has been concern that Jewish studies could remain a department, the only one of its kind at a Canadian university, and not be subsumed by religious studies.

At the same time, student interest in Jewish studies continued to grow and the department has had difficulty keeping up with demand. This year, the department has over 300 students, from introductory to graduate levels, including many who come from other disciplines.

"We find ourselves in a weakened condition compared to the flourishing mid-1970s. As a small department, we have been particularly affected by the drastic budgets cuts taking place across the board at the university," he said.

Orenstein said it is hoped the funds will enable the hiring in the short-term of a full-time professor of Yiddish literature, and possibly a couple of others later on in other subjects, perhaps in modern Jewish studies. "We can't be exact now because we are still negotiating how the funds generated will be distributed."

He noted that the department was created largely through the work of Ruth Wisse, a Yiddish literature professor, but since she left for Harvard in 1993, the department has had only one "junior scholar" in that subject, who left after two years and could not be replaced.

"We trust that these gifts will make it possible to restore the centrality of Yiddish literature and language within the department," he said. He is confident the teacher training program will be strengthened, especially with renewed interest from the Jewish Education Council and assistance from the education faculty.

One of the "dreams" of the department is to add a teacher of Judeo-Arab studies, he said. Among the courses now available are Hebrew, Jewish history, Bible, Holocaust studies, rabbinics and Jewish thought.

The endowments will also enable the creation of more scholarships and fellowships, especially at the graduate level, and "make our presence stronger in the Jewish community."

The department is planning a conference on recent developments in Jewish studies, open to the public, in May, as well as a lecture series in the fall.

Orenstein hailed the donations from the Cummings and Segals as a strengthening of a link between the department and the community that had "not been severed, but had weakened" since the department's beginning when the community had taken an active interest in the launch of Jewish studies.

Both Leanor Segal and Steven Cummings said they hoped their donations would spur others in the community to also help revitalize the department.

Cummings recalled that his late father, who died in December 1995, had a deep interest in the Jewish people and in scholarship. He was also a McGill graduate at a time when the university had a quota on Jewish students.

"The Jewish studies department, one of only a handful in existence, is a tangible of how the university has changed. Dad needed to do 10 percent better to attend McGill. Thankfully, those days are over."

McGill chancellor Gretta Chambers said their generosity "reflects confidence in McGill University as a great centre of learning. Moreover, these dramatic gifts constitute a powerful testimony to the viability of the Jewish community in Montreal."

The message from principal Bernard Shapiro was that the donations will go a long way to make McGill "a world centre in Jewish studies" and "ensure that generations of students interested in the humanities can learn about Jewish culture and civilization."

Netanyahu appeals for calm in Hebron

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Tensions are once again escalating in the West Bank town of Hebron.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu this week called on Hebron's settler community to "abide by the law" after settlers there claimed responsibility for smashing the windows of Arab-owned cars in the volatile West Bank town.

This incident came after two days of violence between Hebron's Jewish and Arab populations that was sparked by the shooting deaths last week of three Palestinian workers at an Israeli checkpoint in the West Bank.

Palestinians protested the shootings during a series of violent confrontations with Israeli troops across the West Bank in recent days, with the latest clash reported last Sunday near Ramallah.

Scores of Palestinians and several Israeli soldiers were wounded in the clashes following the March 10 shootings at the military roadblock.

Meanwhile, Israeli forces beefed up security in urban centres and on the highways after two weekend bomb blasts that police blamed on Arab terrorists.

A 53-year-old Israeli man lost his hands and was blinded in one eye when a suspicious-looking package he was inspecting blew up in a park near Afula's central bus station.

Five Palestinians were lightly wounded by a bomb blast in eastern Jerusalem, which Palestinian officials said was the work of Jewish settlers.

In the incident that set off all the violent demonstrations, Israeli soldiers manning the roadblock opened fire on the van after it veered toward them, causing light injuries to one soldier.

The troops later said they believed the van's driver was deliberately trying to run them over.

This was denied by Palestinian officials and by a passenger in the van, who said the driver had speeded up in an attempt to bypass a line of waiting cars at the roadblock.

Senior Israeli army officials later admitted this was probably true.

The unrest that ensued throughout the West Bank reached its highest peak in Hebron.

The windshields of more than 20 Palestinian-owned cars were smashed by a group calling itself the Committee for the Defence of the Roads.

On March 13, a group of Jewish settlers entered the Palestinian-ruled part of Hebron and began throwing rocks at buildings and cars. Settlers said they were protesting what they described as the army's failure to protect them from Palestinians who were firing into the town's Jewish enclaves.

The demonstration by the settlers touched off Palestinian protests. Israeli troops fired rubber bullets to disperse the crowds, wounding at least 14 Palestinians, including eight journalists.

Police summoned 15 Jewish settlers in connection with last week's demonstration.

Mastermind of Lebanon war offers plan to withdraw troops

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The man who led Israel's 1982 invasion into Lebanon has called for a phased Israeli troop withdrawal from southern Lebanon.

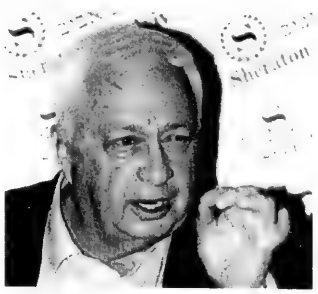
Interviewed on Israel's Channel Two Television, Israel's national infrastructure minister, Ariel Sharon, proposed that Israel withdraw from southern Lebanon in phases and hold Lebanon responsible for security in the area. Under his plan, Israel would monitor the situation during the withdrawal and would retaliate if any attacks are launched on Israel from the zone.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai has submitted a competing proposal, backed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, under which Israel would carry out a one-time withdrawal linked to Lebanese and international guarantees that there would be no cross-border attacks launched on northern Israel.

The Israeli daily Ma'ariv cited senior sources in the government as expressing concern that Sharon's proposal would undermine those efforts.

In the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, analyst Ze'ev Schiff wrote that Sharon's proposal could have two political objectives: to separate discussion of southern Lebanon and the Golan Heights before public pressure builds; and to undermine Mordechai's proposal, which could involve the participation of the United States and the United Nations.

Both Syria and Lebanon, saying any Israeli withdrawal must be unconditional, have rejected Mordechai's proposal.



Ariel Sharon

Israeli security officials have said it is unlikely that Israel could reach any kind of agreement with Lebanon without Syria's involvement. The French, from whom Israel has sought assistance in advancing the initiative, are believed to be unlikely to help move things forward without Syrian inclusion.

Meanwhile, the secretary-general of the United Nations is denying reports that he has a plan for an Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon.

Speaking in New York, Kofi Annan was quoted as saying that there already is a mediator for the Middle East – the United States.

His remarks followed an Israeli media report that Annan was planning to bring with him a proposal for resolving the dispute over southern Lebanon when he visits the region later this week.

Two presumed dead as chopper crashes

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In a dramatic and tragic training accident, an IAF Cobra attack helicopter broke apart and plummeted into the sea off the coast Sunday with its two-man crew.

A pilot in a second helicopter jumped into the sea to try to rescue the crew, but the two, including an IAF brigadier-general, remained missing and were presumed dead late Sunday night.

OC Air Force Maj.-Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliyahu grounded the IAF's entire fleet of Cobra helicopters as experts tried to figure out why the U.S.-made attack chopper suddenly snapped in two. He also organized an internal inquiry into the accident, the second fatal IAF training incident in two weeks.

The missing airmen were identified as Brig.-Gen. Shmuel Eldar, 45, of Kibbutz Palmahim and commander of the IAF base at Palmahim, and Lt. Ilan Gur, 20, of Kibbutz Malkiya.

Eldar, a 25-year-veteran helicopter pilot, would be the most senior IAF pilot ever killed in training or in an operation.

Navy and Air Force crews swept the site of the crash for their bodies, and Ben-Eliyahu said the effort would continue until they are found.

The incident occurred Sunday morning. A pair of Cobras had set out for what was described as a "routine and simple" exercise off the coast of Netanya.

On their way back to base, Eldar reported vibrations in the tail of his Cobra as they descended from 1,070 metres to 250 metres.

"Eldar radioed that he was in control of the helicopter and planned to made an emergency landing," said a visibly shaken Ben-Eliyahu at a news conference at IAF headquarters.

Capt. Benny, commander of the second Cobra, said Eldar radioed to him that he was positive he could land the Cobra despite the vibrations.

"Suddenly he spun severely toward the sea and the tail split off. The pieces hit the main rotor and it started to disintegrate and the body fell into the sea," said Benny, a reserve pilot. "I couldn't believe it was happening. I still don't believe it."

The inquiry is to be headed by a top IAF veteran, said Ben-Eliyahu.

There is an audio tape and partial video tape of what happened. But the inquiry must figure out why it happened.

Ben-Eliyahu was confident that the reason for the unprecedented malfunction would be found. He said the IAF was in contact with the manufacturers of the Cobra.

"We will try with the pilots, the flight crews, the technicians, the commanders to return as soon as possible to safe operational activity," Ben-Eliyahu said. "As painful as it is, we are determined to keep on alert to protect the skies of Israel and its soldiers and its residents."

Ben-Eliyahu defended the practice of senior IAF pilots participating in training exercises, saying it was a "code of behavior" to be honored.

He said that experienced pilots, even if they were base commanders like Eldar, are expected to help train younger pilots.

Asked if there was a chance that Eldar's Cobra could have been sabotaged, Ben-Eliyahu said the inquiry would examine all possibilities.

Halevy confirmed Mossad head

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The government last week approved Ephraim Halevy as the Mossad's new director and let Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu decide when the appointment will go into effect.

Halevy has been serving for the past two years as Israel's envoy to the European Union (EU). Based in Brussels, he dealt with bilateral economic relations and coordinated the EU's Middle East peace initiative in conjunction with its special emissary, Spain's Miguel Moratinos.

According to official sources, it will take "several weeks" until Halevy completes the transition from Brussels to Mossad headquarters. He will be joined there by his newly appointed deputy, Maj.-Gen. Amiram Levine.

Foreign Ministry spokesperson Aviv Shir-On, meanwhile, declined to comment about a report published in London's Sunday Times that said three Mossad agents were caught by Scotland Yard attempting to bug the home of a prominent Muslim activist in London.

"We do not react to everything that appears in the news media," Shir-On said.

Netanyahu's communications director David Bar-Ilan called the report "baseless and a total fabrication."

According to the report, the agents were forced to abort the mission after arousing suspicion and fled to Israel the same day.

A senior Mossad source told the Sunday Times the operation was part of an attempt to monitor the activities of Islamic terrorist organizations in seven European cities last month.

It was mounted at short notice in the run-up to what Israel expected to be a new Gulf war as American and British forces prepared to attack Iraq. The Israelis believed the deaths of civilians in Iraq would provoke reprisals by Islamic groups in Europe.

According to the report, the failure of the operation came a few days before the arrests of four Mossad agents near Bern, the Swiss capital, as they prepared to install a listening device at the home of Abdullah Zein, a Shiite Muslim from southern Lebanon.

They were members of the same unit as those in London.

The report, quoting intelligence sources, said that Muslim activists in Paris, Rome, Athens, Madrid and Geneva were targeted for bugging as well as those in London and Bern.

Most of the other missions were successful, and the Mossad's London target is understood to have remained unaware of the agents' attempt to eavesdrop on his conversations.

A Downing Street spokesperson told the Sunday Times it had no knowledge of the Mossad operation. Scotland Yard said there was no record of anyone having been detained or deported on suspicion of planting bugs or any kind of espionage last month.

Falash Mura families arrive in Jerusalem

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — After waiting as long as seven years for their chance, some 200 Falash Mura families realized a lifelong dream last Sunday night, when they arrived in Jerusalem.

"This is a holiday for us," said Moshe Bahta, the director of the United Ethiopian Jewish Association, just prior to their arrival.

"We want to thank the Jerusalem Municipality for accepting these immigrants. I'm very happy they were convinced and are absorbing them."

The newcomers' arrival at the capital's Givat Hamatos caravan site near Gilo marked another step in the government's program launched last summer to bring 3,000 of the Falash Mura who had been living in a transit camp in Addis Ababa to Israel within a year.

While some 1,500 have already arrived, most of whom are at the Hatzrat Yassaf camp near Acre, the Absorption Ministry had a tough time convincing local authorities to accept the others.

Sunday night at Givat Hamatos, Absorption Minister Yuli Edelstein told Channel 1 that many communities across the Green Line are ready and willing to accept such newcomers if more established communities within the Green Line are not prepared to do so.

Edelstein was reacting to a Channel 1 report that many of the Falash Mura would ultimately be absorbed in the territories.

Absorption Ministry spokesperson Yehuda Glick said the combination of the Jerusalem Municipality's goodwill and the $1.5 million the ministry is investing in the site led to the reopening for the Falash Mura of the Givat Hamatos camp, which had been virtually closed down.

"Jerusalem is a big city, with expanded social services, and we felt that if the Absorption Ministry asked us to absorb 200 families, from a moral standpoint we could not refuse," said Jerusalem City Manager Ra'anan Dinur.

"This is the kind of request by a government body that a city like Jerusalem can carry out the best possible way, without it causing the same social problems it might cause in other smaller local authorities."

The city had been promised that the housing solutions offered to the young families coming to Givat Hamatos would be in Jerusalem, Dinur added.

"If, in the end, we gain another 200 Ethiopian families living in Jerusalem, that will be great," he said.

The Knesset Immigration and Absorption Committee is scheduled to visit the site next Sunday.

Glick said the arrival of the Falash Mura in Jerusalem was part of "an overall, new approach to the whole story," whereby instead of housing all the Falash Mura in one caravan site, they would be split up into three groups "according to their needs."

Young people will be going to the Naharayim absorption centre, where they will study in an ulpan and receive professional training. Families with small children will be coming to the capital, with the children studying in the cities' schools.

JERUSALEM, March 11 – The American Consulate here today launched an investigation into an explosion which partially wrecked the Jewish Agency building, killed 10 persons and wounded 90 others. Witnesses established that the explosives were brought into the Agency courtyard by a car flying the American flag and probably driven by the regular Arab chauffeur employed by the consulate.

U.S. court orders Iran to pay $247.5 million to family

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — As he stood in a federal courtroom here, listening to a judge issue a landmark ruling, Stephen Flatow's thoughts turned to his daughter's smiling face.

"Alisa had this very big smile on her face all the time, and she's smiling today," Flatow said last week, moments after U.S. District Court Judge Royce Lamberth ordered Iran to pay $247.5 million (US) in damages for its role in the 1995 terrorist bombing of an Israeli bus that claimed his daughter's life.

The decision marks the largest judgment against a foreign nation deemed responsible for a terrorist act and the first of its kind involving a state sponsor of terrorism in the Middle East.

Iran condemned the judge's move as "irresponsible in the extreme" and "politically motivated."

The ruling, which comes at a time of warming relations between the United States and Iran, is expected to pave the way for similar legal action by other families of American citizens killed in terrorist attacks abroad.

Alisa Flatow, a 20-year-old Brandeis University student from West Orange, N.J., was attending a Jerusalem yeshivah when she and seven Israeli soldiers were killed by a suicide bomber who drove a van into their bus in the Gaza Strip in April 1995.

Flatow was traveling through Gaza to a Jewish settlement for Passover when the bus was attacked. Left with shrapnel in her brain, she lapsed into a coma from which she never awoke.

At a hearing earlier this month, the Flatow family argued that the Islamic Jihad – the Palestinian extremist group that claimed responsibility for the attack – received financing from the Iranian government, and therefore Tehran bore responsibility for her death.

Lamberth agreed, saying he concluded from expert testimony that Iran had appropriated about $75 million to terrorist activities in support of the Palestinians in 1995.

He said Iran was "brazen" enough to carry a line item in its budget pertaining to sponsorship of terrorist activities.

"This is a tragic case, but you've made something of it," Lamberth told the Flatow family upon awarding them $225 million in punitive damages and $22.5 million in compensatory damages.

He added that he hoped the ruling "is not an occasion for further terrorist action" – a fear that the Islamic Jihad quickly sought to prey on when it called on its members to attack Israeli soldiers and settlers in response to the decision.

Iran, which denies connections to terrorist groups, did not defend itself in the case.

In a statement released by its UN mission after the verdict, the Iranian government said the allegations raised in the court's "hurried proceedings" were "without a shred of substantiation, have no basis in fact and fail any standard of evidence."

The United States has designated Iran as a state sponsor of terrorism since 1984.

In the courtroom, the decision brought gasps and a visible sense of relief to the Flatow family – Alisa's father, mother, a brother and two of her three sisters – and other spectators, including Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.) and Rep. Jim Saxton (R-N.J.).

Lautenberg said the decision ensures that "terrorist acts against American citizens will cause some pain back in the country that sponsors that kind of terrorism."

The case was brought under a 1996 anti-terrorism law, drafted by Lautenberg and Saxton with Flatow and other terror victims in mind, that allows U.S. citizens to file suit in U.S. courts against countries that have been designated sponsors of terrorism.

Whether the Flatow family will be successful in collecting the damages awarded them remains far from clear.

Steven Perles, a lawyer representing the Flatow family, said the money could come either from Iranian assets in the United States frozen after the 1979 Iranian revolution or from Iranian assets in other nations that recognize the jurisdiction of U.S. courts.

"We anticipate vigorously pursuing collection," Perles said, adding that Iran is a "wealthy country."

Whether or not such a course becomes available to the Flatows, some observers said the family's ability to collect may carry less importance than the symbolic value of such a large and forceful judgment.

Flatow, an Orthodox Jew who decided to donate his daughter's organs to needy Israelis, said he had never sought revenge, only justice.

In an interview after the judge's ruling, he recalled meeting in May of 1996 with President Bill Clinton, whom he said marveled at his bravery.

"Would you do anything for your daughter?" he remembers asking Clinton.

"Absolutely," Clinton said.

"Well, just because my daughter is not standing here with me doesn't mean we stop," Flatow said. "We still have a responsibility to our kids, even when they're not here physically."

Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Amnon Shahak, is absolutely right. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's latest offer to withdraw from southern Lebanon is dead in the water, doomed by Syria's condemnation of it.

Mideast Analysis

Israel, having signalled a readiness to abide by United Nations Security Council Resolution 425, has offered to relinquish its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon in exchange for assurances from the Lebanese government that no attacks will be launched from its territory. Israel has lost scores of soldiers there – 39 in 1997 and four so far this year – and is clearly feeling the burden.

Syria, the dominant foreign power in Lebanon, has dismissed Israel's proposal as a warmed-over version of its ill-fated 1996 Lebanon First initiative.

This is not quite true. The Lebanon First plan envisaged the signing of peace treaties with Lebanon and Syria. And while Israel's newest offer is somewhat similar, being predicated on the disarming of Hezbollah (a Syrian and Iranian surrogate) and the return of stability to its northern border, it is different in the sense that the emphasis is entirely on security arrangements.

That Netanyahu has apparently given up trying to reach full-blown peace accords with Syria and its submissive protectorate, Lebanon, is directly connected with his belated realization that he cannot drive a wedge between Damascus and Beirut.

What this means in practice is that no deal on southern Lebanon is realistically possible unless it is linked to an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights. Since Netanyahu is loathe to relinquish the Golan, considering it an indispensable strategic asset, he believes that a limited agreement with Lebanon may be attainable. This is where Resolution 425 comes in. For years, Israel let it gather dust. But in a volte face, proclaimed by Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai in January, Israel is now finally prepared to comply with Resolution 425, adopted by the UN on March 19, 1978, following Operation Litani, its first massive invasion of Lebanon.

Israel ready to implement UN Resolution 425

The resolution is composed of three parts. It supports the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon. It calls upon Israel to cease all operations and "withdraw forthwith" from Lebanon. It allows for the establishment of the United Nations Interim Force for Southern Lebanon. UNIFIL's mandate is to confirm the withdrawal of Israeli forces, restore peace and security and assist Lebanon in ensuring its authority in the area.

With the exception of the formation of UNIFIL, the resolution remains a dead letter. For 16 years, Lebanon was wracked by civil war, with the Lebanese government simply incapable of restoring order in the south. Filling the vacuum, Israel established a security zone in southern Lebanon, patrolled by its own soldiers and the South Lebanon Army, an Israeli surrogate force.

When the Lebanese civil war ended in 1991, Syria imposed its will on Lebanon, refusing to countenance any Lebanese agreements with Israel unless the Golan was also on the agenda. The same thing happened in 1983, when Syria compelled Lebanon to cancel a bilateral peace pact with Israel. Nothing has changed since then. Syria, which has never formally accepted Lebanon's independence, regards Lebanon as a virtual colony. And to this day, Syria flouts a provision in the 1989 Taif agreement obliging it to withdraw its expeditionary army from Lebanon.

Responding to Israel's Lebanese proposal, Syria has launched a counter-initiative turning on an unconditional Israeli pullout from Lebanon. Mindful of the UN's success in having defused the recent Iraqi crisis, Syria has pinned its hopes on a UN resolution demanding an Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon and the Golan.

Its chances of being adopted are extremely slim, as UN Secretary General Kofi Annan will discover when he visits Israel this week. Neither is a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon in the cards.

It urges Catholics to repent for past errors, but defends some German Church leaders during the war, saying they responded to Nazism by condemning racism.

Some other points the document makes are:

• While many Christians helped Jews during the Holocaust, "others did not." Many people during the war were "altogether unaware of the Final Solution."

• As Christianity's second millennium draws to a close, "the Church should become more fully conscious of the sinfulness of her children, recalling all those times in history when they departed from the spirit of Christ."

• "No one can remain indifferent to the horrible genocide" of the Holocaust.

• There is a distinction between the anti-Semitism of Nazi Germany and anti-Jewishness before the 20th century: "The Shoah was the work of a thoroughly modern, neo-pagan regime. Its anti-Semitism had its roots outside Christianity, and in pursuing its aims, it did not hesitate to oppose the Church and persecute her members also."

The document came just one day after Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger of Germany said in an interview on Italian television that indifference on the part of Christians helped to bring about the Holocaust.

"There has not been enough sensitivity [by Christians towards Jews] and this facilitated the crime," Cardinal Ratzinger said.

Rabbi James Rudin, inter-religious affairs director of the American Jewish Committee, said the document "is very strong. It's very much what we expected."

Rabbi Rudin, who was in Rome for the document's release, said the statement "represents the three Rs: remembrance, repentance and resolve... and it's a very strong denunciation of anti-Semitism."

Asked about the defence of Pope Pius, Rabbi Rudin said, "We are at a unique moment. I would call for a full exploration by Catholic and Jewish scholars of the wartime period."

Israeli computer hacker speaks out

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An Israeli teenager wanted by the FBI said he breaks into computer systems just for the fun of it.

The youth, who is known as the Analyzer, is wanted in connection with the recent break-in into the Pentagon's computer system. He also is wanted for his involvement in hacking into the computer systems of other educational and military institutions.

"I don't destroy anything in them. What is important to me is just the challenge of breaking into the system," he said in a face-to-face interview with the editor of an Israeli online magazine.

Gadi Shimshon, news editor at the Israeli Internet site Walla [http/www.walla.co.il] explained that a week ago, prior to Israeli media reports that the youth was suspected of involvement in the Pentagon break-in, he was electronically contacted by someone who arranged for the interview between himself and the 18-year-old hacker.

Shimshon said the Analyzer, who says he has retired from hacking, sent him some files that he claimed contained entry codes which he implanted into American military computers.

According to Shimshon, the two met face to face for an hour at a McDonald's restaurant near Tel Aviv.

Asked about his relationship with one of the California youths questioned by the FBI in connection with the Pentagon break-in, the Analyzer responded, "He was my student. I knew I was going to get out of this soon."

In his article, Shimshon wrote that the Analyzer said he had been hacking into computer systems for the past two years and claimed he could change the contents of more than 1,000 Internet sites.

The teenager also said that he and some friends set up an "Internet underground" that entered and made changes on a number of sites, including that of the Knesset.

He said they also updated the Internet page of Israel's president.

These comments came as Israeli media reported that computer hackers had broken into the Web sites of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife Sara, and set up links to pornographic sites on the Internet. The two sites were closed to remove the links after surprised Web surfers contacted the Prime Minister's Office.

Asked why he had decided to retire from hacking, the Analyzer said, "I got sick of it. I had offers from abroad to work on the other side, as someone in charge of security for all sorts of Internet servers. I also had a few offers in Israel."

The Israeli daily Yediot Achronot reported this week that one of the computers the Analyzer used to access the various institutions was at a school on Kibbutz Sde Boker in the Negev. The computer department at the school began looking into the matter when it noticed that someone was logging into its computer from central Israel.

Two Jews sue Swiss

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZURICH — Two Jewish men are bringing separate suits against Switzerland linked to the country's policy toward Jewish refugees during World War II.

Charles Sonabend, whose parents were murdered in Auschwitz after Swiss authorities deported them in 1942, is bringing his compensation claim before Switzerland's Supreme Court. The move comes after the Swiss Cabinet recently rejected his claim.

Sonabend, a 67-year-old resident of London, is seeking $68,000 in damages – the largest amount possible under Swiss regulations – under a new law that allows individuals to make liability claims against public officials.

The law leaves the decision to the Cabinet, but allows for an appeal to Switzerland's Supreme Court.

Sonabend was 11 years old when he and his parents entered Switzerland in 1942 from Belgium. Two days later, his parents were arrested and deported to Nazi-occupied France. They were then sent to Auschwitz.

His suit, which was first filed last year, focused renewed attention on the refugee policy of Switzerland, which expelled more than 30,000 Jews during the war. Most of these Jews died.

At the same time, however, Switzerland provided haven to some 25,000 Jewish refugees, who survived the war together with Switzerland's 20,000 Jewish citizens.

A second suit is being brought by a 71-year-old Jewish man now living in Australia.

Joseph Sprung is seeking compensation for having twice been turned away at the Swiss border.

The first time, according to Sprung, Swiss border guards sent him back to occupied France, but on the second occasion he and three others fleeing with him were handed directly over to the Germans.

In that second attempt to cross the Swiss border, Sprung and his companions had false papers to mask their religion.

But when they arrived in Switzerland, they showed their real papers, thinking they would get asylum more easily as Jews.

Handed over to the Germans, they produced their false papers to avoid detection as Jews. But German officials knew they were Jewish – because, Sprung charged, the Swiss border guards gave the Germans their real identity papers.

Sprung was dispatched to Auschwitz, where he managed to survive the war.

Latvian Nazi veterans gather

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW— Hundreds of Latvians who fought for Nazi Germany have gathered to commemorate the 55th anniversary of the founding of their unit.

Human rights groups and organizations representing Latvia's Russian minority had unsuccessfully tried to convince the Baltic nation's leadership to ban this week's commemorations – but the Jewish community was quiet.

One Jewish activist in Riga, who did not want to be identified, said in a telephone interview that the "Jewish community wanted to avoid open clashes" with ultra-nationalists and neo-Nazis.

The Latvian government said it would not participate in the events, but several high-ranking officials, including the commander-in-chief of the Latvian armed forces, said they would attend a rally that is part of the commemoration.

And Latvian's foreign minister, Valdis Birkavs, said, "Latvian residents are free to organize and participate in the events."

March 16, known in Latvia as Legion Day, is not a state holiday. But it is widely celebrated by veterans of the Nazi-allied unit to commemorate their fellow soldiers killed during World War II.

The Latvian SS Legion was formed in 1943 after a directive from Adolf Hitler.

For many Latvians, the Legion is considered heroic because its soldiers fought against the Soviet forces that over-ran the country at the beginning of the war. March 16 is marked as a commemoration day because it was on this date in 1943 the legion had its first major fight against the Red Army in western Russia.

During the Nazi occupation of the country from 1941 to 1944, most of Latvia's prewar Jewish community of 90,000 was exterminated. Experts say the scale of the tragedy might have been smaller if the local population had not helped with the killings.

Most experts say it is unlikely that the Latvian SS Legion participated in the genocide because by the time the unit was created in spring of 1943, the majority of Latvian Jews had been killed already.

But it is likely that many of those Latvians who joined the legion had already participated in killing Jews.

This spring, join the Mephisto movement

Once again, spring is coming. The days grow longer and warmer; green returns to the grass; and we spend more time outdoors. And when outdoors, we walk. For many reasons, walking is North America's most popular type of exercise.

Because it moves the whole body, walking is good for everything from muscle tone to heart rate. It doesn't entail hours in a gym; you do it evenings, weekends or at lunch. You enjoy your surroundings as you walk, and vary your pace at will, from a leisurely stroll to a brisk stride.

To enjoy walking, your feet must feel good; when they do, your whole body benefits. But the well-being of your feet depends on good footwear, to keep them warm, dry and comfortable, and stand up under serious use. And here's where Mephisto steps in.

Mephisto shoes, boots and sandals are hand crafted, using the latest scientific and practical knowledge. Made from durable natural materials like leather, rubber and cork, they shape themselves to your feet and gait. In every model, a latex foam midsole promotes tireless walking; and latex padding minimizes rubbing and pressure.

Mephisto designs footwear for every purpose. The styles and colors match any setting or activity, whether it's a day in the office, a shopping stroll, or hiking. And Mephisto walking shoes, walking sandals and trekking shoes are especially designed for the outdoors.

In Mephisto Mobils, a roomy collection of shoes and sandals, your feet breathe easily. Shock absorption and a stable heel base make even hard walking surfaces comfortable. You can replace shoe insoles with an orthopedic insole, or the cork Mobils-Reflex sole, with small nodules to massage vital nerves. The Nature Is Future collection features shoes that offer the lightweight comfort of sandals.

Mobils Basic sandals have a natural cork footbed, massage nodules, soft air midsole and biogrip outsole; and the Bio sandals have a removable anatomical footbed. The young, sporty Fitness sandals are ideal for leisure; the Outdoor sandals are built for hiking; and the Trampolins keep your feet happy on hard surfaces.

Mephisto's Golf shoes for men and women feature a special outsole which guarantees excellent flexibility without sacrificing lateral stability in the swing. Rigorously selected leathers and other natural materials ensure lasting shock absorption and total comfort. Many models have a GORE-TEX lining to keep your foot dry while allowing it to "breathe" at the same time.

While popular in their native France, Mephisto shoes find 85% of their market elsewhere. Celebrities, business people and professionals everywhere have discovered Mephisto. It's not just footwear: it's a movement.

Come see Mephisto's large selection at two Toronto boutiques: 50 Bloor West, Concourse level, (416) 966-2568, and 1177 Yonge at Summerhill, (416) 968-7026; and at the Mephisto "Shop in Shop" in Unionville, 182 Main St., (905) 940-0865. To inquire about any Mephisto product, call Ralph Benisty, Director of Operations for Canada, at (905) 881-0050.

Jews urged to become bone marrow donors

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — At two recent information sessions at Vancouver's Beth Israel Synagogue, members of British Columbia's Jewish community were encouraged to become members of the Unrelated Bone Marrow Donor Registry.

Bone marrow transplants are used to treat leukemia, Hodgkins and non-Hodgkins lymphoma, multiple myeloma, neuroblastoma, testes and breast cancer, and Ewings sarcoma.

"Finding a compatible match is like finding a needle in a haystack," said Jack Huberman, one of the speakers at the sessions. "The odds range from, at best, one in 20,000, to one in 750,000. The more people in the registry, the better the odds of finding a match."

According to British Columbia's Bruce Denniston Bone Marrow Society, which raises money for the Canadian Unrelated Bone Marrow Donor Registry, there were, as of December 1997, 182 active searches for donors for Canadian patients, 504 searches internationally.

Huberman pointed out that over 40,000 adults and children are stricken every year with leukemia.

"The only way they can be successfully treated is by bone marrow transplant. Unfortunately, over 70 percent don't receive the transplants they need, because they were unable to find a compatible donor."

On a more positive note, however, he noted that the odds of finding a compatible bone marrow match are much greater within the patient's own ethnic group, which is why the Jewish community is being encouraged to join the registry.

Huberman said that his family is personally familiar with the terrors of cancer. In August 1996, his wife, Evelyn, was diagnosed with chronic myelogenous leukemia. Since the best possible match is with a sibling, Evelyn's sisters, Yvonne Rosenberg and Dorothy Ullman, were tested.

Fortunately for Evelyn, Yvonne's blood test showed that she was a perfect match.

In January 1997, Yvonne was wheeled into an operating theatre at Vancouver General Hospital to undergo a short procedure in which bone marrow was extracted from her hip through a needle. After it had been successfully removed, the marrow was then intravenously injected into Evelyn.

Evelyn said she received a great deal of support from family and friends. Bone marrow donors must be between 17 and 59 years of age, and be in good health. Following an information session, potential donors go for a blood test to check for four specific antigens. Then their name is added to the registry. If a potential match is found, the donor is tested for a further two antigens. Six matching antigens are required for a transplant to be successful and to minimize rejection.

Donors are admitted to hospital either the day before or on the day of the marrow collection. While the donor is lying on his stomach, under general or local anesthetic, a needle is inserted into the pelvic bones at both sides of the lower back. The procedure takes approximately one to two hours. Only a small portion, between three and five percent, is removed, which the body replaces within a few weeks. Donors are usually discharged later that day or the following day, and may feel stiff and sore in the hip area for about one week. The procedure is covered by provincial medical plans.

For information about the unrelated bone marrow donor registry, phone 1-888-737-1811 in British Columbia and 1-800-668-2866 in the rest of Canada.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

I recently received a lot of mail responding to a question that I answered about avocados. I thank my readers for responding to this question and I hope that this helps to set the facts straight.

In answer to a question about the calorie content of an avocado, I provided the fat and calorie content, and illustrated that at approximately 325 calories and 28 grams of fat in one medium avocado, it is quite high in fat and calories .

I find that many people assume because it is a vegetable, it is a low calorie, low fat choice. Compare avocados to another vegetable such as sweet peppers, at 24 calories per cup and 0.2 grams of unsaturated fat, and you can see the difference.

Readers have pointed out that there are many vitamins and minerals in avocados, and that the fat is primarily unsaturated. For these reasons, avocados do have many healthful benefits. However, for someone trying to lose weight, total fat of any kind, as well as calories, must be limited.

For the purposes of someone with elevated serum cholesterol, the type of fat in avocados is preferable to saturated fat. However, they must be in control of the total amount of fat consumed in order to reduce their lipid levels. Consider that the average male, who is not trying to lose weight, and does not have elevated cholesterol, can consume approximately 90 grams of total fat per day. The average female, in the same situation, can consume approximately 65 grams of fat per day. When you compare the amount of fat in avocado to this figure, it is quite astonishing for a vegetable.

Of course most people are not going to consume a whole avocado at one time, but it is important to compare this to other vegetables and make sure you realize that avocados are richer.

Another reader sent me an article that claimed, among other things, that avocados are cholesterol-free. The reader is correct. Cholesterol is only found in animal products. It is not possible for a vegetable to contain cholesterol. But it is important to clarify that dietary cholesterol, the cholesterol found in animal products, is not the main culprit in raising blood cholesterol levels. It is fat, primarily saturated fat, that is responsible.

Israeli film features a pungent slice of life

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Gila Almagor

It goes without saying that appearances can be deceiving. But in Shemi Zarhin's bittersweet soap opera, Passover Fever, which opens at the Carlton Cinema on March 20, first impressions do not necessarily count.

This Israeli film, starring Gila Almagor, is set in in a large white villa, where the Seter family assembles for a Passover gathering of the clan.

Yona and Michael, the parents, welcome children and grandchildren to their tastefully furnished home, the kind that might well be the object of a centrefold feature in a glossy architectural magazine.

The mood is light and festive as the guests arrive, but sombre undercurrents swirl beneath the merriment.

Yona (Almagor), the matron of the household, is torn by the suspicion that her husband, Michael (Yossef Shiloah), is having an affair. He is acting strangely and causing ripples on the normally placid surface of their marriage.

As Passover Fever unfolds, we learn that Yona already holds a grudge against Michael. When their son, Yizhar, was killed in a military accident, Michael went abroad on a month-long business trip, leaving Yona alone to cope with the grief. She has never really forgiven him for this transgression, and this resentment colors their relationship.

The Seters' children also seem to be distracted. Nathanel (Alon Aboutbul), their divorced son, is upset that his bleached-blonde girlfriend, Margo (Dana Berger), is being virtually ignored, and that his former wife, Gila (Annat Waksman), has been invited to the Passover seder.

Zarhin pours more yeast into the brew when we discover that the Seters' daughters, Dorona (Miki Kam) and Dalia (Esti Zackheim), labor under their own problems, and that their bachelor son, Shai (Dror Keren), is clumsily concealing a medical disorder.

These little dramas, supplemented by a subplot concerning a granddaughter who has retreated into inexplicable silence, play out against the backdrop of rapid-fire, occasionally profane chatter and a catchy musical score composed by Adi Cohen.

The generally fine ensemble cast is led by Algamor, who was recently in Toronto to perform her popular one-woman play, The Summer of Aviya.

Almagor, the doyenne of Israeli cinema, turns in a convincing performance, as do the majority of the actors. As directed by Zarhin, the movie moves briskly along to its denouement.

Many Israeli films deal with weighty political themes, but Passover Fever departs from that norm. In this, the 50th jubilee year of Israel's statehood, Zarhin sets aside existential issues and settles for a pungent slice of life.

Documentary examines Holocaust survivors' Long Way Home

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Liberation from the Nazi extermination camps, although a miraculous blessing, was for many survivors, to quote Winston Churchill, "not even the beginning of the end. But it is, perhaps, the end of the beginning."

Most of those who wanted to return home had no home to return to. Many had lost entire families. Anti-Semitism, particularly in eastern Europe and Poland (where a pogrom killed many Holocaust survivors), was still prevalent.

In the end, many returned to the concentration camps they were liberated from, now called displaced persons camps. The SS guards were replaced by battle-hardened Allied troops untrained for the task at hand. Food-shortages and disease prevailed.

For many Jews in these camps, only one thought kept them strong through this ordeal – a new-found belief in Zionism. That only in their own land would they be safe.

History Television is presenting the Canadian network premiere of the Academy Award-nominated documentary The Long Way Home, a fascinating, comprehensive look at the three years from the liberation of the camps to the birth of the State of Israel.

The two-hour documentary narrated by Morgan Freeman is an excellent chronicle of the struggle and hardships of the people behind the creation of Israel.

For many survivors, the attitude of their Allied liberators was one of almost complete indifference. "The Germans just killed us," one survivor says. "The British just don't want us to live."

Life in the displaced persons camp was no picnic. Their standard of living was only slightly better than under the Nazis. Yet it is fascinating to see that the camps had the highest birth rate of all the world's Jewish communities. By 1946, 1,000 babies were being born each month.

"Creating a family was an act of defiance against Hitler," another survivor says.

With the British White Paper on Palestine severely restricting Jewish refugees, many took matters in their own hands. With the help of the Haganah, many Jews, young and old, braved the wintry Alps on foot to reach the Mediterranean ports from which they were clandestinely shipped to Palestine.

The story of the Exodus is well documented. Upon arrival in Palestine, many were arrested and sent to yet another camp in Cyprus.

Their perserverance, where most of us would most likely have given up all hope, is what makes their story such a fascinating watch.

The Long Way Home, March 22 at 10 p.m. (Eastern) includes the voices of Ed Asner, Martin Landau and Michael York reading from diaries and letters.

An Allied soldier talks to liberated Jews at a Displaced Persons Camp in Germany.

ALLAN LEVINE NOMINATED FOR AWARD

Winnipeg historian Allan Levine, whose first novel The Blood Libel was published last year by Great Plains Publications, has been named one of five nominees for the Chapters/Books in Canada first novel award.

The novel is set in Winnipeg's North End in 1911, when the streets were teeming with impoverished immigrants. Its protagonist, Sam Klein, who works in a brothel, turns detective after a rabbi is accused of a murder that Klein is certain he didn't commit.

Levine, 41, who holds a doctorate in history, is a teacher at a Winnipeg private school. He is the author of several non-fiction works on historical subjects. "I think in most non-fiction writers, there's a novel waiting to jump out," he told The CJN recently.

Also on the short list are Tim Wynveen for his comic novel Angel Falls; Kim Echlin for Elephant Winter; Rabindranath Maharaj for Homer in Flight; and Margaret Gibson for Opium Dreams. All five novelists are scheduled to read from their works at a gala reception at Chapters' flagship store at Bloor and Avenue Road in Toronto on April 23, Canada Book Day.

The winner of the award will be named at the reception.

Applebaum Turns 80: To help distinguished film and theatrical composer-conductor Louis Applebaum celebrate his 80th birthday, Soundstreams Canada is hosting a star-studded gala evening featuring actors Douglas Campbell and Benedict Campbell, the Elmer Iseler Singers, the Canadian Brass, soprano Monica Whicher, harpist Erica Goodman, flautist Robert Cram and the Encounters Chamber Ensemble.

The musical tribute to Appelbaum takes place April 6, 8 p.m. at the Jane Mallett Theatre, 27 Front St. E., Toronto. $30 (includes post-concert reception). 366-7723.

Tafelmusik Baroque Orchestra with music director Jeanne Lamon will perform at Holy Blossom Temple, Toronto on March 22 at 8 p.m. The concert is the orchestra's first outreach targeted specifically to the Jewish community and will include much of the music which was part of its debut performance in Israel last year.

The program includes work by Corelli, Vivaldi, Handel, C.D. Lidarti and Solamone Rossi and will feature Cantor Benjamin Z. Maissner as soloist.

Tafelmusik has achieved international stature performing frequent concerts and tours throughout North America, Europe and Japan. Under the leadership of music director Jeanne Lamon, the ensemble of 19 members recreates music of the 17th and 18th centuries, from the baroque period of Haydn, Vivaldi and Handel, through the classical period of Beethoven.

The concert is a fund raising effort for the Holy Blossom Temple Singers to participate in the 50th anniversary Choral Festival in Israel this summer.

Music of the ghetto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The songs that were sung in the ghettoes of Warsaw, Lodz, Kovno and Vilna are at the heart of Ghetto Tango, Music in Extremis, coming to Toronto March 28.

It's a witty, ironic, sardonic and satiric look at the life of performers who had to sing or play to live under their Nazi masters.

It packed them in at Ashkenaz last year, so much so that Olive Eye Productions decided to bring the show and its performers Adrienne Cooper and Zalmen Mlotek from New York for a one-night stand.

Ghetto Tango literally bridges the gulf between the Jews of eastern Europe and those in the Diaspora, distilling the experiences that provide a common bond between Jews born in Canada and those who came here after World War II.

It took more than 50 years of painstaking research and several trial runs of the material before Ghetto Tango evolved into something more than a sentimental nod to a past era.

And it wouldn't work if premiere Yiddish singer Adrienne Cooper didn't sing as if her life depended on it, adding a compelling timbre to the material; or without the work of accompanist Zalmen Mlotek, a Yiddish musical star in his own right, who weds his piano arrangements to the rhythms of ragtime, jazz or tango.

None of the lyrics stand back from the real situation in which these singers, composers and actors found themselves. At least one number expresses criticism of the Judenrat that ran the ghettos for the Nazis. Ghetto Tango is awash with the frustrations that ordinary people felt as they fought for bread.

What helps bridge the gap between that time and this is the Yiddish-English content, for even non-Yiddish speakers will understand the intensity and black humor.

The performance takes place at Trinity-St. Paul's Centre, 427 Bloor St. W., near the Spadina subway. Tickets are $25 and $20, plus tax. For more information, phone 416-324-9413.

Readings celebrate Int'l Women's Day

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Margie Wolfe had been celebrating International Women's Day for 25 years, but couldn't find a way to combine her celebrations with her interest in Jewish women writers. Women Reading Jewish Women Writers, a recent program at the Bloor JCC, gave her that opportunity.

"I wanted to create a program to celebrate our own Jewish women in a provocative and enjoyable way," said Wolfe, the coordinator of the event.

Wolfe asked four prominent Jewish women in the literary world to choose the work of one of their favorite Jewish women writers to read for the evening.

"All the women I asked to speak," she said, "are knowledgeable, familiar with a diversity of writers, accustomed to writing and reading, and they are women who wanted to share their passion with other people."

The readers, Libby Sheier, Susan Cole, Eleanor Wachtel and Helen Redner, all chose writers who had influenced them as readers, writers and activists.

Cole, senior editor and writer for NOW magazine, read from Leslea Newman, because "[Newman] speaks from a lesbian and Jewish perspective."

Cole chose to read from A Letter to Harvey Milk, explaining, "It asks the question about how we get our stories, where they come from and who has the right to tell them."

The story, the only one of the evening seen from a male perspective, told of an older Jewish man in a creative writing class and his resistance to telling his stories and the stories of his dead family members and friends.

Helen Redner, the director of Toronto's Jewish Book Fair, the largest of its kind in North America, also touched on the theme of the right to tell one's story. She read from Rachel Calof's Story, the memoir of Rachel Calof, a Russian immigrant homesteader in North Dakota. After the reading, Redner explained that when Calof's manuscript was found, her children debated whether or not to publish it, as Calof had always complained of a lack of privacy on the farm. In the end, her children did publish it, allowing audiences to discover Calof's story as a new immigrant.

Both Sheier and Wachtel read from more well-known Jewish women writers, Grace Paley and Cynthia Ozick. They said the writers they chose were women they admired and related to.

"I am also from Brooklyn," said Sheier, a Toronto poet and columnist for the Toronto Star, of Paley. "She's from a lefty background and she addresses a lot of issues about Jewish life and the interaction of other races, which I'm interested in."

Paley's piece, The Long Distance Runner, told the story of a Jewish woman who chose to go running in her old Brooklyn neighborhood, and described her encounter with the black community there.

Wachtel read from Ozick's latest novel, The Puttermesser Papers, a book written over a 30-year span, which follows the life of Ruth Puttermesser. The selection chosen was a light-hearted account of a 50-something single woman, who contemplates finding a mate through the New York Times personal ads.

Wolfe said she had hoped that the readers "would choose a diversity of writers. I would have been surprised if the selections had been similar."

In commenting on the future of the program, she added, "I would like to think that we will celebrate International Women's Day every year and that we can continue to provide the space for women to share their interest in feminism and Judaism."

Still time to take in some great spring skiing

By JOSIE NEWMAN-PROVOST
Special to The CJN

HORSESHOE VALLEY — Although this winter hasn't given us an abundance of snow in southern Ontario, there is some great spring skiing – both downhill and cross-country.

If you're an expert, southern Ontario may not be your choice for downhill skiing, but for those who just want a day of fun outside with friends or family, there's a lot to choose from.

Aside from the well-known resorts, such as Blue Mountain in Collingwood, Horseshoe Valley north of Barrie, and Mount St. Louis-Moonstone west of Barrie, there are a number of smaller resorts, which usually have a cosy inn or resort attached to them.

Sir Sam's Inn, 2½ hours northeast of Toronto near the town of Haliburton, is one of these. The inn itself is a beautiful wood and stone structure built in 1917 by Sir Samuel Hughes as his summer estate. "Sir Sam" was Canada's minister of the militia during World War I.

Located on Eagle Lake, a small but picturesque lake 15 minutes north-east of Haliburton, the inn and its adjacent ski hills are situated half-way between Ottawa and Toronto. There are four hectares of property around Sir Sam's, owned by innkeeper James Orr, and another 64 hectares with the ski resort, which is owned independently.

For $33 per day or $56 for two days on the weekend for an adult lift ticket, the skiing is just as good as Mount St. Louis-Moonstone or Horseshoe Valley and a lot less crowded. The deal can't be beat if you stay at the inn – two days of skiing are included when you buy a weekend all-inclusive package. A note of caution to families, though. Only couples can be overnight guests at Sir Sam's, although families can patronize the restaurant.

There is a relaxed feel to Sir Sam's, where lift line-ups are never more than five minutes. Many of the visitors are families who have cottages in the area and buy a seasonal pass. There are two fast, four-person chair lifts, three or four smaller chair-lifts and a tow-rope. There are several difficulty levels to choose from in hills, including a mogul run. And the view of Eagle Lake is spectacular.

Cross-country skiers got even less snow this season. Escaping north of Barrie was what most of us had to do in order to find a good cross-country base. Hardwood Hills and Horseshoe Valley are two of the main cross-country resorts, although there are several less well-known cross-country centres adjacent to some charming resorts. One of these is Pickerel Lake Lodge and its 30 kilometres of cross-country trails.

When I was at Pickerel Lake in the third week of February, it was one of the only places in southern Ontario with a natural snow base for cross-country skiing. Even with a deep base, the snow was wet and the skiing slick and fast. The trails are picturesque and challenging, with a variety of difficulty levels to choose from. The best track to take from the main loop is the pink trail, a 10-km hilly up and down ride, with a breathtaking view of the surrounding hills.

Unlike at commercial resorts, we saw only one other group of skiers in the two days we were travelling the trails. But our solitude was profoundly disturbed by the snowmobiles, whose owners were keen on Pickerel Lake trails, almost the only ones left open in southern Ontario because of the lack of snow.

Although snowmobile and ski trails are separate, the annoying buzz and drone of the machines was a little offputting. All in all, Pickerel Lake was a pleasant, relaxing experience, though. For those not staying at the lodge, the trail fee is $8.

Pickerel Lake Lodge was built in 1915 and has had several renovations since owners Harald and Marian Eichberger took it over in 1981. Made of wood with a wonderful stone fireplace and some stone walls, it is a vintage southern Ontario lodge. An indoor pool and hot tub and a jacuzzi and fireplace in many of the rooms make it a comfortable place to stay after an invigorating day on the hills.

To get to Sir Sam's from Toronto, take Highway 401 east to Highway 35 north, which eventually turns into Highway 118. At West Guilford, take Road 6 to Sir Sam's Road.

The best way to get to Pickerel Lake from Toronto is up Highway 400 to Highway 11. Drive north of Huntsville on Highway 11 to Pickerel and Jack Lake Road. Turn right and drive for 12 km until you see the lodge.

Reform Jews meet in Central America

By ABRAHAM ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica — Close to 60 representatives from nine countries recently attended the first conference of Reform Jewish Congregations ever held in Central America.

Delegates came to Costa Rica from six Latin American countries: Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Puerto Rico and Costa Rica, and one Caribbean country, Aruba. There was also a delegation from the United States.

The prime mover behind the conference was Marvin Sossin, a transplanted Canadian from Toronto who is the president and one of the founders of Costa Rica's 10-year-old B'nai Israel Congregation.

In his message to the visitors Sossin said that B'nai Israel, which began with six English speaking Jews, now has 75 families with Spanish speakers far outnumbering the English. "Our board meetings and services comprise a medley of different idioms and dialects, but we communicate."

Affirming "our linkage" with the World Union for Progressive Judaism, which helped to arrange the conference, Sossin said the meeting was called to show "our responsibility as Jews ... to help each other fulfil our spiritual and moral values" and our shared desires "to pray as Jews, to marry, to educate our children in our faith, to enjoy our rich cultural heritage together and to be buried with our families according to our customs.

"We cooperate and collaborate with the Orthodox, the Lubavitch and the Israeli Embassy," Sossin said. (The Orthodox Centro Israelita is a 500-family congregation in Costa Rica and there is also a small Lubavitch community.)

Guest speakers were Rabbi Clifford Kulwin, New York, International director for the World Union, and Ya'acov Braskha, Israel's ambassador in Costa Rica.

Rabbi Kulwin suggested that adherents of Liberal Judaism should see themselves "not as proselytizers who wish to 'convert' the secular and those who worship in another stream, but rather as providers of a service the Jewish community needs."

The healthiest Jewish communities, he said, are those where the practice of Judaism varies "from orthodoxy on the one hand to secularism on the other, and various stops in between." Liberal Jews "vigorously endorse" Jewish diversity while seeking to make Reform Judaism "accessible to as many as possible of those who would want to join us."

The delegates spoke of their experiences in their home communities. Except for Mexico with over 5,000 Jews, the Latin American and Caribbean Jewish communities range in size from several dozen to a couple of thousand. And, as in Costa Rica, the Reform groups are often a minority in a dominantly Orthodox Jewish community.

These islands of Reform Judaism thus face very real problems: small communities seeking rabbinical services as well as membership involvement; education for their children, including bar/bat mitzvah preparation; adult and youth programs; conversion classes; and finding Jewish literature in Spanish.

Early in the conference, Oscar Kellerman, vice-president of Nicaragua's Congregacion Israelita, recalled what happened to the Jews in his country under the Sandinista regime. Before the Sandinistas took power, 1,500 Jews were living in Nicaragua, most of them well-to-do, and they had a strong congregation.

The restrictive economic policies introduced by the Sandinistas, tinged with anti-Semitism, led most Jews to flee the country. Less than half-a-dozen Jewish families remained and the synagogue was lost. Since the Sandinistas were defeated some Jews have begun to return. The congregation has been revived and now has 27 families.

Panama's Congregation Kol Shearith Israel has been an outpost of Liberal Judaism for many years and sent a 10-member delegation to the conference, led by Rabbi Aaron Peller and the president, Roberto Henriquez. The Panamanian delegates reported that they continue to experience conflict with the Orthodox congregation in their community.

Sossin said that in San Jose relations between the Orthodox and Reform congregations have now reached a state of mutual recognition and respect but it wasn't always so.

The Reform B'nai Israel was founded for a number of reasons, among which were the problems encountered by inter-married couples seeking accommodation at the Centro Israelita and the refusal of membership to women in their own right.

A major recent achievement is B'nai Israel's publication of a trilingual prayer book (Hebrew-Spanish-English); Jody Bonilla was one of the editors. Copies of the trilingual siddur were donated to the Nicaragua delegation and the Panama delegation ordered 200 copies.

Other participants in the conference included Rabbi Peller of Panama; Rabbi Theodore Levy and his wife, Ina Rae Levy of South Carolina, specially assigned by the Reform movement to work with the Central American and Caribbean communities; Aaron Liverant of Mexico City, president of B'nai Brith District 23; and San Jose's Rabbi Marcus Burstein.

At the conference banquet, Baraka cited the "incredible statistic that, since Israel became a state 50 years ago, the Jewish population of Israel has expanded tremendously to over five million but that Jews in the Diaspora have lost two million to assimilation. This is the reality!"

The conference ended with the unanimous adoption of a mission statement calling for the establishment of "a regional association of like-minded congregations and communities" to develop programs of mutual benefit. It was agreed that the association be linked with the World Union for Progressive Judaism "though the member congregations and communities may certainly have other affiliations as well."

It was also agreed to hold a follow-up conference in Panama in 1999 and to establish a regional publications centre and library based at Costa Rica's B'nai Israel.

Roerto Henriquez of Panama, David Losk of Honduras and Marvin Sossin were named to a regional coordinating committee. Sossin has circulated the mission statement with questions to the congregations about ongoing activities.

Wrestler competes in provincial 'Battle in the Barn'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you were to ask Jamie Gillman to name his favorite wrestler, chances are he'd suggest a Canadian Olympian or an otherwise obscure club champion.

Never mind finely tuned athletes like Hulk Hogan, Gene Kiniski or Mad Dog Vachon. In the squared circle in which Gillman competes, there are no collared-elbow hook-ups, no Beal throws and certainly no figure-four deathlocks. No Texas cage matches, no foreign objects, no voluptuous assistants distract the referee from performing his task with integrity.

Gillman, you see, is a provincial-calibre wrestler who recently competed in an Ontario-wide wrestling tournament called by those in the know as simply "OFSAA." Situated in a cavernous auditorium in Brampton, Ont., OFSAA's Battle in the Barn featured 500 boys and 300 girls competing in a variety of weight categories.

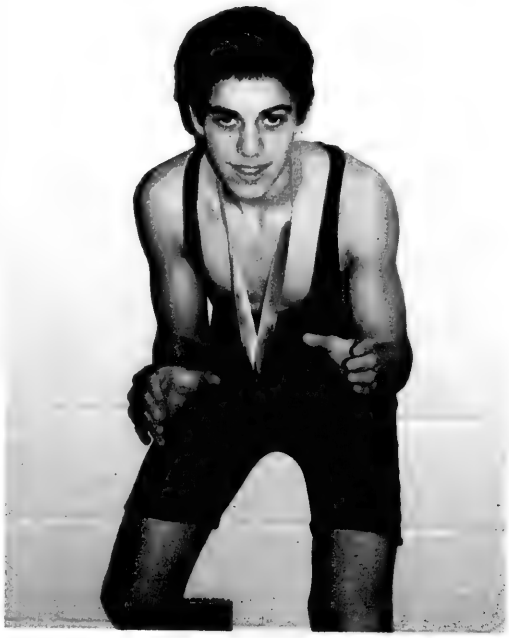
Gillman, around five foot 10 and 127 pounds, didn't do all that well in Brampton. In the double-elimination event, he was gone after losing his first two matches.

In his first altercation, he grappled with a guy who went on to finish fourth. "So I lost," he said. His second match was a seesaw event and one "I should've won ...but I did some stupid things." Gillman lost the second bout by a score of 13-8.

In freestyle wrestling, points are awarded by a judge on three bases: one point for taking a guy down to his stomach and getting behind him; two points for getting an opponent down and exposing his back to the mat; and three points if you take an opponent from his feet and put him on his back or butt. A one-second pin is the equivalent of boxing's knockout, ending a match regardless of the point spread. Jumping ahead 10-0 in points also ends a wrestling match.

For Gillman, a 16-year-old Grade 11 student at Mackenzie, the Battle in the Barn was his first tournament at that high a level, but he's already planning to do better next year. Wrestlers generally follow a five-year development pattern that starts in Grade 9 and culminates in their OAC year. By that criterion, Gillman is on his personal schedule to move up to the top six in the rankings next year when he's in grade 12 and to challenge for the title in his weight category in his last year of high school.

If hard work is any indication, he has a good shot at meeting his goals. During the wrestling season, he practises an average of eight times a week for a total of between 15 and 20 hours. That stood him in good stead as a member of Mackenzie's wrestling team.



Jamie Gillman

Earlier in the season, Gillman competed at a high school tournament at Brock University and finished fourth with a 3-2 record. Later at another high school event, he finished second.

At a North York tournament, he placed in the top four. Thanks to that win, he advanced to the Tri-Cities' tournament (North York, Etobicoke and York) and finished in the top two in his weight division, allowing him to advance to the OFSAA event.

When he's not competing and working out at school, he's mixing it up with other wrestlers at the Metro Toronto Wrestling Association club, which, conveniently, holds practices at Mackenzie.

All that work was necessary to prepare him for the rigors of the OFSAA matches and wrestling's four-minute matches. It may not sound like much, but after four minutes, you're dead tired, he said.

Prior to OFSAA, Gillman went through another preparation ritual that is all too common among teenage athletes. He "cut weight" to get himself into the 127-lb category. For the day or two before the tournament, he watched what he ate to ensure he wouldn't have to fight in the next higher weight division.

"A lot of wrestlers cut weight. They think they'll be stronger fighting smaller guys or other guys who cut weight," he explained.

Gillman said coaches at his club "suggest going to a certain weight, but they don't force you." Other clubs, he's heard, "make athletes cut weight."

Despite wrestling's rigors, Gillman has been at it since about Grade 7 when a phys. ed. teacher introduced him to the sport. He immediately took to it.

"I like individual sports," he said. "No one relies on you and you don't have to rely on anyone. You're out there. That's it."

It's no surprise that he also enjoys cross-country running and orienteering and he plays some hockey as well.

In wrestling, Gillman said, "I like tricking my opponent."

His favorite moves are "a leg shot called the low single" in which you go down, grab the opponent's leg and spin around behind him and the "Ziegler," a move down low that turns a wrestler on his back to pick up key points.

Gillman plans to continue his wrestling career after high school. "I'd really like to wrestle in university and stay with a club right up to then," he said.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

בגלל ילד אחד מאת: אורי אורבך, איר: שי צירקה, הוצאת ספריית בית-אל.

"עֲרֵבִית של מוצאי-שבת
מקדימים בעשר דקות,
כי לחלק מהאנשים
אין סבלנות לחכות."

"לאליהו חנביא,
שמגיע בליל הסדר
אחרי שאני נרדם:
השנה תשתדל להגיע
קצת יותר מוקדם."

גם הילד חובש הכיפה של אורבך חש קנאה, כעס ויש בו חולשות כשם שיש לו שמחות.

"אחותי הקטנה
עוד לא משתתפת בתורניות:
לא יורדת עם הפח,
לא מפנה מהשולחן,
לא שוטפת כלים.
כשהיא קצת תגדל,
את כל זה
היא תצטרך להשלים."

לא כל השירים בספר משאירים רושם, אך יש הקולעים ישירות לסוד האמירה וחשיבת הילד. ודווקא התוכן הדתי מעניק נדבך חינני ומשעשע.

"אחיו הגדול של יוסי
בכלל לא דתי.
אבל ליוסי לא נעים,
אז הוא אומר
שהוא מְסֹרָתִי."

גם כאשר הילד בוחן בעין ביקורתית את המבוגרים חובשי הכיפות הסרוגות, הנימה היא סלחנית:

"איש אחד בבית-הכנסת
מתפלל בכאלה תנועות,
שבטח התפילות שלו
מגיעות לשמים מְבֹלְגָנוֹת."

יש בקובץ גם שירים שאינם בעלי תוכן ייחודי, דתי:

"כולם אמרו
שהעוגה שאפיתי
ממש נהדרת.
אחר-כך אמא הכינה
עוגה אחרת."

כל שיר באסופה מובא בעמוד הנתון במסגרת סגלגלה. בפינה העליונה של המסגרת איור קטנטן ובנוף העמוד איור בשחור התואם את תוכן השיר. חבל מאד אם רק ילדי המגזר הדתי יקראו בשיריו של אורבך; השירים יעוררו את הרגש בכל ילד באשר הוא:

"חבר שלי, עמי,
הוא ממשפחה של כוהנים.
אבא שלו כוהן,
וסבא שלו כוהן,
ואחיו הגדול גם;
אבל עד הבר-מצווה
עמי הוא ילד סתם."

וכי איזה ילד לא יהיה שותף לתסכול בעובדת החיים המרגיזה ש:

"עד שהצלחתי ללמוד
בעל-פה
את כל 'שירת דבורה',
מי הלכה לגדע:
המורה!"

בגלל ילד אחד הוא ספרו השני של אורי אורבך בסדרה זו; הספר הראשון הוא אולי בשבת יזרקו סוכריות.

ואסיים בשיר החביב עלי:

"בקצה החלון הקדמי
תפילת הדרך מודבקת.
אז זה שֶׁגָּנַב לנו
את האוטו
יכול לנשוף פָּשֶׁקְט."

About families

Dear Susan,

My husband and I are planning to divorce. Although we want the parting to be amicable, there are many issues on which we disagree. We have two young boys ages two and five, and we very much want to carry out our plans in a way that will be as easy on them as possible. What do you recommend?

Dear Reader,

A good first step may be mediation. Mediation is a process designed to help couples work out their plans for custody and access of the children, as well as assisting them in determining the appropriate division of property and assets. Mediation is a non-litigious process whereby two people willingly seek the help of a trained third party to settle issues in dispute. Through the mediation process, the couple will generate an written agreement which they give to their respective lawyers for final approval. The lawyers' approval will make the agreement legal and binding.

The mediation process can save you thousands of dollars while also giving you the opportunity to negotiate your differences in a less formal and confrontational manner. This process puts control in your hands, and avoids the pain and bitterness that would be the inevitable result of a protracted court case. You cannot mediate unless both parties are willing to enter into the process. You would begin by each choosing your own lawyer who would in turn have to agree on the choice of mediator. Please keep in mind that you cannot enter a mediation process if there is or was a histroy of abuse – these situations should be dealt with exclusively through the courts.

The mediation process usually takes eight to 10 sessions, although there is no set time period. There is a set protocol that a mediator will follow. The mediator will help you plan your future so as to ensure that your children will have the least disruption in lifestyle.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 19 years.

$2.5 million allotted to Canada

Swiss compensation for 'needy' survivors

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A compensation package of roughly $2.5 million (US) has been earmarked for needy Holocaust survivors in Canada, as part of the Swiss humanitarian fund created last year by Swiss banks and businesses, The CJN has learned.

The money will go either directly to survivors in need or to a welfare program that will aid them, said Jack Silverstone, national executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

CJC is still in discussion with the New York-based World Jewish Congress, the World Jewish Restitution Organization and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. While the sum allotted to Canada is "preliminary," it is "fairly accurate," Silverstone told The CJN on Monday.

The revelation comes on the heels of an announcement in the United States that $32.4 million will be distributed there as part of the same Swiss fund.

About 120,000 U.S. survivors will be able to call a toll-free number to apply for a share of the money.

In Canada, the compensation will be distributed after discussions with local Jewish federations, which deliver welfare and other programs, and survivor groups, Silverstone said. He said that could take place within the next six months.

Survivors in Canada will be "well represented" in all consultations, he pledged.

But he said he's "not happy" with the amount allocated to Canada.

Depending on how many people apply, individual compensation packages will vary from $200 to $1,000 "at the most. At best, it's not

Jewish 'ethnicity' causes stir

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Vastly different interpretations of the 1996 census results on Jewish ethnicity are being voiced by two of Canada's leading experts on Jewish population trends.

While McGill University's James Torczyner says the numbers should be viewed with caution, even skepticism, the University of Toronto's Robert Brym warns they portend disturbing trends, including a deep rift in Canadian Jewry.

The 1996 mini-census found 351,705 respondents across Canada who claimed to have Jewish ethnicity, a drop of five percent over the 1991 census. "Jewish" was the 15th most popular choice of ethnicity, sandwiched between "North American Indian" and "Jamaican."

Whereas the '91 census asked about religion as well as ethnic identity, the '96 headcount inquired only about ethnicity. Respondents were allowed to choose up to four ethnic origins.

What is it? Experts disagree

For some experts, the real story lies in how many people said they had multiple ethnic origins, one being Jewish. That was the only category that experienced an increase over 1991, and some, like Brym, believe that means increasing assimilation and the threat of a chasm between "religious" and "ethnic" Jews.

Statistics Canada and Jewish officialdom have long regarded Judaism as both a religion and an ethnic marker. Community planners use the numbers to gauge many social trends, and to earmark communal spending.

The '91 census found that 318,070 Canadians said their religion was Jewish. But community planners don't rely on that number, or on the ethnic figures. They use a mix of both arrived at by Torczyner, who analyzed the results and blended them using several variables. The only responses excluded from his total were those who claimed Jewish ethnic origins but who professed another religion.

ISRAEL

Hacker Detained

JERUSALEM — Israeli police have placed under house arrest a teenage computer hacker who claims to have broken into the Pentagon's computer network.

Israel Television reported that the 18-year-old youth, who identifies himself as the "Analyzer," told police that he had wanted to show the security holes in the Pentagon system. Two other Israeli youths alleged to be his accomplices were also placed under house arrest.

There were reports earlier this month that the FBI was seeking the Analyzer, whom officials believe broke into military and educational computer networks. The FBI has already questioned two California youths thought to have worked with him.

Meat Imports Banned

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Knesset gave preliminary approval to an amendment that would indefinitely extend a ban on the import of all non-kosher meat to the Jewish state. In the first of three votes, the Knesset approved the amendment to the Basic Law for Freedom of Business Opportunity by a margin of 65-18, with five abstentions.

WORLD

Poland Returns Shul

NEW YORK — Poland returned a synagogue near the Auschwitz death camp to the Jewish community – the first move by that government to return Jewish communal property.

A local Jewish leader said the synagogue would be turned into a Jewish museum.

Film Protested

NEW YORK — Some 30 haredi Jews demonstrated outside the offices of a film distributor to protest an upcoming movie they say defames the Orthodox and chassidic communities.

New York State Assemblyman Dov Hikind, who led the protest, said the film "presents the worst stereotype" of Jews and has asked Miramax Films to alter some of the movie.

A Price Above Rubies, which is about a chassidic woman frustrated by her life, is expected to be released later this month.

Snow Closes Jerusalem Schools

JERUSALEM — Parts of Israel became a winter wonderland last week.

A snowstorm shut down Jerusalem and other parts of the country for several hours Wednesday, just two days after a sandstorm from North Africa blew yellow dust all around the country.

Meteorologists said some four inches of snow fell on Jerusalem in eight hours, closing schools and businesses. While snow usually falls every winter in Jerusalem, it rarely accumulates.

By mid-day on Wednesday, most roads had been reopened and public transportation resumed. But meteorologists warned that more snow was expected.

Snow also fell in northern Israel, as well as in Jordan and Lebanon.

The storm came just as the country was gearing up for spring. On Thursday night, Israelis moved their clocks forward to mark the start of Daylight Savings Time there.

Charitable gaming changes hurt Jewish groups

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The decision by Toronto-area municipalities to withhold approval for permanent gaming sites after March 31 will hit some Jewish charities hard and leave them scrambling for alternate sources of funding.

Organizations like Na'amat Canada, the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), Maccabi Canada, the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto, the Morris Winchevsky School, Torah Publications, B'nai Brith Canada and many others rely to varying degrees on the funds collected through charity gaming. Many were counting on the promised April 1 transition to permanent gaming sites to continue with that revenue stream and even expand it.

But Na'amat Canada, for one, will suffer as a result of the decision by the cities of Toronto and Markham not to provide approvals for the permanent sites, said Lorraine Levene, executive director of Na'amat Canada's Toronto section. She expects to see a shortfall in scholarship funds for young people planning to attend Camp Gesher this summer. In addition, scholarships for preschoolers attending Bialik Hebrew Day School, funds for Na'amat's legal advisory clinic and for a youth training program in Israel will be affected.

"They'll be impacted this year, no question, but not as heavily as next year," she said.

About 30 campers attend Camp Gesher thanks to Na'amat subsidies, but the organization will see to it that campers already registered will not be affected. Instead, late-registering campers may find subsidies have run out while additional savings may be garnered by cutting back on camp upgrades, she said.

Levene said 90 percent of funds spent domestically come from bingos and casinos. Bingos, which Na'amat sponsors three times per month, are not affected by the March 31 stop-date for roving three-day Monte Carlo casinos.

Approximately $50,000 per year is raised through casinos and "we were hoping to increase it through the new permanent locations so we could assist more preschoolers and send more kids to camp," Levene said.

NCJW has certainly benefitted from [charity casinos], but we don't depend on it totally," said Roz Fine, president of the organization's Toronto section.

"We were allowed to do it once a month for three days."

In the last three months, NCJW raised an average of $4,000 per month but on other occasions, when they left NCJW premises, we were "gouged" on the rent and did poorly, Fine said.

The March 31 deadline won't have a severe impact on NCJW because "we haven't really budgeted for it. It's a nice cushion but we weren't really counting on it," she said.

Charity casinos played a big role in supporting Maccabi Canada's fundraising efforts in the last few years. Over the last four years, between $130,000 and $140,000 was raised through casinos – enough to underwrite all the costs of the softball team and send them to the Pan Am Maccabi Games in Argentina and to the Maccabiah Games in Israel, said senior Maccabi official Allen Gerskup.

Another organization that's grown increasingly reliant on charity casinos is the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto, which has been sponsoring one a month for the last year, said Ellen Nash, the council's executive director.

"As with many organizations, we need the funds," she said. The Camp Council allocates $200,000 in camp scholarships each year, with about $50,000 coming from bingos and charity casinos.

"We're hopeful the government will come up with an extension pending a resolution," Nash said. "As long as nothing is in place, the government should extend the temporary, roving licences.

"If we can't get the province to extend, we're committed to [maintaining] the level of subsidies this summer. We'll have to look to other economies to make up the shortfall, hold more bingos, sell more donation cards or look at other events," she said.

Eric Feldbloom, a professional fundraiser in the Jewish and general communities, said that after April 1, "it'll be a punitive situation. It'll be problematic."

"On any given day, two to five Jewish organizations are in the mix," sponsoring charity casinos.

For many Jewish organizations, charity casinos became an attractive fundraising avenue around 1992. "They wanted to generate funds for education, youth programs, life cycle events and other programs. Everything the [organizations] do costs money and here was a mechanism where they could raise funds," he said.

Experts clash on 'ethnicity'

The final tally – the official one – was 356,315 Jews in Canada as of 1991.

Torczyner puts little stock in the '96 numbers on ethnicity.

"There are all kinds of reasons why you can't rely on ethnic figures alone," he told The CJN. "The ethnicity question on its own distorts the total, and you can't correct that unless the religion question is asked at the same time."

In other words, to get an accurate count, both sets of data are needed, Torczyner says.

Besides, "ethnicity is a subjective concept anyway. If these figures are anywhere near correct, it's a fluke."

But for Brym, the '96 ethnic results sound alarm bells.

Chief among them is his contention that Canadian Jewry is becoming increasingly polarized between those for whom Judaism is a religion and those who have a more cultural or historic attachment to being Jewish.

He notes that numbers consistently show more "ethnic" Jews in Canada than "religious" ones, and that there is a growing number of Jews who claim more than one ethnicity.

While the total number of Jews by ethnicity is falling, one category of Jews is growing – and quickly, Brym notes. More and more Canadian Jews view themselves not as exclusively Jewish, but as having multiple ethnic origins.

This category of Jews, he says, has been growing for at least 15 years. Indeed, those who identified themselves in 1996 as Jewish by ethnic background, in addition to one or more other ethnic origins, grew by a dramatic 26 percent over the previous five years.

To Brym, that reflects rising rates of assimilation.

"I frankly don't see how else you could interpret that, other than growing assimilation – or a change in the way Jews identify themselves."

Brym predicts that by 2001, over half of Canada's Jews will identify themselves as of mixed ancestry.

And over the long term – perhaps 50 years – he fears the kind of split in Canada that exists between Jews in Israel and those in the Diaspora.

Supporting his view, he says, is the fact that Jews of mixed ethnic origin are most common in provinces with the youngest, least Orthodox communities. Thus, in Alberta and British Columbia, around 65 percent of Jews said they were of mixed ethnic origin in 1996. Brym points out that in those provinces, there are many young, relatively assimilated Jews who have migrated from other parts of Canada.

Mixed ancestry

At the other extreme is Quebec. Brym says given its large Orthodox and elderly Jewish population, only 35 percent of Jews there said they were of mixed ethnic background in 1996.

Ontario falls between the two. In 1996, 43 percent of its Jews said they had more than one ethnic origin.

Torczyner cautions against this kind of reasoning.

For example, the 1986 question on ethnicity triggered gloom-and-doom scenarios in Montreal because it supposedly showed that the Jewish population had dipped to around 80,000. But the '91 census showed the actual population at 101,000.

That's why Torczyner would put the '96 figures aside. "I would really caution that these numbers not be part of any planning."

He would wait for the 2001 census, which will ask both religion and ethnicity, before making any projections.

But Brym dismisses claims that the ethnic numbers are skewed and unreliable.

"You can't compare numbers on religion to numbers on ethnicity," he says. "But you can compare numbers on ethnicity from 1991 to the numbers on ethnicity in 1996. Why doubt them?"

Charities will feel pinch as casinos close doors

"The whole gaming industry is a hot potato," Feldbloom said. "The problem the politicians don't comprehend is that people are going to gamble anyway, underground with the potential for dishonesty."

Gary Gladstone, a vice-chair of Charities First Ontario, said the province had expected municipalities to approve the permanent venues without a problem. But responding to public pressure, the city governments backed away.

"Our charities need help. They raise funds through three-day events and through no fault of their own, they are in severe jeopardy. How is the government going to help them?" he asked.

Some of the Jewish charities have begun discussing a lobbying campaign with other groups. Maccabi volunteer Mark Dworkin said he met recently with representatives of other charities, some of them Jewish, to "discuss strategy to get the megacity mayor [Mel Lastman] and the council to realize how heavily reliant we are on these funds."

He suggested that a letter-writing campaign and perhaps marches and demonstrations may be tried. "We want the whole issue to be reopened," he said.

Bosnian Jews visit Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two representatives of a Jewish humanitarian organization in Sarajevo were among a nine-person delegation from Bosnia and Herzegovina to visit their counterparts here as part of a post-war training project sponsored by Canadian Feed the Children, George Brown College and the Canadian International Development Agency.

Suada Papo and Petar Metikos of La Benevolencija, a Jewish cultural, educational and humanitarian society established in 1892, work mainly with Jewish and non-Jewish youth and seniors.

While here, the group visited community agencies and organizations like Meals on Wheels and Out of the Cold. They also met with groups in Ottawa and St. Catharines. The visit was preceded and will be followed up by training in their own country, by two George Brown professors.

At Dixon Hall, a multi-service agency in Toronto's low-income Regent Park area, Papo said through an interpreter, "This is the place most similar to where we live and I think we will be able to implement quickly the experience we get here."

The major difference, she noted, is that La Benevolencija receives no government funding.

La Benevolencija's efforts have included a public kitchen.

Their first priority in the past few years was to help Sarajevo's more than 6,000 seniors, many of whom have no family nearby.

"We provide health care services, socializing, and we help them become stronger psychologically and physically in post-war conditions," said Papo, who manages several projects for the organization.

Although La Benevolencija has about 100 volunteers and some four dozen paid staff, resources are limited.

La Benevolencija has received aid in the form of food, clothing, medicine and financing from a number of European Jewish organizations and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. "We are [still] looking for donors," said Metikos.

Priorities in the Regent Park community, the visitors heard from Greaves, are employment, education and access to mainstream society.

"It's the same for us," said Metikos, an electrical engineer who has been with La Benevolencija for three years. Like Papo, a high school biology teacher, he volunteered with the organization during the war.

Last year La Benevolencija instituted a project to help children ages 10 and up who have been traumatized by the war and are not functioning well. Of 450 students at one school, noted Papo, 100 met the criteria. "It's a big percentage.

"We accepted the most frustrated children, and through very intensive and continuous work, we can already see results. We help them see and express their inside qualities, and also we help them learn to value themselves."

Programs have focused on keeping kids off the street through the use of creative programming, Papo said.

Seniors and youths have been brought together at parties, with positive results. "The seniors who didn't have or who lost their children, see these children as their own. The children feel more valuable, and see their abilities," said Papo.

The city's Jewish community is down to about 800 people, mostly children and the elderly, said Metikos, who works as a co-ordinator. There is one functioning synagogue, but no rabbi.

Life is slowly – very slowly – returning to normal in Sarajevo. "All supplies are available," said Metikos. "We have power, water, electricity, gas...but water, not regularly."

Papo foresees a long period of recovery. "We have a high rate of unemployment. Our tools for production, our factories, have been destroyed. We don't have funds. We have to survive this period. It is a question of how."

La Benevolencija is a member of the local council of non-governmental organizations in Bosnia and Herzegovina. "Through this council we want to change the basis for our society," said Metikos.

"The war was very rude," he added. "Many people suffered. People became very poor and what is most tragic for our society is that our young people left. We cannot even compare our society to Canadian society. We have ideas. We have knowledge. But our possibilities are very modest."

CLARIFICATION

The story on the recent gifts to the Department of Jewish Studies at McGill University (CJN, March 19) omitted the name of Richard Cummings of Toronto as one of the family members responsible for the Cummings endowment fund. The CJN regrets the omission. An intriguing look into white supremacists

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The popular image of Canadian neo-Nazis is not particularly appealing. They're widely seen as tattooed, violent, venom-spitting cement heads. Not exactly the kind of image likely to generate mass appeal. So why would an average middle class girl enrolled in one of Canada's finest universities be enticed into joining their hate-filled world?

A CBC Television drama, White Lies, offers an intriguing look into the appeal that the Canadian white supremacist subculture can have on disenchanted and alienated young people. Set to air on March 29 at 8 p.m., White Lies traces the journey of a fictional character, Catherine Chapman, who questions the multicultural makeup of Canadian society. From her early unwillingness to accept the status quo, we see her move closer to the white supremacist ideology, though she never completely embraces it.

The film is loosely based on the story of Elizabeth Moore, a college student who in the early '90s became an articulate and clean cut proponent of extremist causes in Canada.

Catherine's anger at seeing Christmas celebrations in schools take a back seat to ethnic seasonal celebrations fuels her disenchantment. Her essay on the topic, posted on the World Wide Web, hits home with white supremacist recruiters and one of them, the streetwise Erina, played by Tanya Allen (The Newsroom) entices her into joining their little family.

Coming from a cold home where her parents are detached and uncommunicative, Catherine, played by Sarah Polley (The Sweet Hereafter), enjoys the accepting and welcoming treatment she receives from an assortment of racists attached to the National Identity Movement (NIM).

The fine cast includes Lynn Redgrave, who plays the founder and benefactor of NIM; Jonathan Scarfe (ER, Madison) who plays Catherine's love interest and leader of a head-banging rock band; and Joseph Kell, who plays NIM's director and is by turns charming and menacing.

A Maclean's article on Moore's defection from the extremist cause peaked scriptwriter Dennis Foon's interest in her life. "I was intrigued by the story about a middle class, educated kid," he said.

Foon's research took him inside the Canadian racist movement, where he interviewed two of its leading proponents. The resulting film offers composite characters based on a motley assortment of Canadian extremists and former extremists.

Foon has synthesized contemporary events and created a disturbing, sometimes jarring look at the neo-Nazi underworld.

Interviews with two racist leaders gave him insight into their psyches, Foon said. Although he declined to identify them, he said he was shocked that they identified the same sort of societal problems that concerned him, particularly "how kids fall through the cracks and how society lets them down."

Though fictionalized and dramatized, White Lies "rang true for sure," Moore told The CJN. "Definitely all the elements were there."

Like the lead character, "I was definitely looking for a place to vent my anger and certainly the Heritage Front was very good at venting anger."

Moore left the racist group after three years and is now studying at a Canadian university, attempting to put her life back on track. She's impressed with the film, saying Foon "made it cool enough for TV but real enough as well."

For producer Phil Savath, the show's strength is that it doesn't attempt to simply demonize racist extremists. Young people are attracted to the movement for a reason and the film attempts to lay bare the seductive side of the movement, from the rebellious, in-your-face music to its acceptance of disenchanted young people who have legitimate questions about society that are deemed unacceptable in other forums.

Bernie Farber, Canadian Jewish Congress' longtime spokesperson on issues relating to racism, served as a historical consultant for the movie.

Cook's broth

The sly, disingenuous behavior last week in Jerusalem by Britain's Foreign Secretary Robin Cook was an egregious affront to Israel. It set back prospects for the possibility of even modest European involvement in the peace process and brought shame upon the young government of British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Cook's agenda from beginning to end was a contrived, calculated reproach to Israel.

He was determined to go to Har Choma, in his original plan choosing only the company of Faisal Husseini, to demonstrate his "concern at the expansion of settlements." This determination itself was a black harbinger of the diplomatic storm that was soon to burst onto the area. On the eve of his visit, however, Cook agreed to visit Har Choma only in the company of his Israeli hosts.

On his arrival, Cook's went directly to Gaza where he met with Yasser Arafat. The event was described in the New York Times thus: "Posing with Mr. Arafat in front of the cameras, Mr. Cook deliberately, if somewhat clumsily, leaned over to hug the Palestinian, who seemed not to expect the gesture."

After his call upon Arafat, Cook immediately set out for Har Choma. But here too, the visit was more of the same unsubtle, high visibility, deference toward the Palestinians. After hearing Israel's explanations of the situation relating to Har Choma from his hosts Danny Naveh, Israel's cabinet secretary, and Amos Radiyan, a municipal official from Jerusalem, Cook drove off a few metres where his party was met by a group of five Palestinian legislators headed by Salah Ta'amari who has been at the forefront in the propaganda fight against Israel's claim to the hillsite. The meeting with Ta'amari was no coincidence. It was clearly contrived in violation of his promise not to visit the hill in the company of Palestinians.

Next on his itinerary, Cook went to east Jerusalem to meet with Husseini, the member of the Palestinian Authority in charge of the Jerusalem dossier. While in east Jerusalem, Cook also visited a school where he laid a wreath at a memorial for Arabs killed in 1948 in Deir Yassin, a village near Jerusalem. He pointedly ignored visiting Yad Vashem, a customary courtesy by visiting foreign dignitaries.

Under the circumstances, the cancellation of the state dinner by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in honor of the British secretary was entirely justified.

The seamy broth Cook prepared for Israel was a distasteful display of diplomatic duplicity.

Had Cook intended, in truth, to convey his concern for Israel's "expansion of settlements," his private meeting with Netanyahu was clearly the most effective, most pragmatic forum for doing so. But that he chose to do so only on Har Choma itself in the company of Palestinians was transparent proof that his real intention was to send an electronic visual image around the world of unnuanced symbolism that he personally, and presumably the European Union whose rotating chairship Britain currently holds, sides with the Palestinian claim to the hillsite. But Cook's actions were not only intended to demonstrate political preference for the Palestinians, they were also intended to embarrass the Israelis.

This is apparent from the fact that he set aside all diplomatic norms by persisting in his predetermined plans despite Israel's privately and publicly conveyed protests.

It made an abysmal mockery of his statement to the press outside Prime Minister's Office: "I came here to advance the peace process."

The peace process will not advance through such deceitful and prejudicial behavior. It will only be set further back.

We hope that the lukewarm public expression of support for his foreign secretary uttered by Blair was not in fact the true measure of his private views. Cook deserves to be upbraided by his prime minister for having retarded, not advanced, the peace process.

Jewish teacher training still in peril

Re: "McGill U receives $2-million donation for Jewish studies" (CJN, March 19).

The story omitted reference to Richard Cummings of Toronto. He is the brother of Steven Cummings and Nancy Cummings Gold and should have been listed together with them and their mother, Mrs. Norma Cummings, in describing those responsible for the establishment of the Jack Cummings Memorial Endowment for Jewish Studies.

Moreover, the story suggested that the Leanor and Alvin Segal Endowment and the Jack Cummings Memorial Endowment would benefit our successful but imperiled Jewish Teacher Training Program. This is incorrect. The program, which trains teachers of Jewish studies for elementary and secondary schools, remains in difficulty and awaits its patron(s).

Objects to Gerber's column on "dream palace"

Re: "The dream palace of the Jews" (CJN, March 12). Jean M. Gerber's column calls for a response. Her attack on the Netanyahu government, vis-a-vis the peace process, and the Orthodox rabbinate has no solid ground.

If her concern is really the Jewish people and its survival, I thought she would review and comment on Elliot Abrams' book Faith or Fear.

Jewish continuity is the danger we are facing here in the Diaspora, and losing Jewish and Zionist values in Israel.

The disappearance of North American Jewry because of intermarriage and lack of Jewish religious adherence is our number one calamity.

We should all know what the statistic is, and come to an appropriate conclusion. Jews today are away from Halachah and Orthodoxy and are doing to themselves what 2,000 years of persecution failed to do. No stronger words are needed.

All aboard for Israel — no other country like it

Having recently returned from a trip to Israel, I offer the following advice: Pack your bags and visit Eretz Yisrael! And if you can do it on an organized mission like the recent United Israel Appeal Mission '98 Israel at 50, so much the better. Whatever your interest, be it high-tech, agriculture, ancient history, the future, fashion, adventure, business or just plain fun, there are countless places in this tiny dynamo of a country to whet your appetite. A more fascinating and vital country does not exist on the face of the troubled earth.

About 150 Canadians (mainly from Toronto, with contingents from Montreal and the West) participated in the mission, which consisted of eight whirlwind days of travel and touring. From the moment we landed, we were plunged directly into the mainstream of the country, including the obligatory 8 a.m. traffic jam.

Our first day, we headed north, stopping to visit a high school at Pardes Channa, where young immigrants from the former Soviet Union study and work. That afternoon, under the guidance of a counsellor from Givat Chaviva, a kibbutz organization dedicated to creating bridges to peace, we toured a small area in the territories. It was a chance to view firsthand the crazy quilt of political and social problems that emerge when Arab villages and Israeli settlements sit side by side. To even the most seasoned visitor to Israel, the geographic realities and the political complications are baffling and defy simplistic solutions. By evening, we had travelled through Kiryat Shmonah all the way to the far north to stay at the peaceful kibbutz guesthouse of Kfar Giladi nestled in the Galilee near the snow-capped peak of Mt. Hermon.

We visited different areas of the country. We toured Kfar Rupin, one of the original kibbutzim of the Jordan Valley and enjoyed a hearty kibbutz lunch in their chadar ochel (dining room). We met with Ethiopian elders at their synagogue and community centre in Beersheva. We were regaled with a tasty Indian meal after touring the remarkable synagogue of the Kochin Indian community, who operate a flower-producing and exporting kibbutz at Nevatim. We even visited a "religious" kibbutz near Eilat, where members share their (Conservative) synagogue with a school for environmental studies.

We stopped at the ancient synagogue at Beit Alfa before our visit to the tarmac of the ultramodern Air Force base nearby. While we were ogling the F-16s and exchanging good-natured banter with the pilots, an emergency siren erupted, and two jets screamed off toward the north, reminding us that the country still fights for its daily survival.

Leaders in Israel criticize Vatican report

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli leaders last week reacted with disappointment to the Vatican statement on the Holocaust, with Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau, an Auschwitz survivor, saying it was "too little and too late."

Rabbi Lau praised the establishment of the commission that drew up the document, entitled We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah, but he added that the Church should have repeated the prayer traditionally recited by Jews on Yom Kippur: "For the sins which we have committed before You, we are guilty."

Rabbi Lau revealed that in a meeting in the Chief Rabbinate in Jerusalem with Cardinal Edward Cassidy, head of the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, under whose direction the document had been formulated, he had called for a clear statement on the silence of Christianity on the eve of the Holocaust and during the war. Rabbi Lau said a large part of the population that carried out the killing and mass destruction had been believing Catholics.

"There is no doubt that a clear condemnation by the Vatican at that time would have had the force to stop the terrible things done during the Holocaust," Rabbi Lau said.

He said he recalled from his childhood the anti-Jewish teachings of the Church. Jews had been afraid to walk by churches on Sunday, for fear of encountering those who emerged from anti-Jewish sermons, he said.

Rabbi Lau also criticized the failure to mention the silence of Pope Pius XII. He noted that the document had only praised that pope and made no mention of his "papering over" the sins of the Church or of his refusal to meet with the late chief rabbi of Palestine, Rabbi Yitzhak Herzog.

"You can't speak of rectifying the past without identifying the actions of individuals," Rabbi Lau said.

Rabbi David Rosen, director of the Anti-Defamation League's Israel office and the ADL's co-liaison to the Vatican, welcomed the document as "part of a historic process of self-criticism on the part of the Church of its past teaching and conduct."

However, he also expressed regret that the document failed to categorically identify the direct link between the Church's historic "teaching of contempt" toward the Jews and the cultural climate that facilitated the Holocaust.

Itzhak Minerbi, an expert on the Vatican, said that instead of examining the role of the Church and especially of Pope Pius XII, the document chose to place all the responsibility on the faithful sons and daughters of the Church. Minerbi said the document is far from the last word on the subject, and it was only the exaggerated hopes of some Jewish organizations that had led people to believe otherwise.

MK Shevah Weiss, a Holocaust survivor, said the document is important, but it did not erase the papal silence in the dark period of Nazism and Fascism.

He added that he is full of appreciation for the righteous gentiles, with whom, he said, "we will build a different future." However, he also expressed the Jewish disillusionment with all of European civilization and Christianity.

"Europe was a lake of frozen Jewish blood. On this continent of Beethoven, Goethe and the French Revolution, the ideas of humanism, Christianity and rationalism and the fruits of the French Revolution were terribly broken. Many Christians turned their crosses into swastikas," Weiss said.

Document disappoints profoundly

By RABBI LEON KLENICKI
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Why the profound disappointment in the Jewish community with the long-awaited Vatican document on the Roman Catholic Church and the Holocaust?

So much progress has been made in Catholic-Jewish relations since the historic Vatican II Nostra Aetate document, that when word came that the Vatican was going to issue a major document on the Church and the Holocaust, expectations of a dramatic conclusion to the recent progress were raised.

Pope John Paul II has personally taken many important steps to announce the Church's greater sensitivity to the Jewish people. Whether it was his visit to the synagogue in Rome, the first such visit by a pontiff, or establishing diplomatic relations with the State of Israel, condemning anti-Semitism as a sin or declaring the innate legitimacy of Judaism as a parent and sister religion to Christianity, the messages were positive and hopeful.

Moreover, in recent months, the bishops of Germany and France had taken greater Catholic sensitivity to the evils of the past to new levels in separate documents. The French statement on the Church's role during World War II, French Bishops' Declaration of Repentance, says clearly that the "Church of France failed in her mission as teacher of conscience," in the face of the Nazi plan to exterminate the Jews.

The German Catholic Bishops Conference on Jan. 23, 1995, on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, said: "Today the fact is weighing heavily on our minds that there were but individual initiatives to help persecuted Jews. Christians did not offer due resistance to racial anti-Semitism" during the time of the Third Reich.

It is in this context that the Vatican document on the Holocaust is so disappointing. Unlike the French and German documents, the Church specifically rejected a connection between the Holocaust and Christianity. It called the Holocaust the "work of a thoroughly modern neo-Pagan regime" and added that its "anti-Semitism had its roots outside of Christianity."

This notion belies the history of Christian anti-Semitism for centuries, which suffused Europe and created an environment that made the Holocaust possible. It undermines the major effort of so much interfaith dialogue in recent years that has focused on the disastrous consequences of delegitimizing another people and another religion.

Indeed, it was Pope John Paul II himself who convened an international meeting of Catholic scholars to consider the serious matter of anti-Judaism in the teaching and preaching of the Church.

If the history of the influences leading up to Nazism are distorted, so, too, are the descriptions of what took place during the Holocaust. The role of Pope Pius XII is presented in favorable fashion, but ignores the many opportunities that he had as a world religious leader to help stop the slaughter. The defence of Pope Pius XII in the document reinforces our belief that it is vital that the Church open its archives. Only then can a clear and complete picture clarify the Pope's policy and conduct during the war.

Unlike the German and French documents, in which those who stood up and rescued Jews were seen as exceptions, the Vatican document gives the impression that those who were evil, insensitive and acquiesced to the Final Solution were the exceptions to the overall Christian approach.

In truth, had this Vatican document appeared prior to Nostra Aetate, before the succession of remarkable steps taken by John Paul II, before the French and German statements, one might have termed it courageous for even looking at the Church's role during the Jewish tragedy and for its clear denunciation of anti-Semitism.

But this is 1998, two years before the millennium. It was hoped that this document would culminate the process of reconciliation between Christianity and Judaism.

Disappointed as we are, we are nevertheless committed to continuing the creative interfaith dialogue that projects a message of hope to both faith communities.

We are hopeful that under the leadership of Pope John Paul II, this can become the reality of our relationship for the new millennium.

Rabbi Klenicki is director of ADL Interfaith Affairs.

European rabbis express a differing view

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE — European rabbis have cautiously praised the Vatican's document of repentance for the Catholic Church's actions during the Holocaust.

The positive response by a group representing the European Conference of Rabbis distances them from the many Jewish leaders in America and Israel who were critical of the Church's failure in the document released this week to condemn the wartime pope, Pius XII, by name.

"We recognize that they can't do that," said Rabbi Moshe Rose, director of the conference.

"While we must express our disappointment that the Vatican did not accept responsibility for the centuries of persecution of the Jewish people, we recognize the significance of this declaration as a first step in the right direction," said an official statement issued at the end of three days of meetings in the Czech capital of Prague.

"What the Pope said is good, but it is only a beginning," said Rabbi Alain Goldmann, chief rabbi of Paris.

Rabbi Joseph Sitruk, chief rabbi of France, and Rabbi Ya'akov Dov Bleich, chief rabbi of Ukraine, echoed American Jewish leaders when they called for the Vatican to open its archives as a step toward Jewish-Catholic understanding.

The committee voted to bring the Vatican statement up for discussion at the May session of the full Conference of Rabbis.

Opinions

Politics and strange bedfellows

When Yossi Sarid, leader of Meretz, and David Levy, leader of Gesher, appeared together at a press conference to announce a joint list for the Histadrut elections, political pundits in Israel were surprised but intrigued.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

The Histadrut, Israel's trade union federation, is unique in that the country's political parties compete in elections for its governing council. This unusual practice dates back to the pre-state era, when the all-powerful Histadrut was not only a labor federation, but owner of one-third of the economy, as well as the provider of a wide range of services in housing, education, culture and health.

Over the last decade, the Histadrut has been weakened considerably, as most of its assets have been sold to pay off an enormous debt. Nevertheless, it retains the power to mobilize huge public and private sector unions, as the general strike of two months ago demonstrated to a frustrated Israeli public and an embattled finance minister. Throughout this period of reform, the Histadrut has maintained its historic – perhaps anachronistic – party structure. The ironic result is that the Likud faction in the Histadrut will vote for a strike to oppose the economic policy of a Likud-led government.

While the Histadrut has become less central in the development of economic policy, its elections are often a harbinger of developments to come in national politics. The election next June is proving to be no exception. I've commented earlier on the narrowing differences between Likud and Labor on political and economic questions. In the next Histadrut election, they will actually be running in a joint list and will back the incumbent secretary general, Amir Peretz. Their list will represent the establishment,while the Gesher-Meretz list will represent the dissident social challenge.

On the face of it, the two new allies have little in common. David Levy, a populist politician from the development town of Beit She'an, began his political career two decades ago in the Histadrut, as leader of the Likud faction. Levy resigned from the Netanyahu cabinet during the last budget negotiations, which he felt hurt the disadvantaged pockets in Israeli society, and he subsequently declared his intention to run for the next Knesset in an independent party.

Gesher's natural constituency is the Sephardi Israeli community, and in this battle, its main adversary is the ultra-Orthodox Shas party, which appeals to traditional Sephardim for ethnic rather than religious reasons.

On political questions, David Levy was considered a moderate pragmatist in the Netanyahu cabinet. He coined the popular phrase, "a government going nowhere," to describe his frustration with the lack of progress in negotiations with the Palestinians. Netanyahu, for his part, has been trying assiduously to return Levy to the cabinet in order to stabilize his majority, and to co-opt Levy, once again, to support his leadership. Gesher has little to lose and much to gain from an alliance with a fresh partner, Meretz, who is already in the Histadrut and as a result, has access to funding and political power.

Meretz comes to this new alliance from the left of the Labor party. While it includes a strong left-wing faction dating back to the radical, socialist Mapam party, it has generally been viewed as elitist, Ashkenazi and alienated. In the 1996 national election, Meretz's strong civil rights platform, its position in favor of separation of religion and state, its dovish stance on the Palestinian question – and its close affiliation with Labor – were seen as a significant cause of Labor's weak showing in the traditional, centrist, Sephardi community

The new alliance with Gesher is an attempt by Meretz to bridge that gap and to challenge the religious-social-ethnic agenda of Shas by providing an alternative voice with a social conscience that is not tied to a religious legislative agenda. In the Histadrut, Meretz and Gesher can cooperate on the social agenda that is in their mutual interest, and can try to broaden their respective appeals without compromising on the political differences that continue to separate them on the peace process.

Prescient observers have noted that the advent of peace with the Palestinians will force the two dominant Israeli parties to redefine their differences and to offer distinct social platforms, if they want to continue to exist as separate parties. Indeed, some analysts have predicted that the Labor and Likud mainstreams may merge over the next decade, while their more ideological edges will split off. Peace with the Palestinians is yet to come, but the beginnings of a realignment of political forces can already be discerned.

Jews and the entertainment business

A recent CBC documentary by Canadian Jewish filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, entitled Hollywoodism, describes the key role played by Jewish immigrants in the founding and development of the American film industry. Based on a book by Neal Gabler, the movie confirms what we – and anti-Semites – have long suspected. Jews have been statistically overrepresented in both the financial and the creative aspects of the entertainment business. It is a short step from that observation to the vicious canard that the Jews, in some collective, conspiratorial sense, control Hollywood.

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

One could also possibly construct a similar argument for the Canadian scene. People such as Izzy Asper, Garth Drabinsky, Harold Greenberg, Robert Lantos, Ed Mirvish and Moses Znaimer are just a few of the Canadian Jews who have played key innovative roles in the popular entertainment industry in Canada.

It is not clear what led many immigrant Jews in the United States into the movie business. Certainly there was an existing tradition of the Yiddish theatre in Europe and in New York, but it is not clear how, if at all, any of this influenced the pioneer moguls.

There were many industries in which the immigrant American Jews carved special niches, often to escape real or perceived anti-Semitism. These include the garment industry (both the needle trade and furriers), the junk business, retail trade and later on, real estate and development. Many or perhaps most large American department store chains have their roots in stores established by German Jewish immigrants in New York and elsewhere: Sears, Macy's, Gimbel's, Saks, Bergdorf-Goodman, Bloomingdales, Neiman-Marcus. The success of Jewish pioneers in the movie business was probably due more to their business acumen than to any passion for art or creativity.

It was also likely not due to any burning desire to use the movies as a vehicle for progressive social change. This was true for the early moguls. Many of Jews who worked later as writers, actors or directors did indeed share progressive views, and suffered under McCarthyism as a result.

What impact – if any – has the Jewish origin of these moguls had on the product they have produced? Certainly they and the writers and directors they employed brought an upbeat and ultimately liberalizing tradition to American popular culture.

As Jacobovici's film and the book suggest, they celebrated an America in which everything was possible, where injustice would be fought, and where dreams could be realized. This is most recently the case for television, where the typical liberal sensitivities of middle class New York Jews are echoed in TV sitcoms typified by Norman Lear's All in the Family. They could criticize and celebrate America at the same time.

It is hard to make a clear argument about the centrality of Jewishness or Judaism in these processes. As Hollywoodism describes, many of the moguls were profoundly ambivalent about their Jewish identity or heritage, and many were not schooled in traditional Judaic learning. Irving Howe has described how Jews involved in American popular culture sought to downplay their Jewishness and Jewish themes right into the 1960s. The early treatment of The Diary of Anne Frank, which minimized Jewish references, is a case in point.

It is probably the case that there is greater knowledge of Judaism and comfort with Jewish identity among the post-war Americans involved in popular entertainment than in the pioneer generation. This is ironic given the increasing evidence of intermarriage and assimilation among American Jews that have also accompanied this trend.

This idea of greater comfort would certainly apply to the Jewish Canadians involved in the contemporary entertainment scene. Unlike their American counterparts, they are a generation closer to the European experience, are less assimilated, and have come of age in a more liberal period where the rhetoric of Canadian multiculturalism has legitimized their cultural specificity.

One could argue that much of the so-called sensibility can be seen as an extension of a generic immigrant experience, rooted in memories of struggling parents or grandparents in the face of an exclusive North American Anglo-Protestant dominated society. This legacy of immigration and Jewish marginality would then be the foundation for allegedly unique Jewish perspectives in the entertainment business. Garth Drabinsky's recent production of Ragtime in New York would exemplify this linkage of the immigrant and minority struggle with the celebration of America and the New World.

Going beyond personal responsibility

Many years ago I attended a conference in Kyoto, Japan, which dealt with the subject Religion and Peace. As one of the Canadian delegates, I learned a great deal about the way others think and how they approach solutions to problems that I would see quite differently.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Ever since, I have received literature from Asia, primarily a magazine called Echoes of Peace. The articles are written from a variety of perspectives, among which the Buddhist is the most prominent. Their arguments are persuasive to a degree, but often tend to diverge from the Jewish way of looking at things. A recent issue provides an interesting example.

Kiku Yamaoka, a well-known professor of economics, contributes an article on The Perils and Promise of Interdependence. In it, he emphasizes the main reasons why, in our day, it is so difficult to reach a peaceful accommodation of our sometimes conflicting needs. This unfortunate reality is highlighted by two major factors: the increase in poverty around the world and the ever-widening gulf that divides the poor from the rich; and secondly, the population explosion in developing countries that account for two-thirds of the world's population and are a major factor in the growth of world poverty.

How are we to approach the possibilities of a better world under such circumstances? Yamaoka emphasizes the two natural elements: an international arrangement on the one hand and personal development on the other. To him, as to Buddhism in general, the latter is the essential one.

He says: "We have to contemplate the potential of individual behavior. Love (compassion and neighborly love), sympathy, consideration, tolerance and patience are required, but it is difficult to equip human beings in their natural state with these virtues. This being the case, I believe that it is incumbent upon religions to bend themselves to provide the motivation for virtue."

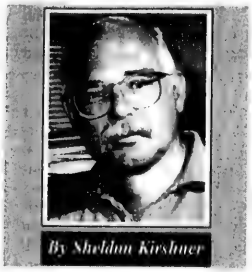
This is the essential Buddhist approach to the improvement of human society. The individual must reform his or her ways. Then, and then only, can society be changed.

The Jewish perspective does not deny the responsibility of the individual. After all, the whole mitzvah system is based on each individual's obligation vis-a-vis God and our fellow humans. But, as the prophets of the Bible made crystal clear, we have a responsibility to create a society with just laws and a just government. Judaism is firmly committed to the need for working together to do God's will – that is why the whole structure of our prayer book is kept in the plural. We pray together, and when we confess our sins, we do it as a community.

I am told that on the West Coast, and especially in California, many Jewish youth are attracted to various forms of Buddhism, with its program of contemplation, meditation and enlargement of the soul. From the Jewish perspective this may indeed be a worthy objective, but only in connection with a system of mitzvot that encompasses society as a whole and our responsibilties toward it.

The Kirshner File

Most Israelis, Palestinians back Oslo process



By Sheldon Kirshner

Battered by unilateral Israeli actions, Palestinian terrorism, differing interpretations of obligations, and periodic spasms of violence, the Oslo peace process, all but frozen for the past year, has plummeted to a nadir.

Surveying the bleak situation recently, Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, pronounced the Oslo accords virtually dead: "I may say that this agreement is almost uttering its last breath."

His sombre assessment notwithstanding, public opinion polls consistently show that the majority of Israelis and Palestinians back the Oslo process as the only viable alternative to war. Still, support for Oslo has risen and fallen, depending on circumstances on the ground.

It reached highwater marks with the signing of the Declaration of Principles in September 1993, the withdrawal of the Israeli army from major West Bank towns in the autumn of 1995, and the redeployment of Israeli forces from Hebron in January 1997.

It sank precipitously following Baruch Goldstein's killing spree in Hebron in February 1994, the spate of Islamic fundamentalist suicide bombings in Israel in 1996, the eruption of Palestinian rioting throughout the territories six months later during the East Jerusalem "tunnel crisis," and the decision by Israel, exactly a year ago, to build the Har Choma housing project on what is clearly disputed land.

For all these reasons, the peace process remains in the worst shape it has been in years, the New York City-based Israel Policy Forum and the Centre for International Relations at the University of California in Los Angeles observed in a recent report called Peace Pulse.

"The Middle East today is like a pot that keeps boiling," the report warns. "If we don't turn off the heat by defusing tensions with a new peace initiative, the water will boil down and eventually there will be a fire."

Despite the gloom, Peace Pulse believes that there remains "great underlying support for the peace process among both Israelis and Palestinians."

This finding is buttressed by the first joint public opinion survey ever conducted by Israeli and Palestinian pollsters. Released earlier this year by the Jerusalem Media and Communications Centre and the Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University, the poll found that 59 percent of Israeli Jews and 68 percent of Palestinians supported the Oslo peace process. Counting Israeli Arabs, who comprise 20 percent of Israel's overall population, the figure among Israelis climbs to about 70 percent.

Polls show preference for peace

Gabriel Ben-Dor, a Haifa University political scientist, points out that the present Israeli prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, was elected on the understanding that he would press ahead with the peace process, albeit more cautiously. Certainly, he was not given a mandate to end it.

Indeed, a survey taken after the last suicide bombing in Israel in September 1997 disclosed that 55 percent of Israelis wanted Netanyahu to move ahead in negotiations with the Palestinians.

According to the Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research, public support for the peace process has remained essentially stable.

In April, May and June 1996, before the Likud swept back into power, Israelis supported Oslo by a margin of 56 percent, 53 percent and 53 percent, respectively.

When respondents were asked whether they generally considered themselves supporters of the peace process, 41.8 percent said that they were somewhat supportive and 34.1 percent replied that they were greatly supportive. In other words, 75.9 percent generally favored it.

Among Palestinians, the mood has fluctuated wildly, from a low of 37 percent who supported the peace process in the aftermath of Baruch Goldstein's rampage to a high of 82 percent who backed it after Israel's withdrawal from much of Hebron, the Nablus-based Centre for Palestinian Studies and Research says.

In general, however, upwards of two-thirds of Palestinians support the peace process, the pro-Palestinian Jerusalem Media and Communications Centre reckons.

Yet when Palestinians are asked whether Israel is interested in proceeding with it, 89 percent say no, the Beit Sahur-based Palestinian Centre for Public Opinion reports.

Other surveys sampling Palestinian views have found a disturbing acceptance of suicide bombings. For example, 49 percent said they supported the bombing of a Tel Aviv cafe last March which claimed the lives of three Israelis. In this connection, a 1997 study by Israel's Foreign Ministry concluded that support for suicide attacks by Islamic theologians would legitimize such acts.

Israelis, too, were left aghast by a Palestinian survey which found that 77 percent of Palestinians would have supported an Iraqi strike against Israel had the United States made good on its threat to bomb Iraq unless it fully complied with United Nations resolutions.

In light of these surveys, how does one reconcile Palestinian support for the peace process with Palestinian sympathy for suicide bombings and Iraqi attacks against Israel?

Frustration with the slow pace of the peace process, plus the lack of an economic "peace dividend," engender Palestinian extremism. Uri Savir, the former director-general of Israel's Foreign Ministry, points to a third factor: efforts at true reconciliation have not been accepted by either Arabs (or Israelis) at the grassroots level. To put it another way, the idea of peace has not as yet filtered down to the street level.

Gilbert's photo of Herzog turned into Israeli stamp

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Most photographers are happy if their images survive a few decades of handling or exposure to light.

The work of Toronto master portrait photographer Al Gilbert, on the other hand, is looking at more enduring recognition – again.

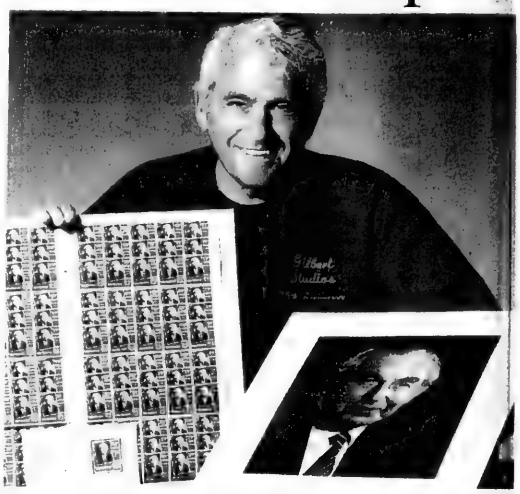
For the second time in his remarkable career, one of Gilbert's images has been made into an Israeli postage stamp.

The first time was in 1970, when Israel issued a stamp bearing a Gilbert portrait of Levi Eshkol, the country's prime minister from 1963 to 1969.

Now, Israel has issued a 5.35 shekel stamp with a photo of the late president Chaim Herzog, taken by Gilbert when Herzog visited Canada in 1989.

It's the sort of honor one associates with the legendary photographer Yousuf Karsh, whose renowned 1941 portrait of a scowling Winston Churchill was made into a British and a Canadian stamp.

Gilbert, often compared with Karsh, whom he has photographed, takes the whole thing in stride.



Toronto master lensman Al Gilbert and his portrait of Chaim Herzog, which appears on a new Israeli postage stamp. [Gilbert Photo]

"I've photographed every Israeli prime minister since [David] Ben-Gurion," the 75-year-old master notes casually. Missing from his crammed downtown studio's walls is Benjamin Netanyahu, but Gilbert is confident it's only a matter of time before the set of prime ministerial portraits is brought up to date.

(The only prime minister he's not snapped was Moshe Sharett, who served briefly from 1954 to 1955).

Gilbert's walls resemble an Israeli hall of fame. But these are more than mere head-and-shoulders shots. The personalities of each leader – Ben-Gurion, Eshkol, Golda Meir, Yitzhak Rabin, Menachem Begin, Yitzhak Shamir and Shimon Peres – jump off the photo paper. So much so, that Leah Rabin has asked Gilbert to supply 3,500 full color, 16 x 20 inch portraits of her slain husband for every classroom in Israel.

Gilbert is looking for a benefactor for the project, whose cost could exceed $100,000.

But he has agreed to supply Brandeis University in the United States with copies of all the prime ministers' portraits to mark both the school's and Israel's 50th anniversaries.

Founded by his father Nathan, Gilbert's Studios is marking its 75th birthday this year. Al's been at it himself since 1945, and included in his amazing portfolio of business, entertainment and political leaders are the likenesses of Frank Sinatra, Prince Charles, Oscar Peterson, Pope John Paul and countless others.

These days, Gilbert lectures widely and wears well the unofficial title of ambassador of Canadian photography.

He describes his art as the marrying of the subject with his or her background. "It's journalistic portraiture," he explains, and adds with a sigh, "it's a dying art."

Lustgarten leaving Yiddish portfolio

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yiddish is a language for all ages, spoken for its robustness and its key to the riches of Ashkenazi culture!

This is the credo of Sylvia Lustgarten as she steps down after 11 years as director of the committee for Yiddish, UJA Federation.

The daughter of Montreal Yiddish poet J.I. Segal, Lustgarten firmly believes that in those 11 years, Yiddish has passed through a transition period.

Instead of being kept alive for nostalgic reasons, she says, it has reached a time when young people are ready to grasp it as the only way to understand the Jewish culture of a bygone era. All that is needed is for the community to come up with creative ways of bringing people into the Yiddish fold.

To Lustgarten, Yiddish is as natural as breathing. She was an effective emissary for the language wherever she went. Whenever there was a large meeting, she was there handing out leaflets encouraging people to attend Yiddish classes

In retirement, she is putting her optimism about the future of Yiddish to the test by serving as a volunteer in the feasibility study for a Yiddish centre in Toronto. And she'll continue her hobby of painting as well.

A longtime social worker in Toronto and Montreal before joining the committee for Yiddish, she was raised in "a very Yiddish culture atmosphere" in Montreal and remembers fondly the hours spent in the Jewish Public Library.

"If Vilna was the Jerusalem of Poland, then Montreal was the Vilna of Canada."

In her opinion, the century of assimilation for Jews in North America, when parents wanted their children to speak English not Yiddish, is coming to a close. And ahead, she says, is the new millennium, when young people will study Yiddish as they would Greek or other languages, to delve into the treasures of the Ashkenazi culture of eastern Europe.

During Lustgarten's tenure, Yiddish classes for adults were expanded with the cooperation of the North York Board of Education, although because of tight budgets, seniors can no longer attend the classes free. A total of 75 children attend Heritage language classes in Yiddish sponsored by the North York and York Region boards of education.

Lustgarten's career as a social worker in Toronto included her time with the task force on services for disabled people, when she initiated the process which led to the National Council of Jewish Women's apartment building on Bathurst Street that houses people with disabilities and others.

A rescue not realized

By LESLIE ZEEV MOZES

As my close families' only survivor of the Holocaust, I feel morally obliged to speak out and respond to the book, The Myth of Rescue, by Prof. W.D. Rubinstein.

My first knowledge of this controversial book came from Joseph Serge's article in The Canadian Jewish News (Sept. 18, 1997), in which he said the author's conclusion was that the Western Allies could not have saved more Jewish lives from the genocide conducted by Nazi Germany during World War II.

I would like to focus on the issue of the rescue of the Hungarian Jews by the Western democracies, a rescue that was never realized but could have saved tens of thousands of innocent lives in the last stages of the war.

I agree with the author about the Nazi killers' determination to complete the extermination of the Jewish people up the last days of the war. But I adamantly question the humanitarian consciousness of the Western Allies or their willingness to have some plan of action to stop, or at least to slow down, the deportation of Hungarian Jews to the Nazi death camps.

The tragedy of the destruction of the Hungarian Jewish community was that it took place just one year before the end of the war, when the world, including Germany, knew that the Allied forces were winning the war.

The last transport from Hungary left in early July 1944. Southern and eastern Hungary were liberated in October 1944. Clearly, bombing Auschwitz, the main extermination camp or the railway lines leading to it, would have slowed down the deportation and killing.

As a young teenager in Auschwitz, frightened and hungry, I watched the Allied planes passing above the camp. I wondered why those enormous forces did not care and did not act to stop the killing.

The explanation given by the Western Allies' war departments was that the bombing of the Auschwitz crematoriums would have been a difficult task and would have resulted in the death of many inmates in the camp. This is not acceptable to any survivors of the Holocaust. If that was a real consideration, then by the same token, they should not have bombed any of the factories in Germany, where tens of thousands of Jewish and non-Jewish slaves worked day and night.

Rubinstein claimed that bombing the railway lines leading to Auschwitz would not have been effective and would have diverted air power from other, strategically more important targets, and thus prolonged the war.

This assessment was also wrong in light of thorough investigation. The undisturbed flow of deportees to the concentration camps brought much needed manpower to the German war effort enabling the Nazis to extend the war.

. The swift deportation of the rural Hungarian Jewish population was only possible because no decisive action was taken by the Western Allies. This gave the Germans and their Hungarian allies a free hand with Hungarian Jews in the final stage of the war.

Rubinstein's final conclusion was that we should put the blame where it belongs – on Nazi Germany – and not on the Western democracies. According to his research, the best thing the Western Allies could do was to win the war as quickly as possible and save the lives of those who were still alive.

As a survivor of the Hungarian Jewish community, I have to state loudly and clearly that I cannot accept the writer's conclusions about the fate of my family and the fate of the Hungarian Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

By accepting Rubinstein's conclusions, we have to agree also that European Jewry's fate was sealed in 1939 at the beginning of World War II. According to the writer, there was no way to save European Jewry. They were doomed to be destroyed.

If we accept Rubinstein's conclusions, then we are knowingly encouraging any future tyrant or ruling party to do whatever they wish to achieve their goals, through genocide, ethnic cleansing and destroying communities. Maybe the latest massacres in Bosnia, Rwanda and Cambodia were the result of similar thinking. The perpetrators never anticipated any serious retaliation for their atrocities.

It is encouraging that recently a few nations have reluctantly admitted their direct and indirect involvement in the Holocaust and their lack of opposition and action to end it. Therefore, it is high time to put some blame on the Western democracies for their unwillingness to take charge in slowing down the systematic genocide in Europe.

Let's hope that the new humanitarian approach will bring about a better and safer new world order, where the safety and human rights of all minorities will be protected.

A case of Jew hatred

The Old Religion*, by David Mamet (Simon & Schuster, $32.50)

The facts of the Leo Frank case appear to be simple. In April 1913, Mary Phagan, a teenage worker at the National Pencil Factory in Atlanta, was murdered and her body left in the factory basement. After investigating for several days, the police arrested Leo Frank, the factory manager. They also arrested a janitor, Jim Conley, who confessed to having helped Frank dispose of the body. Both men were indicted, and Frank was sentenced to death. Later, when the governor commuted his sentence to life, enraged citizens kidnapped Frank, took him to Mary Phagan's hometown and lynched him.

But the Leo Frank case was not simple. At the beginning of the investigation, the police inadvertently destroyed or lost pieces of evidence. Once they chose Frank as the killer, they coerced, mistreated and tortured witnesses into providing statements against him. Some were held in jail until they signed false statements.

The prosecutor, eager to use the trial to advance his political career, kept public opinion boiling. Daily, he released anti-Frank testimony, even when it was absurd and clearly incorrect.

Several weeks after the murder, a witness testified that Conley had admitted to him that he had killed Mary Phagan. This testimony was so credible that the Grand Jury wanted to indict Conley in place of Frank. The prosecutor, afraid of losing face, barely persuaded the Grand Jury to stay with the Frank indictment.

Conley was only believable because of the atmosphere surrounding the trial. Politicians and newspapers stirred up anti-Semitism with stories that Jewish law allows rape of non-Jewish women and tales about the millions of Jewish dollars being spent to influence the people of Georgia. The judge, the defence lawyers and probably the jurors were threatened with death if Frank was acquitted.

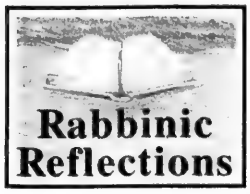
Until the end of the trial, the case remained a local or Southern affair. With the death sentence it became a national cause. It prompted B'nai Brith to begin the Anti-Defamation League. The newly formed American Jewish Committee mobilized its members. In 1986, the State of Georgia awarded Frank a partial posthumous pardon.

Now, David Mamet, well known essayist, novelist, screenwriter and playwright, has written a novel about what he calls "An American pogrom with one victim and a vast outpouring of Jew hating."

The author tries to take the reader into Frank's mind as he awaits trial and eventual death. The chapters are short and peppered with monosyllabic dialogue. But Frank's thoughts are turgid, abstract and hard to follow – even when in prison he is visited by a local rabbi, studies Hebrew and undergoes a spiritual awakening.

Occasionally, there are touches of the author's deftness and psychological acuity, but The Old Religion is a literary experiment that just doesn't work.

The conclusion is stark and moving. "A photographer took a picture showing the mob, one boy grinning at the camera, the body hanging, the legs covered by a blanket tied around the waist. The photo, reproduced as a postcard, was sold for many years in stores throughout the South."



Linking Purim, Pesach

By RABBI MAURY KELMAN

Beyond the alliterative connection, we find many links between Purim and Pesach. Perhaps this is best reflected in the midrash that captures Mordecai's astonishment upon hearing that Esther has called for a three-day fast that coincides with Pesach.

In countering Mordecai's objection to this seemingly incongruous fasting on such a joyful festival, Esther rhetorically asks, "Wise man of Israel why do we have Pesach?"

In this cryptic question, Esther points to the overarching themes of both these holidays. We have Pesach to reinforce the message of the Divine Providence that subtly, perhaps too subtly, underlies our existence.

On Pesach, God clearly intervened in the natural world, rescuing the Jewish people from an almost hopeless situation and transforming them into a free nation. While we recall this meta-historical miracle daily, during Pesach we burst forth in clear, euphoric praise for God's Providence that continually sustains His "holy nation."

Why, then, did Esther proclaim a fast at this time? Esther, in this instance exhibiting greater insight than her mentor, was stressing this point about Pesach. The Jewish people were in a great crisis threatening their continued existence. Everything seemed lost as the great Persian empire, led by the nefarious Haman in cooperation with Achashverosh prepared to destroy the powerless populace. God, in the eyes of many, had abandoned His once beloved nation to the rule of nature which dictates that the powerful majority defeats the friendless minority.

Imagine the bitter irony of this occurring right before Pesach, the time that Haman chose to cast the lot against Jewish continuity. Yet Esther firmly rejects the prevalent view that the Jews no longer merit Divine Providence and that their fate is left to chance. By motivating the Jews to fast and to beseech God to save His people, Esther is confident that God will intervene and send a thundering sign that He indeed guides our existence.

What more appropriate time to inspire such a message than Pesach, when we stress this very idea. This was not the occasion for a relaxed seder — the situation called for a creative, penetrating response, which is exactly what Esther provided. Purim and Pesach thus represent two models of Divine Providence, the Pesach example of God's clear role, and the Purim archetype where God's role is hidden.

Truthfully, we often wonder if there really is a Divine plan for the world. Similarly, we often ponder the seeming randomness of events. In lieu of the clear miracles and signs that God sent us on Pesach, we currently live in more of a Purim "existence."

As this just celebrated holiday teaches us, the blueprints of God's plan most definitely exist, but are not always visible to the human eye. Our primary aim, however, should not necessarily be to discover the inner machinations of the universe, but rather to strengthen our commitment to God and each other as exemplified by both holidays. In this merit, may we all merit a joyous and meaningful Purim-Pesach season.

Rabbi Kelman is the chair of Kedma, an international student organization, and the founding rabbi of Kehillat Moriah in Jerusalem.

Provocative online Haggadot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Over the next few weeks, you are probably going to reach into a familiar drawer and pull out a stack of well-worn and slightly wine-stained Haggadot ready for another Passover. Nothing will ever replace those Haggadot and their special memories. But if you take a trip down the Jewish Highway, you will find many stimulating and provocative online Haggadot that could give you new insights and make you shine at this year's seders.

Most of the Haggadot below are in English, some with Hebrew sections. None require Hebrew fonts. Please be aware that many of these Haggadot contain G-d's name and should be treated accordingly.

If you are looking for traditional Haggadot, I recommend Laurance Wieder's Red Sea Haggada [http://members.aol.com/wiseacrebk/wiederlhag.html] and the Chabad Haggada [http://www.chabad.org/gopher/texts/hagada.exp/hagada.htm]. For an overview of seder customs see Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.virtual.co.il./city_services/holidays/pesach/sedview.htm] and for more detail, take a look at Project Genesis' Divrei Torah on Pesach [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/pesach/].

There are many online Haggadot that represent a great deal of individual effort. Robert Parnes' Hagada [http://www-personal.umich.edu/~bparnes/HAGGADAH/seder.html] is a synthesis of the traditional and the modern and is set out clearly with responsive readings. Rabbi Mark Hurvitz has printed his own Growing Haggada for the past 20 years and now is making it available on line [http://www.computergeeks.com/msh/what/haggadah/5757.html]. He begins with an interesting essay on how the events of Passover have shaped the Jewish people and why the story retains its relevance today.

Another unique version is The Anonymous Haggada: A Synthesis of The Passover Ritual and Liturgy With The Twelve Steps of Recovery By Hershy Worch [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/passover/12_step/]. Worch draws a parallel between the Israelites' trek to freedom and the modern-day recovery program used by people to free themselves from various addictions and dependencies.

One very different seder took place last year in Washington. After expressing interest in the Jews' secret of survival in exile, the Dalai Lama was invited to a seder in Washington, D.C., hosted by the city's Reform community. The Buddhist leader attended wearing his traditional saffron robe and a kippah. The Seder for Tibet Web site also includes a radio news report with excerpts from the seder [http://www.allcorp.com/TIBETSEDER/].

If you would like to have your Haggadah sung to you, there are several very good audio sites to go to. Let's Sing the Seder [http://www.ou.org/chagim/pesach/pesachguide/kids/kidsaudio.html] has a medley of all the favorites, in addition to some new tunes for the holiday. The Jewish Music Network has a few more songs, including a lovely Dayenu medley by the Miami Boys' Choir [http://www.jewish-music.com/pesach/]. And there are links to some instrumental versions at Passover on the Net [http://www.holidays.net/passover/]. Over at 613.org, you'll find audio how-to instructions for conducting your own Seder in addition to the entire Seder on line [http://www.613.org/passover.html].

Do you have trouble every year remembering where the maror or the charoset goes on your seder plate? Then click on the Virtual Seder Plate for a clear explanation [http://www.shamash.org/reform/uahc/congs/nj/nj006/seder/plate.html].

And last, probably the shortest Haggadah on record. What happens when the story of the Exodus is rewritten by someone who spends a bit too much time on a computer? You get The Haggada in Computer Code [http://www.starkman.com/aviva/haggadah.html]. Next week: Pesach, kids and the Internet.

Ben Gurion U Associates to hold gala

TORONTO — On June 24, the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University (BGU) will celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary with a gala Ambassadors Ball at the Sheraton Centre Toronto Hotel.

The concept of the Ambassadors Ball reflects Ben-Gurion University's role as a goodwill ambassador for Israel. By sharing its know-how in desert research and reclamation, water management, public health and education, Ben-Gurion University has forged ties that have led to better relations between Israel and her neighbors and to new opportunities in other parts of the world.

Proceeds from the event will establish the Toronto Prize for Excellence in Research at Ben-Gurion University to recognize special achievement in science and technology, medicine or the humanities for the betterment of mankind, said Michael Wynston, president of the Toronto chapter.

The annual Toronto Prize will be awarded to an outstanding BGU researcher, in order to further work and study in his or her discipline. The project will also link, in perpetuity, the Toronto community and BGU.

A number of leaders will be recognized at the ball for their outstanding support for Israel and the Canadian Jewish community throughout many years. Special guests of honor will be Mayor Mel Lastman and his wife Marilyn.

For more information, contact Claire Horowitz, executive director, Ontario region, at telephone 416-665-8054 or fax 416-665-8055.

FEDERATIONS HELP THWART CONVERSION BILL

A senior official with the Jewish Agency has credited the worldwide UJA Federation system, which supports the organization, with being instrumental in halting passage of the controversial conversion legislation before the Israeli Knesset. The bill, which now has no chance of passing, would have formalized, through legislation, the practice of only recognizing conversions conducted by the Chief Rabbinate.

David Bernstein, Director of Missions at the Agency and founder of the first Reform kibbutz, said "world Jewry, through local Federations, had a direct impact on Prime Minister Netanyahu's decision to appoint a commission," headed by Israel's Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman to examine the issue. Avrum Burg, Chairman of the Jewish Agency, led efforts to bring world Jewry's opinion to bear on the commission.

The commission recommended a new institute, in which representatives of all religious streams would participate to prepare people for conversions. The Chief Rabbinate would undertake the conversions. The recommendation was recently endorsed by the Knesset.

"The message was loud and clear," explained Bernstein, who visited Toronto last week to meet UJA Federation officials and other community members. "Jewish peoplehood would be ripped apart at the seams if the Knesset had passed the bill."

Immediately after the legislation was introduced, Federations around the world received emotional phone calls and letters from community members upset about its provisions.

In Toronto, UJA Federation passed a resolution expressing opposition to the bill and promoted community unity through discussions with Reform, Conservative and Orthodox leaders. An advisory committee to UJA Federation President Joseph Steiner, with members from all religious affiliations, agreed to maintain ongoing dialogue.

Bernstein was also in town to tell campaign supporters how important it is to support the Jewish Agency's efforts in rescuing Jews from danger

Co-Chairs touched by tour

By Adi Neuberger

The new leaders of UJA Federation's upcoming annual campaign, Larry Tanenbaum and Brent Belzberg, aren't wasting any time learning about community needs.

The two Campaign Co-Chairs were escorted by Morris Zbar, UJA Federation Vice-President of Community Planning and Development, to several UJA Federation beneficiary agencies last week to learn first hand about the help they provide.

Over the next three years, UJA Federation plans to raise its annual campaign total of $36.5 million to $50 million in order to fill the widening funding gaps left by government cutbacks and to continue to meet increasing domestic and overseas needs.

The first stop on the half-day whirlwind tour was the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, where Belzberg and Tanenbaum were greeted by the Centre's Executive Director Esta Wall, and treated to a special performance by the Awareness Players on elder abuse in the community.

"The two women who acted in the play were absolutely fantastic," said Belzberg. "I was in awe of their courage and touched by their message – not to forget about our vulnerable seniors."

"The vulnerable are likely to be significant beneficiaries of the increased funding which we will acquire through our 1999 campaign," noted Belzberg.

Then it was off to the Reena Foundation's Battle Centre for the developmentally challenged where the two met with some of Reena's more than 300 clients and staff. "We're having to fight harder and harder to keep our government funding," Brenda Rothenberg, Reena's Resource Manager, told her visitors.

Reena, which is the only Jewish agency in Toronto servicing developmentally challenged adults, runs 22 group homes in addition to a myriad of recreational and skills development day programs at the Battle Centre.

Later, at Jewish Vocational Services, which operates vocational training and employment counseling programs, Tanenbaum and Belzberg were briefed by JVS Executive Director Joel Shapiro, followed by a visit to the computer lab and shop to meet JVS clients preparing for a return to the workforce.

The tour ended at the Bathurst Jewish Centre where Executive Director Deborah Pinsky provided an overview of the services available at the Centre, such as camping experiences for children with special needs and the Stroke Recovery Program.

"This has been a wonderful experience for me," said Tanenbaum, who's been a leading supporter of Toronto's Jewish community for years.

"Seeing first hand what our agencies do and talking with the people who deliver the services has given me an even greater understanding and appreciation for the important role of UJA Federation," added Tanenbaum. "It's something everyone involved with the campaign, donors and volunteers alike, should experience."

Israeli centre shelters children

Tali (not her real name) is a friendly, spirited 10 year old, whose parents are drug abusers. So, when Tali's school day ends at 1 p.m., home is the last place she wants to be. Instead, thanks to UJA Federation donations, Tali turns to a home environment centre in Or Yehuda, near Tel Aviv, where she finds support and comfort.

The home environment centre is a unique Israeli concept to shelter children after school from difficult domestic situations. The Schwartz Centre, in Or Yehuda, cares for 14 youngsters from 6 - 10 years old, through education, counselling, camaraderie and a lot of love. "At the end of the day, they talk about their experiences at home," says centre director, Nurit Buria.

Abuse is common for home environment participants. So is neglect. "One of the children lives in a hut, with little food and no water," Buria explains. "The children often ask us to give them more time before they have to go home or they deliberately delay cleaning up here so they can stay." When they do depart, communication with parents is often minimal. "They play on the street or go straight to bed," Buria adds.

Most of the parents, according to Buria, recognize there's something wrong and want their children to stay at the centre. "They're ashamed of what's happening at home. We meet with the parents and talk about mutual expectations."

Despite the caring encouragement of seven devoted counsellors, dedication only goes so far for these deprived children, many of whom are academic underachievers. "There hasn't been a psychologist here for a year," says a worried Buria. The centre staff is generally low paid, and despite the presence of other home environment centres across Israel, dozens of children are waiting to get in.

For more information about Or Yehuda, call (416) 631-5735.

Israel Week held at UBC

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Compared to other Israel Weeks at the University of British Columbia (UBC) in the recent past, this year's event had a broader focus, said Nava Mizrahi, Israel Week student coordinator.

"In previous years, Israel Week tended to concentrate on the peace process," said Mizrahi, a first-year Arts student. "This year we decided to expand our focus beyond politics to include Israeli society as a whole."

Israel Week has been presented annually by the Hillel Foundation of B'nai Brith on the campus of UBC for more than 20 years. This year's event, which took place March 2 to 6, featured a variety of exhibits, speakers and special events.

The keystone of Israel Week was a display of photographs, art and text on view in the Student Union Building (SUB) for the entire week. The works touched on many themes of Israeli and Jewish life, including the history of Israel, archaeology, art and architecture, technology and science, Holocaust remembrance, religious and ethnic diversity, the peace process, geography, aliyah and the Hebrew language.

Mizrahi said UBC students showed a great deal of interest in the exhibit. "There were a lot of questions about Israel, such as 'How do I get on a kibbutz?' 'What's it like to live in Israel?' 'I want to live in Israel for a year. What do I have to do?' and 'Is the Palestine-Israel situation likely to change?'"

Positive image

In addition to the display, representatives of a number of Israel-based local organizations, including the Canadian Technion Society, Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, Canadian Zionist Federation and the Israel Program Centre were in the SUB to talk to students.

In addition to Mizrahi, the Hillel team that put together and presented Israel Week included program director Daniella Weber and a 10-student Israel Week committee.

"The purpose of Israel Week is to promote a positive image of Israel to students and faculty of UBC, to give them the bigger picture of the country they don't get from the media," said Mizrahi.

Hillel benefits from the week-long event, too, she noted. "Israel Week is an opportunity for Hillel to promote itself to the university community and to potential members, and it gets Hillel members more involved in their organization."

According to Weber, Hillel has 150 signed-up members, but about 200 regularly participating students. UBC has 33,000 students, of whom 750 to 1,000 are Jewish.

One of the high points of Israel Week was a discussion led by a panel of four Vancouver rabbis on the question, "Should religious law be the state law of Israel?" The panel members were Rabbi Ross Singer (Shaarey Tefillah), Rabbi Philip Bregman (Temple Sholom), Rabbi David Mivasair (Or Shalom) and Rabbi Daniel Epstein (Maimonides Secondary School). Each spoke for five minutes, after which the floor was opened to questions from the approximately 40 students in the audience.

Other Israel Week events included: the films Under the Domim Tree and Summer in La Goulette; Zionism Day, which featured a discussion led by Ron Harash of the Israel Program Centre on the topic, Israel Then and Now: What Happened to the Zionist Dream?; and an Israel 50th birthday cake, which was cut by Brigadier-General Yitzack Fuchs, Jewish National Fund shaliach. Fuchs also discussed the peace process.

Culture Coordinator

TORONTO — Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto plans to hire a full-time arts and culture coordinator, thanks to a major gift from the Zukerman Foundation. The new staffer will supervise a wide variety of Jewish arts and culture events, including the Jewish student Arts Festival, according to a recent JCS news release.

The first Arts Festival, held at the beginning of March, was coordinated by student Sidura Ludwig.

"The tone has been set," said JCS executive director Zac Kaye at the event. "All of us present witnessed the pride our Toronto Jewish students felt as they expressed themselves positively as Jews."

Skobac Honored

TORONTO — Rabbi Michael Skobac, who is leaving JCS in June to work full time at Jews for Judaism, was honored last week at a Thursday evening student Beit Midrash entitled The Sensual Jew: An Encounter with the Sources. The event took place at North York Memorial Hall, with facilitators including rabbis, educators and lay people.

Entertainer delights Purim crowd

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Ellen Steigman has entertained Canadians on both coasts. Now she'd like to meet folks in the middle of the country.

The New York stand-up comedian regaled a Halifax audience with a 40-minute routine of topical Jewish humor, based on observations of everyday life.

Some was self-deprecating, some fed off a quick study she made of the Halifax area and all of it brought loud guffaws and knowing nods from the Purim-festive crowd.

Brought to the community by Atlantic Jewish Council, Steigman also appeared in front of the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation.

The 29-year-old ("I'm celebrating my first 29th birthday tomorrow," she said) has been doing her shtick for almost a year. She has performed in Vancouver for Western Canada Hillel, a branch of the American national organization with whom she worked for a time after graduating from Brandeis University in Waltham, Mass.

"When I was with Hillel, I participated in a conference talent show. I did a stand-up routine and everyone loved it. A year later, I attended a five-year reunion at Brandeis and wanted to sound like someone who was doing something cool. I said I was a comedian."

To make herself believable, she made a date at a comedy club and did a seven-minute spot. "I was hooked. I've done about 20 or more spots so far and do temporary secretarial work to put food on the table."

She admits she never knew she was funny but found it important to be so at the family dinner table. "There were always puns and jokes flying around as we were eating. And in college, I found I had a knack for making people laugh."

After her first year at Brandeis, she took a stand-up comedy class but wanted to go to Israel. "I knew I couldn't do stand-up in Israel, but spent a year there. Back home, I went into Jewish communal service. I worked as an administrative assistant at the national Hadassah office in the United States and then was recruited by Hillel to recruit and work with students on small campuses."

She writes all her own material, doesn't have an agent and knows, if she hustles enough, she could do comedy full time.

Born in Chicago and raised in Philadelphia, Steigman has always been involved in Jewish activities. She was president of the Pennsylvania chapter of North American Federation of Temple Youth, in a district that also included part of New Jersey, Ohio, and West Virginia. "It showed me I could get up in front of people. That's where I found myself."

Among her routines are Why There's No Such Thing as a Romantic Jewish Dinner and Life in New York: Do These Things Happen Just To Me?

She says she's always been a professional Jew and enjoys spreading humor to Jewish audiences. "This is challenging, running my own business. I glad I can be very Jewish, but not with an organization."

Teachers take their fight for holiday leave to court

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish teachers fighting for paid religious leave on the High Holy Days have finally had their day in court.

The Charter of Rights challenge by 66 Jewish teachers in Winnipeg's public school system was scheduled to be heard in Court of Queen's Bench March 18 to 20.

Richard Swyston, a Jewish teacher who has taught in the Fort Garry School Division for 25 years, is looking forward to a positive outcome.

"We have been working on this for three years," he says. "I am told by legal friends that this case has been moving comparatively quickly."

John Wiens, superintendent of the Seven Oaks School Division, says that his board is watching the case with interest. "We have teachers of other religious faiths that the decision may also apply to," Wiens says.

"While we respect and honor other religious faiths, the question is who pays?"

Diane Beresford, Manitoba Teachers' Society (MTS) president, agrees that the issue and the ruling will have effects beyond just the Jewish community. The decision will apply to all teachers who are not Christian.

Four school divisions were named in the court challenge including Winnipeg School Division No.1, Assiniboine South, Seven Oaks and Fort Garry. Currently, Winnipeg 1 allows employees two days off for religious leave and Fort Garry and Assiniboine South allow one religious day off with pay a year. Seven Oaks requires teachers taking religious leave to share the cost of a substitute.

The door to the Manitoba challenge was opened three years ago as a result of a court decision on the issue in Quebec. "The Chambly case made us realize that there was hope," Beresford says.

MTS first encouraged teachers associations to try to negotiate religious leave into their collective agreements. Individual teachers were also encouraged to file grievances over the matter. The lawsuit was initiated in July 1995.

"We put in an enormous amount of work gathering documents, studies and transcripts of related cases," Beresford says.

The case was originally scheduled to be heard last June but the school divisions were able to procure a postponement.

"We expect that the school divisions will claim hardship in defending their position," Beresford says. "It is their only legal out. They may claim that it will be difficult finding enough substitutes or that substitutes are not as competent as classroom teachers. We will argue that their concerns about substitutes are not valid. Substitutes are hired for a variety of reasons and situations. To bolster our case, we have a survey we did as to how teachers prepare class plans for their substitutes."

Beresford describes this as a "key case concerning the right for people to worship without penalty. If we win the case, we expect that the province's other divisions will fall into line on this," she says.

"They won't want to incur legal costs in a case they would be most likely to lose."

Morris Goldberg was 'one of a kind'

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Morris Goldberg of Halifax was described as "unique, irreplaceable, one of a kind" in an emotional eulogy at an overflow funeral in Halifax recently.

Obituary

Long-time friend and business associate Lloyd Newman called Goldberg "simply a nice man, industrious, always smiling, charitable, thoughtful, a good friend."

Goldberg died March 4 at 84 after a lengthy battle with cancer. A very strong member of the Jewish community, he was a founding member of Shaar Shalom Congregation, served ZIM Container Service as a volunteer ambassador, was head of the synagogue's chevrah kadishah for decades, chaired United Jewish Appeal, State of Israel Bonds and Jewish National Fund campaigns and, during the years following World War II, played an integral part in the assistance of Jewish refugees landing in Halifax.

A retailer by occupation, he started working in his father's dry goods store as a child. He left school at age 13 to assist the family when his father suddenly died and ran the business for the next 70 years. The operation became Morris Goldberg Men's Wear and became the number 1 naval and civilian outfitter on the East Coast.

He always promoted trade between Canada and Israel and was an early representative for Carmel wines and Jaffa oranges.

Goldberg made newspaper headlines and received judicial kudos in 1966 when he saw a man accost a police officer in front of the store. While the policeman quickly recovered after being punched into the street and almost hit by a car, Goldberg, a big man physically, grabbed the assailant, and held him by one arm until help arrived.

His son, Jon, executive director of Atlantic Jewish Council, in a heart-tugging memorial said his father was "impish, rebellious and always spoke his mind. But he was committed, had blind loyalty and a kind heart."

Goldberg is also survived by son Victor, president of the board of the Atlantic Jewish Council, daughter Susan Jones, brother Leonard and sister Julia Jacoby.

Spiritual bond to Jewish pioneers grows up north

The CJN introduces Blake Lambert, a journalist with CBC Radio in Inuvik. He will write about Jewish life in Canada's northern territories.

By BLAKE LAMBERT
Special to The CJN

Compared to today's corporate-dominated society, where the three-letter acronym MBA is presumed to deliver the keys to a financial kingdom, the notion of farmers, let alone Jewish farmers, seems antithetical.

Comment

However, waves of Jews fleeing Europe in the late 1800s began their Canadian lives in agriculture. Some of their settlements flourished, others failed, but their farms dotted the Canadian prairies into the 1900s.

These pioneers eventually moved off the land and into cities, as did their neighbors, in keeping with a gradual exodus from rural life in Canada.

When you consider that family farms in this country have been under siege from larger acreages for years, this flashpoint of our early history never ceases to amaze me.

Admittedly, I've never farmed a day in my life, but I feel a kinship with those who toughed it out on the land more than a century ago.

This spiritual bond has grown stronger in the last few months, since I abandoned southern living for various locations in the Northwest Territories.

Growing up in Toronto and attending Hebrew schools, I never thought I'd find myself living in Iqaluit, Yellowknife and Inuvik during their harsh winter months. Heck, I never thought I'd find myself spending two winters in Regina, learning to love the "dry cold." Then again, nobody ever told me there were Jewish farmers in this country.

In fact, if you did tell me about Jewish farmers, I would have laughed. After all, when you come from the Megacity, farming ranks just slightly above Saskatchewan on the approval meter.

But as I've gotten older and fallen into a slightly peripatetic lifestyle, (four provinces, one territory and counting), I'm left wondering why nobody told me. Clearly, Canadian Jews have managed to get involved in a staggering number of historical events.

In my case, I discovered Jewish farmers through a newspaper article when I was living in Regina in late 1995. Eventually, I uncovered scores of stories when I researched and presented a three-part documentary on Jewish farm settlement in Saskatchewan's southeast (Moosomin, Wapella) for CBC Radio in 1996.

Historians have written detailed accounts of Jewish prairie living in the latter part of last century and the early part of this century. Jews lived near Estevan and Melfort in Saskatchewan, and in Vegreville, Alberta, but had I not tackled this subject as a documentary I still would know nothing of these stories.

Let's face an ignoble truth. We, as Canadian Jews, aren't telling and exchanging our stories as we should. It is imperative and instructive for future generations to hear that their forebears were proud of their heritage, regardless of the location they called home.

There are a number of reasons to document the past. We, as Canadians, should know what happened to our ancestors in this country so that we can learn from their experiences.

Pragmatically, we need to demonstrate to Jews who don't live in cities that they aren't necessarily trailblazers. Let's demonstrate that we have a lineage of rural life and thus open up our options for places to live in this country.

Meanwhile, I continue to learn about more Jews in Canada who want to chronicle the past. Recently, the Jewish Historical Society of the Yukon, 12 members strong, formed to research and document the role of Jews during the Klondike Gold Rush.

Our task won't be easy. Canadian schools have done this country's history a great disservice. Yet that excuse has its limits, since ignorance is no excuse for not knowing the past.

Canadian Jewry has to escape its geographic Tower of Babel and start sharing its history more effectively. Living in an McLuhanistic age, we should be able to connect with one another to make a concerted effort to chronicle our history in this country.

We owe it to our present and future generations to learn more about our rich history in this magnificent country.

Appeal for foster homes: help!

Within the Jewish community there are many Jewish children who need stable, caring families to look after them until they can either return to their own families or begin to care for themselves.

Within our community, there is an urgent need for foster families to care for deprived and troubled children. The fostering of children who cannot live with their natural families is a moral and ethical duty whose basis in fact lies in biblical teaching and tradition. (See the book of Ester (2.7) and Midrash HaGadol (1:334-7).

Moral and ethical duty has biblical roots

The need for foster parents is such that Toronto's Jewish Family & Child Service and Montreal's Batshaw Youth & Family Centres have foster parent recruitment committees, composed of community representatives, board members and staff people, in order to coordinate efforts to reach out to the Jewish community and promote the need for foster families. At times, these efforts are also co-ordinated with the other local children's aid societies whose needs are equally pressing.

At present, foster homes for children of all ages (infants to 16 years in Toronto, infants to 17 years in Montreal) are required but there is a particularly urgent need for foster parents interested in caring for children in their adolescence. Generally, foster parents are asked to foster only one child, although as foster parents develop increased skill at fostering, some assume responsibility for two or three children. At times these children may be siblings, but they are just as likely to be unrelated.

Numbers of foster children at an all-time high

Jewish Family and Child Service in Toronto has the highest number of children in care in its history. Similar conditions exist in Montreal. Rapidly changing economic and social conditions have contributed to significant changes in the fabric of the traditional family unit. Children in all strata of society, all cultures and communities have suffered as a result. These changes will inevitably have long-term effects on the lives of children and it is doubtful that our present need for more foster parents to care for children of all ages — especially those in the mid-adolescent range — will diminish in the future. To allow both agencies to fulfill their mandates and commitment to service the needs of Jewish families in Toronto, York Region, and Montreal, Jewish families able and willing to assume a fostering role must come forward.

Help needed in both Toronto and Montreal

Those interested in exploring opportunities for care are urged to contact Jewish Family & Child Service in Toronto (416-638-7800) with their questions. Inquiries should be directed to the Supervisor of Placement & Resources, Avraham Friedman (ext. 293). In Montreal, phone Rena Rubin of the Batshaw Youth and Family Centres, Jewish foster care recruitment office, at (514) 695-5251.

B.C. libel trial reconvenes

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — The defamation trial of Pressler vs. Lethbridge reconvened March 16 in British Columbia Supreme Court in Victoria, with all sides presenting final arguments.

The case concerns a charge of libel brought by Claus and Eileen Pressler of Salmon Arm, a town of 35,000 in the B.C. interior, against Dr. David Lethbridge, a community college psychology professor.

The Presslers say Lethbridge libeled them in a 1993 broadcast on Kelowna, B.C. television station CHBC-TV. Lethbridge says the Presslers are founders of a Salmon Arm-based extremist group, The Council on Public Affairs (CPA). He says they are also connected with a North American-wide network of hate groups.

Lethbridge's lawyer, Irvine Epstein, said the case could have important ramifications for Canadian human rights groups fighting anti-Semitism and racism.

"The outcome of the libel suit against Dr. Lethbridge will become legal precedent in Canada," he pointed out. "If Lethbridge were to lose, every human rights group in Canada will be in jeopardy. This is not one man's battle against racism and fascism; it is a struggle in which every mainstream human rights group has a significant stake."

The case goes back to 1992, when Lethbridge became aware that Eileen Pressler and the CPA were helping to organize a speaking engagement in Salmon Arm for a right-wing extremist. Lethbridge led a protest that led to the cancellation of the meeting.

Deciding to take a closer look at the CPA, Lethbridge discovered that what he had thought was nothing more than a small local extremist group was in fact highly organized. One the its activities was the promotion of anti-Semitic books, including several with fabricated descriptions of Jewish ritual murders.

Lethbridge also found out that the CPA was part of a wide network of racist and anti-Semitic organizations, including Aryan Nations, Church of the Creator, Heritage Front, League of Rights and the Free Speech League.

Lethbridge formed the Salmon Arm Coalition Against Racism (SACAR), and began to assemble and disseminate information that exposed the CPA and its kin organizations.

He assembled data on the individuals and organizations that he found in his investigations. He addressed articles and letters to the press. He spoke at community meetings. He gave television and radio interviews. And he organized protests whenever meetings were scheduled.

Epstein said that SACAR has had hate groups in the province running scared.

Since Lethbridge started the organization, there have been no more large-scale conventions or assemblies in British Columbia of right-wing extremists. A number of individual racists have pulled up stakes and moved to less vigilant locales. The CPA Digest ceased publication shortly after the suit was launched.

Lethbridge's lawyer said the case is not about free speech. "It is about the attempt by the racist right to gag and bankrupt their opposition. Should the plaintiffs be successful in their suit, not only will the news media be hesitant to expose future activities, but the devastating financial consequences to Dr. Lethbridge will ensure that his voice and that of any others who might be inclined to take up the fight will be completely silenced."

Seminar fizzles

OLIVER, B.C. — Only a handful of ultra-right activists showed up for a weekend "free-speech" seminar hosted by Internet service provider Bernard Klatt in this southern British Columbia town.

The meeting, which coincided with the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, went on despite the cancellation by Oliver Mayor Linda Larson of a community hall booking by the event's organizers.

In cancelling the booking, Larson said the RCMP had indicated there was a potential for violence between ultra-rightists and their opponents.

Klatt and his firm, Fairview Technology Centre, have been at the centre of controversy for hosting several extremist Web sites that disseminate material described as hate propaganda. Oliver had been labelled the Hate Capital of Canada by Sol Littman of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, though he later backtracked from that comment.

Syria muzzles Lebanese on pullout proposal

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Syria has apparently instructed Lebanese leaders to refrain from making any extraneous comments on Israel's proposal to pull the IDF out of south Lebanon in the framework of UN Security Council Resolution 425.

The order was imposed, according to senior Lebanese analysts, during the mini-summit in Damascus last week prior to the visit to the region by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

Lebanese newspapers complained at the time about what they described as a news blackout on the discussions between Syrian President Hafez al-Assad and senior officials and the Lebanese government.

Since then, there has been a marked similarity of content in the official statements and comments made to reporters by Lebanese officials, especially on the 425 initiative.

The analysts noted that the move appeared to be designed to reassert Syria's role on the Lebanon issue and ensure it remains in control of the situation.

Israel is expected to gain a clearer picture of Syria's position from Annan, who was due here this week after a round of meetings with Lebanese and Syrian leaders.

Annan said after talks with Assad that Syria is skeptical about the initiative. "On Lebanon, the Syrian leadership expressed deep skepticism about the real significance of recent interviews in the Israeli media [regarding the withdrawal offer]," he told a joint news conference with Foreign Minister Farouk Shara.

Annan said implementation of 425 "would clearly require the understanding and cooperation of all concerned."

In the meantime, official Syrian newspapers continued to denounce Israel's initiative as a plot aimed at trying to split the Syrian-Lebanon track.

Tishrin said that neither Lebanon nor Syria is taking the proposal seriously and that they would only accept an unconditional and unilateral withdrawal from south Lebanon.

The proposal put forward by Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and supported by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu calls for arrangements that would ensure the security of the northern border and the safety of South Lebanese Army soldiers and their families in the event of an IDF withdrawal.

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat was to receive Annan in Gaza this week, as Palestinian journalists stage a demonstration outside his headquarters to protest the IDF's treatment of them.

The journalists plan to hand Annan a written statement demanding his assistance in obtaining protection for the Palestinian journalists.

Palestinian officials said that talks between Arafat and Annan will focus on moving the peace process forward and seeking UN assistance in releasing Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails.

Meanwhile, in related developments, Netanyahu denied reports that Israel agreed to resume negotiations with Syria from the point where they left off two years ago.

"Israel has told Syria that it may raise any proposal for negotiation, but it has not given its consent to resume negotiations from the point where they were halted," he told the cabinet.

He informed the ministers that the discussion on Lebanon that began last week in the security cabinet has not yet ended and that a decision "will also be brought to the full cabinet."

Israel rejects U.S. withdrawal plan

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The cabinet sent a strong signal to Washington Sunday rejecting America's reported proposal for a 13 percent redeployment from the West Bank.

Nearly all cabinet ministers insisted that a withdrawal from 10 percent of the area is the most that can be undertaken without endangering security.

This position applies to the duration of the prospective interim agreement with the Palestinian Authority (PA) and leaves the extent of any subsequent redeployments to be determined during final-status talks.

The decision not only falls far short of the U.S. proposal but also that of PA demands for at least a 20 percent pullback.

However, a senior government source stressed that, according to the Hebron Agreement and the accompanying letter submitted by former secretary of state Warren Christopher, the scope of the projected withdrawal can be determined exclusively by Israel and is not negotiable.

The source confirmed that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had two telephone conversations with U.S. President Bill Clinton over the weekend, during which it was agreed that U.S. peace envoy Dennis Ross would visit later this week for talks with Israeli and PA officials.

He also disclosed that Clinton agreed that a U.S. plan designed to break the current deadlock will not be publicized until next month at the earliest.

Several of the ministers were outspoken in their opposition to the U.S. recommendation that the projected pullback result in the evacuation of 13 percent of Areas B and C.

Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani contended that it should be between five percent and 10 percent and that any more "would be harmful to security" and would entail taking unnecessary risks.

"Even though I belong to the political centre, I have not lost my head!" Kahalani said.

Education Minister Yitzhak Levy said national interests would be impaired if a 13 percent redeployment were implemented. Those who live in the settlements would be endangered most of all.

Science Minister Michael Eitan, however, objected to the very fact that the cabinet was dealing with specific percentages, arguing that it is unnecessary to be hamstrung by them.

In related developments, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's aide Nabil Abu Rudeineh said Arafat received a call from U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright on the weekend, in which she updated Arafat on current U.S. attempts to push the peace process forward.

Ahmed Abdul-Rahman, secretary-general of the PA cabinet, said the PA is also waiting for Ross's visit. He said Palestinian officials hope that Ross will bring some concrete ideas to rescue the peace process. He stressed that the Palestinians expect the U.S. to apply more pressure on Israel and force it to implement the signed accords.

"The PA position at present is divided into the three stages of redeployment, according to the stipulations laid down in the Oslo Accords and Hebron protocol. These three stages must be implemented in a short time, as the dates they were due to be implemented have already passed us by," he said.

Abdul-Rahman also said the Palestinians want agreements on the interim-phase issues, including safe passages between the West Bank and Gaza, the Gaza airport and seaport, and prisoner releases.

Cape Town getting new museums

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

CAPE TOWN — The Cape Town Jewish community is a buzz. The construction of its Holocaust museum is getting the final touches, and the Jewish museum is expanding.

Holocaust museum volunteers are being trained as tour guides, and, according to Jewish museum volunteer Helene Greenblau, people should be able to visit in October.

But the Holocaust museum isn't the only building attracting attention. The Cape Town Jewish museum, currently housed in the Old Synagogue, is moving to a new building that is to be built behind it.

The Old Synagogue, now next door to the Garden Shul, was the first shul built in South Africa. When its doors opened in 1863, there were about 4,000 Jews living in Cape Town. Today there are just over 106,000.

The museum opened in 1958. It has one of the original benches from the Old Synagogue in its collection, and also houses a collection of Jewish ceremonial art, letters, photographs and books relevant to South African Jewish history.

Cape Town's Garden Synagogue

The main sanctuary holds the temporary exhibits while the women's gallery upstairs has the art and archival items. A 10-minute video takes the visitor back through the history of this Jewish community founded in 1841, up to the present.

The current temporary exhibit, The Berry on Top: A window into the world of Abe Berry, shows the political cartoons and drawings of Abe Berry.

The artifacts in the museum come from countries including Holland, Germany, Lithuania and England. There is a Torah pointer from Israel (1900); a kiddush cup from Moscow (1875); a case for the Torah scroll from Morocco (19th century); and ornate spice boxes from Berlin, Austria, Turkey, and Germany.

The Ten Commandments appear in stained glass windows which were installed in the apse in 1884 to commemorate Sir Moses Montefiore who had donated to the building of the Synagogue.

Recently, a number of smaller shuls in the Karoo region of South Africa have closed because of dwindling numbers. They sent their artifacts to a synagogue in Ra'anana where there are numerous expatriate South Africans.

Despite the drop in the Jewish population over the last few years, the Jewish museum – which attracts about 400 visitors a month – still has plans to build a bigger building for the museum. And so, more artifacts are needed.

Most of the artifacts have been donated by families to preserve and pass down knowledge from generation to generation. The museum is looking for additional Jewish family artifacts to add to its collection.

Contact the museum at Old Synagogue, 84 Hatfield Street, Gardens, Cape Town, 8001, South Africa.

Israeli economy in midst of deep downturn

Diamond, tourism industries hit hard

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

A few days ago, the Israel Central Bureau of Statistics published the consumer price index (CPI) for February. At first glance, February's CPI might have been welcome news, as it showed a negative index of -0.1 percent. This is the fourth decline in the index over the past six months and represents an annual inflation rate of about six percent.

Commentary

The basket of goods and services that makes up the CPI is in itself a reflection of the state of the Israeli economy, which is badly in need of an economic doctor to improve its failing health. Prices of commodities such as food and clothing have dropped in the past months to unusually low levels due to reduced demand.

One important index of purchasing power is Dun and Bradstreet's Corporate Managers' Index. This index is composed of a variety of economic activities and is probably a better indicator of the present economic climate than the CPI alone. The present level of Dun and Bradstreet's index is 45.4 percent.

To translate this figure into a meaningful understanding of economic performance, one must realize that industrial production does not begin to expand until this index reaches 50 percent. Although the index showed a small improvement in February, it is still an indication of a serious slowdown in the economy.

The Israel Manufacturers' Association points an accusing finger at the Bank of Israel for the woes of its members. They say that restrictive monetary and fiscal policy is to blame for the slowdown.

There may indeed be an element of truth in the association's claim, but this is only part of the story, and we also have to look in other directions, as Israel is neither an economic island in a volatile world, nor is it unaffected by political decisions about the peace process.

The financial crisis in the Far East has affected both trade and tourism in Israel. Although at present definitive statistics are not available to show the overall effect on Israel's economy, there is without doubt a serious slowdown in Israeli exports to the Far East.

Particularly badly hit has been the diamond industry, whose exports to the Far East – a central market for Israeli finished gem products – were significantly reduced in February. This is the third consecutive month showing a negative growth in this sector.

Furthermore, potential tourists from the Far East have scuttled plans to come to Israel as a result of their own economic problems. Combined with the serious reduction in general tourism due to the potential for another Gulf War and the concern about terrorist activity in Israel itself, this has deprived the economy of millions of dollars in foreign currency.

In Jerusalem, small businesses are closing down at a rapid rate. Many shops are closed or changing hands, as shopkeepers try to grapple with the problem of an ever-smaller buying public and ever-smaller profit margins.

Says one director of a well-known Jerusalem real estate business: "Tourism puts money into the economy. The present stagnation affects us all. There's a very bad feeling in the air; I think this is just the beginning of a serious recession. People are just not buying."

Israel's hotels have also had a very bad time, although they are reluctant to say just how bad things are. The hotels usually gauge their economic success in percentages of room occupancy. Many hotels in the main centres are reported to be only one third full with foreign tourists. Some of the shortfall is made up by Israelis taking advantage of special offers. For several hotels, these offers are too few and too late. If there is not a dramatic change in Israel's fortunes this year, several hotels will have to close.

It is hoped that many tourists will come to Israel for this year's jubilee celebrations and many hotels and tourist enterprises are also gearing up for the expected influx of Christian visitors for the year 2000.

However, all this will depend on the situation on the peace front. Every reported riot or terrorist activity keeps the potential tourist away. It is unfortunate that the first groups of tourists to cancel their trips to Israel in times of stress are the Jewish travellers. The recent threat of Iraqi missiles saw thousands of Jewish tourists cancelling their holiday arrangements, but many non-Jewish groups came in spite of the situation, to show their solidarity with the Jewish state.

One Jerusalem downtown photographic business, established 25 years ago, is closing down. "In this city, we depend on tourism for so much of our business. I expect the winter to be a quiet period, but I have never had a winter like this one. We just cannot afford to keep going. I cannot see any serious change in our business fortune. Tourists are just not coming to Jerusalem," the owner said.

All over the city, shops hold perennial sales with the hope of reducing stock and just keeping their heads above water.

Although there are individual companies, particularly in the electronics sector, that are doing well, the overall picture on the domestic and commercial market is giving great cause for concern. The official government line is that there is an indication of a slowdown, but the market should improve as government fiscal policies take effect.

It may be that the outward calm of the Treasury and the Bank of Israel will return to haunt them sooner rather than later. The fact is that in 1997, the standard of living index dropped by 0.6 percent. This is not a recipe for an expanding economy and more small businesses will have to put up the shutters unless something dramatic happens to reverse the poor economic performance figures.

Russia convicts spies

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Russia has sentenced two former Russian military intelligence officers on charges they spied for Israel.

The two were found guilty of selling 200 classified aerial photographs of the Middle East taken by Russian satellites to an Israeli diplomat stationed in Moscow. The sentences were considered relatively mild by legal observers: three years in prison for Lt.-Col. Vladimir Tkachenko and a two-year suspended sentence for Lt.-Col. Gennady Sporyshev.

The charges brought against a third officer were dismissed.

The man, identified as Col. Alexander Volkov, was suspected of transferring satellite photographs of Iraqi territory to Israel. During the investigation, the man allegedly said that he was only fulfilling his duty.

According to the Kommersant Daily newspaper, Israel's Mossad intelligence agency paid as much as $345,000 for the satellite photos of Iraq, Iran, Syria and Israel.

Russian security sources said, this was the first time that Russian security officials were convicted for spying for Israel.

Israel and the EU

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook touched off a fierce diplomatic row last week when he visited the controversial Har Choma housing project in eastern Jerusalem.

The incident, which prompted Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to cancel a dinner in Cook's honor, was symptomatic of Israel's uneasy relationship with the European Union (EU).

Cook, whose trip to the region was sanctioned by and under the umbrella of the EU, explained that its purpose was three-fold: to breathe new life into the dormant Oslo peace process, to express his concerns over Israel's policies, and to build a greater role for European participation in Mideast diplomacy.

It's debatable whether he advanced the cause of peace by so antagonizing the Israeli government. Dispensing with the usual niceties, cabinet secretary Danny Naveh declared that Cook had wasted his time in Israel.

Cook, however, left no doubt as to what the 15-nation EU – Israel's chief trading partner and the biggest financial backer of the Palestine Authority (PA) – expects of Israel.

He reportedly brought with him a plan calling for major Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank, a freeze on settlement expansion and a resumption of security cooperation between Israel and the PA.

Cook, whose country currently holds the rotating presidency of the EU, laid special emphasis on the settlements, which the Europeans – and the United States – regard as a serious obstacle to peacemaking.

Cook's preoccupation with settlements was hardly surprising. Last December, when he met Yasser Arafat in London, he asked Israel to halt "future settlement developments" and called for further Israeli redeployments from the West Bank.

Britain's prime minister, Tony Blair, who's expected in Israel next month, conveyed an identical message when Netanyahu visited Britain several weeks ago. Netanyahu rejected the advice.

Britain's Mideast position, jarring as it was to Netanyahu during Cook's tour, is entirely in accord with EU guidelines. Since advocating an end to Israel's military occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in the June 1980 Venice Declaration, the EU has been a consistent thorn in Israel's side.

During the past year, as the Oslo process has floundered, the EU has been particularly vocal in its criticism.

Last April, the EU's special envoy to the Middle East, Miguel Moratinos, demanded a freeze in Israeli settlement activities. In June, at a meeting in Amsterdam, EU heads of state came out in support of "a viable and peaceful sovereign Palestinian entity" as the "best guarantee of Israel's security." In August, Moratinos was back in Jerusalem, saying that Israel could not obtain peace with Syria unless it fully evacuated the Golan Heights.

Last December, in the Luxembourg Declaration, the EU urged Israel to avoid "counter-productive unilateral actions" and to honor existing commitments regarding additional redeployments from the West Bank.

And in January, the EU chided Israel for stifling economic development in the Palestinian autonomous areas. The Europeans took a dim view of Israel's closure policy and accused Israel of blocking a 1997 free trade agreement signed by the EU and the PA.

In addition, they took note of the impasse between Israel and the PA over three related matters: the establishment of industrial zones in the Gaza Strip, the building of a seaport and an airport in Gaza, and the creation of a "safe passage" route from Gaza to the West Bank.

Netanyahu, during his visit to London in early March, claimed that he would welcome an increased EU presence in the peace process. But after Cook's visit, and in light of Israel's traditional view that the EU is too sympathetic to the Palestinians, the Europeans will be denied that opportunity. It's safe to say that, while the Palestinians want more European involvement, Israel will continue relying on American diplomacy.

a lot of money. It's not going to be a life-changing amount."

No amount of money can compensate survivors, Silverstone said. But this fund has "a moral and psychological" aspect to it, one that might bring closure to survivors. "We have to be sensitive to that."

Silverstone said he would like to see a "liberal" definition of needy as being slightly higher than the poverty line.

Surveys and census results routinely show that one out of six Canadian Jews lives at or below the poverty line, and that one-third of all Jewish poor are over 65.

"We're not interested in interrogating claimants. We want to see if we can be as generous as possible and benefit the maximum number of Canadians," Silverstone said.

He said it's possible that the compensation will be placed in a welfare fund that will aid survivors.

The money is part of the $260-million (US) humanitarian fund created last year when world attention was drawn to secret collusion between Swiss banks and the Nazi war machine.

It is unrelated to the one-time so-called hardship payments to survivors, or to monthly payments under the fund known as the Article 2 fund.

The Week in Israel

March 16

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu cancelled a dinner with Britain's foreign secretary, Robin Cook to protest the secretary's meeting with a member of the Palestinian Authority (PA) legislative council at Har Choma. Cook surveyed the site with Israeli representatives then met a PA member there. Cook also met with Yasser Arafat in Gaza; they announced the creation of a joint Palestinian-European committee on security.

March 18

• Sasha Elterman, 16, a member of Australia's Maccabi team injured during the bridge collapse at the opening ceremonies of the games last July, finally returned home. Elterman had been hospitalized since the accident. She underwent 22 operations.

• The clock moved one hour ahead at midnight to mark the start of Daylight Savings Time.

March 20

• All restrictions are expected to be lifted soon on the opening of bank accounts abroad and on the amount of foreign currency Israelis can take abroad.

• The media reported that the United States told Israel that it will do "whatever it feels it has to" to advance the peace process, rebuffing Israel's request that Washington not make its plans public.

LAKE SUCCESS March 16 (JTA) — The British government was accused today by the UN Palestine Commission of hampering the establishment of a Jewish Provisional Council of Government in Palestine by April 1, as provided by the partition decision of the General Assembly.

The Commission emphasized that as a result of the British attitude, the Jewish Council "will not be able to carry out its functions" prior to the termination of the Mandate on May 15. JTA

Here's how to cope with Pesach's hurley-burley

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Well, it's here again. Pesach, I mean. Somehow, everyone operates on the premise that this year, Pesach won't come at all, or won't come for at least six more months (even if it is March), or by a miracle, someone else will do all the work. Maybe that is why, no matter how much we plan to be organized for once, we wind up at the last minute dashing around to finish the cleaning, cooking or shopping.

There are ways to make it easier on yourself, without moving the whole family, lock, stock and matzah meal to a hotel.

Make lists. This may sound like more trouble than it is worth, but trust me. I have different lists for shopping, meal plans, who is coming to each seder and whether they have any peculiar food allergies, and after it is all over, what I need to get for next Pesach.

A good idea is to make a list of where you put the last minute chametz you stash anywhere your hand rests. That would have prevented me from losing my hand-thrown pottery garlic keeper, which turned up the next Pesach in the back of my hutch.

Don't be a one-person show; rope the kids into helping

Compare your recipes with your shopping list, and make sure you have all the ingredients. Nothing is as provoking as yelling at your spouse to go to the supermarket and get you some dill for the chicken soup, only to be told coldly that it is 3 a.m. and the store is probably closed.

Don't forget to mark off each list as you go. This is not the time to spend an hour standing in line for six new glasses, only to find that you bought 12 glasses last week and just forgot in the excitement.

Rope the kids in to help with the cleaning. This is very important, as they probably know where they hid those chocolate bars from Purim that they didn't want their siblings to find, or the cookies that they like to snack on at bedtime.

If the kids are old enough and take the holiday seriously enough, trust them to clean their own rooms. It is amazing how they will rise to the challenge of making their personal space Pesachdik, especially if it means that mom and dad won't be going through their drawers.

Take them along shopping too. They don't mind climbing to the top shelf or scrunching down to the bottom one. Just make sure to explain to the younger ones that the lady who shoved them out of the way, or the one who jammed a cart into their back, or the man who yelled at them when he dropped the jam, are just too tired and frazzled to know what they are saying, and at other times of the year are really nice people.

Pesach is a good time to let the kids use their special talents, be it in cooking matzah balls, setting the table, lining shelves, organizing the food shelves or computerizing those lists I mentioned before. Believe it or not, it is these experiences that they remember and look forward to from year to year.

Don't forget, when you are cleaning out the last vestiges of chametz , leave 10 bits of bread for the bedikat chametz, the search for chametz that takes place on the evening of the day before Pesach. If you put each one in a baggie, you won't have to worry about the crumbs migrating into the bathroom to the wide-eyed astonishment of the entire family, who have no idea how they got there.

As you are working, talk to the children and your spouse about how Pesach used to be when you were a child – what special foods your mother or grandmother would make, what customs your family had that no one else ever heard of, who would come to your seder, what the dishes and pots and pans looked like. Kids may roll their eyes when you start talking about the past, but they will surprise you by repeating those stories to their friends.

After all, that is what Pesach is all about – family, I mean. Not just the immediate family, but the extended one that is the Jewish people, stretching back to those days in Egypt, when G-d brought us out and made us into a nation.

In the middle of all the chaos, and hurley-burley of Pesach preparations, stop for a moment and think about that. We have lasted as a people for thousands of years precisely because we have never lost that indefinable bond that melds us to every other Jew who ever lived, from the family down the street, to the child who died in Bergen-Belsen, to the rebbe in the shtetl of Europe, back to the slaves in Egypt, and back even farther to Abraham and Sarah, the first Jews.

Let us all come to the seder table with gratitude for the good things G-d has given us and in a spirit of unity with all those Jews celebrating Pesach all over the world.

Chag kasher v'samayach.

Kosher wines do not always have to be sweet

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — And you thought kosher wines have to be syrupy!

The second annual wine tasting event, sponsored by Mazel Wines, Baron Herzog Wines, and, for the first time, Delectable Fine Foods, featured chablis, chardonnay, bordeaux and cabernet wines, as well as a host of other red and white dry and semi-dry wines from all around the world – and all kosher.

In fact, Alfasi Chilean Merlot, a bargain at $10.50 a bottle, is the first kosher wine from Chile.

Noted wine critic, author and speaker Tony Aspler led the caterers, liquor board representatives, media, bridal consultants and wine connoisseurs through the details of a formal wine tasting.

"Taste with your noses," he advised, suggesting participants "pinch your nose closed for five seconds," so as to get the full effect of the wine.

"It is like when you are looking for a wife," he joked. "You are looking for faults."

Swirl the wine in the glass, Aspler said. Wine leaves a film on the side of the glass, which falls back in. "You can see how alcoholic it is, by seeing how quickly it falls back into the glass."

One must draw a distinction, he said, between wines that are kosher for Pesach, and those which are kosher only for the rest of the year.

Those who insist on the stricter kashruth standard of mevushal (boiled) wines, now no longer have to compromise on taste.

Aspler explained that rather than use the technique of boiling wine to make it mevushal, wine-makers now flash-heat the juice. "This pasteurizes the wine, but doesn't affect the flavor. You can't distinguish between mevushal and non-mevushal wines by taste anymore."

The wine tasting proceeded in order of dryness, from very dry to the sweeter (although there were no semi-sweet or sweet wines available for tasting).

Baron Herzog Chardonnay 1995, Aspler said, is "easy on the palate, with a tropical fruit characteristic." The oak casks it is produced in give it "a spicy, clovy characteristic."

This wine is good with appetizers or a good chicken dish, he recommended.

Other wines he tasted included Pomerol, a sturdy dry red wine; and muscat Canelli, a white dessert wine.

An interesting touch was the small bottles of Baron Herzog Johannisberg Riesling on each table, a late harvest product of California's Monterey County.

Wide selection

This year's wine tasting had an added touch, a sweet table from Delectables Fine Foods, and fresh fruit. Etrog jam was served in honor of Tu b'Shvat, the day on which the event was held.

Nathan Herzog, president of Royal Wine, is the eighth generation of a family producing and importing wines. They offer between 130 and 140 labels of prize winning wines.

Mazel Wines is the exclusive agent for their line, which includes liquors, Kedem, Baron Herzog.

Those who like sweeter wines, will find a wide selection of cream red, white and Malaga wines, sparkling wines, marsala, and port.

There is also a wide selection of kosher bartenuras, columbards, zinfandels, and champagnes.

A FIRST TASTE OF PESACH

A group of boys from the Chernobyl area had their first taste of matzah last year at Kfar Chabad in Israel. In the photo, the boys are competing to see who will be first to eat an entire piece.

Time to liberate ourselves from unhealthy food

By EDITH ROTHSCHILD
Special to The CJN

That time of year is upon us again when we celebrate the liberation from our bondage in Egypt. This is also as good a time as any to liberate ourselves personally from the bondage of too much food that tastes so good but is not so good for us. Whereas Pesach is not the time to start dieting or to be too health conscious, we can nevertheless do some things that will minimize the dietary and caloric damage being done.

Here are some suggestions that work for me. Since on Pesach I cannot use cold-pressed oils from a health food store, I use extra virgin olive oil and walnut oil. I will not use the most harmful, which is cottonseed oil. Since cotton is not a food, there are no restrictions on spraying with harmful pesticides. Unfortunately, cottonseed oil is used in most packaged cookies and cakes that come from Israel and the United States. Try to replace these on Pesach with plain sponge cakes from a bakery.

Vegetables build up our systems by renewing our cells on a daily basis, which makes them the perfect food for health and longevity. Being full of vitamins and minerals in the right proportion, they stimulate our immune system to fight disease in our bodies. Some contain beta-carotene (vitamin A), while others have, supposedly, properties that directly block cancer-producing cells. Besides all this, they have no cholesterol, are low in calories and easy on the digestive system.

Granted that it is difficult on the actual yom tov days to serve fresh vegetables in large varieties, on chol hamo'ed we can avail ourselves of the whole gamut of fresh vegetables and at the same time, go easy on the animal proteins and the heavily fried stuff. Your digestive system will appreciate the short rest and you will feel lighter in body and spirit before the next onslaught. Also stick with fresh fruit and fruit salads for these intermediary days - they won't stick to your ribs. And try to avoid the sugar monster.

Below are some recipes that are favorites with my family, friends and guests. They can also be used all year round with slight variations. During the year, substitute brown rice vinegar, umeboshi vinegar and tamari soya sauce for regular vinegar, lemon juice and salt.

FRESH VEGETABLE SOUP

Cut into equal-sized pieces any or all of the following vegetables: (They all get along with each other extremely well) onions, garlic, leek, carrots, celery with the leaves, turnip, rutabaga, parsley root, zucchini, cabbage, cauliflower, tomato, mushrooms, celeric (celery root). (Quantities depend on how large your pot is and how many "big mouths" you have to feed).

Place cut-up veggies into the largest pot you own. Cover with water to 2 inches above vegetables. Add some salt, cover and bring to a boil. Simmer for 25-30 minutes. Add lots of fresh chopped parsley. Adjust salt to taste.

Helpful hint: This soup can be made ahead of time and stored in jars in the refrigerator or freezer.

BAKED WHITE FISH SUPREME

6 white fish fillets

Choose a fairly large white fish and have it cut into 2 fillets lengthwise, with the middle bone removed. When preparing this recipe, cut each fillet into three portions.

Sauce:

1 tbsp. Passover oil
¼ cup onion, chopped fine
1 tbsp. fresh dill, chopped fine
¼ tsp. ginger powder
½ tsp. garlic powder
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
½ cup fresh tomatoes, chopped fine
¼ cup sweet red and yellow peppers, chopped fine (optional)
Salt and pepper to taste
Fresh parsley for garnish

Preheat oven to 400 degrees.

Saute onions, garlic powder, ginger powder, tomatoes and peppers for 2-3 minutes. Cover and continue cooking another 5-7 minutes, stirring occasionally. Add lemon juice and dill and stir well. Cover and cook another 2 minutes.

Place fillets, skin side down, in a single layer, in a lightly oiled baking dish; cover each fillet completely with sauce and bake for 12 minutes. Garnish with parsley and serve warm or at room temperature. Serves 6.

YAM-PRUNE CASSEROLE

4 medium yams
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. ginger powder
1 tbsp. orange zest
18-20 dried prunes, pitted and plumped

Preheat oven to 350 degrees and plump the prunes.

To plump prunes: Place the prunes in a small saucepan, cover with water and bring to a boil. Simmer on medium heat for 10 minutes. Let stand to cool with lid on. Drain prunes.

Steam or boil yams in the peel until soft. Peel and mash while still warm. Add salt, orange zest and ginger, mix and place into an ovenproof casserole dish. Decorate with the prunes and bake uncovered for 25 minutes.

To decorate: For a 9-inch casserole you need about 18 prunes and one for the middle. Form a border of prunes, placing one next to the other on top of the yam mixture, all around the inside rim of the casserole, and place one prune in the middle. Slightly press each prune into the yam mixture. Serves 8.

This can be made in advance, frozen and reheated in a covered casserole.

CELERIAC LATKES

2 medium celeriac (celery root)
Matzah meal for dredging
2 eggs, beaten
½ tsp. sea salt
Oil for frying

Peel the celeriac and wash. Cut into rounds of ¼-inch thickness, or cut the rounds again into half-moons. Steam the slices for 3-4 minutes, or until barely soft.

With a spatula, lift the celeriac slices from the steamer and place on a large plate to cool.

Beat the eggs in a bowl. Place the matzah meal in a plate, add salt and mix. Dip the slices into the egg mix and dredge in the matzah meal. Fry quickly in medium-hot oil until golden brown and drain on paper towels. Serves 6.

This recipe can be prepared in advance and reheated, or frozen and reheated in the oven.

PRESSED SALAD

A pressed salad, with its rainbow colors and special crunch, is unique, inasmuch as it is neither cooked nor raw. The salt acts as a pickling agent, breaking down the cellulose fibre for easy digestion.

The following vegetables are all cut up raw:

A Very Happy & Healthy Passover To All Our Valued Customers & Friends

Number of healthy holiday recipes offered

1½ cup carrots cut into matchsticks or thin rounds
1½ cup daikon (a form of white radish), cut into matchsticks
1½ cup zucchini, unpeeled, coarsely grated
1½ cup celery, sliced thin
1½ cup chinese cabbage, shredded
½ cup radicchio, shredded, not too fine (optional)
¼ cup salad onions, sliced thin into half-moons, or ¼ cup scallions, sliced thin
1½ tbsp. sea salt

Dressing:

1 tbsp. Passover oil
1 tbsp. Passover vinegar
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tbsp. chopped fresh dill

In a large bowl mix all the vegetables. Add the salt and mix well again (the best way is to use your hands). Transfer this mixture to a smaller pyrex, glass, enamel or stainless steel bowl, one that will be about three-quarters full when the salad is placed in it. Pass your hand around the inside of the bowl and push the veggies towards the middle.

Place a plate on top of the mixture, one that is a bit smaller than the top of the bowl. Add a heavy weight on top of the plate (I use a heavy stone or heavy full jar). Make sure that the plate rests entirely on the vegetables and is not blocked by the sides of the bowl.

After 2 hours remove the weight and the plate. Pour off all the water that has gathered in the bowl through a sieve.

In order to remove all the salt, put the salad into a big bowl, cover with cold water and strain again. If the salad still tastes salty, rinse once more and drain well again. Blend the dressing ingredients, pour over the salad and mix well. Adjust seasoning. Serves 8-10. Yields 4½ cups.

Variation: For a gourmet touch add ½-1 cup finely diced apples.

Helpful hints: If it interferes with your work schedule, you may leave the salad in the pressing stage (with plate and weight on top) for any length of time (perhaps even all day or all night), before removing the water and finishing it; although the ideal time to keep it salted is 2 hours. Always taste a small piece of the zucchini peel and flesh before using it, to make sure it is not bitter. Usually, when zucchini has lost its firmness, it will taste bitter. This salad keeps well in the fridge for a few days without losing its crunch and character.

RASPBERRIED PEARS

6 medium or 3 large pears (they should be sweet and soft)
1 pint fresh raspberries
Honey to sweeten the raspberries
½ cup chopped, roasted nuts (optional)

Roast the nuts in the oven (275-300 degrees), or in a skillet on the stove, until they give off that special aroma. Be careful not to burn them.

Peel the pears and cut them in half lengthwise. Either steam them in a steamer, or poach them in a saucepan with a bit of water, for about 8 minutes. Carefully lift out the pears with a spatula onto a plate and cool.

To prepare the raspberry sauce: Puree the raspberries in your processor. If the sauce is too thick, add some fruit juice until you have the desired saucy consistency. Add a bit of honey to taste. Place either one half of a large pear or two halves of a medium pear on each individual dessert plate, cut side down. Pour the raspberry sauce over the pears and sprinkle the chopped nuts over the sauce or in a ring around the pears. Serves 6.

Brisket, salmon recipes

By NAOMI ARBIT
Special to The CJN

STUFFED BRISKET

4 lb. brisket
2-3 tbsp. Passover vegetable oil
2 garlic cloves, minced
6 scallions, sliced thin
1 10-oz. pkg. frozen chopped spinach, thawed; pour boiling water over spinach in colander, then squeeze dry
1 egg
1 cup matzah farfel
8 oz. mushrooms, sliced
6 carrots; dice 2 into 1/4-inch dice; slice 4 into 1/4-inch slices
2 large onions, sliced
1 cup dry Passover red wine
1 cup beef or chicken stock
1 tsp. thyme
1 bay leaf
Salt and pepper to taste

Ask the butcher to cut a pocket horizontally along one side of brisket, (fat side up) leaving 1/2-inch border around three sides. Ask also for some butcher twine.

Saute garlic in vegetable oil. Add scallions and saute 2 more minutes. Remove from pan and place in a bowl. Add spinach, egg, farfel, salt and pepper and mix well.

Add oil to pan; saute mushrooms over moderate heat until all liquid has evaporated.

Spread half the spinach inside the pocket of the brisket. Add half the diced carrots. Then add cooled mushrooms and remaining carrots and finish with spinach. Tie up brisket in all directions. Broil brisket on both sides until nicely browned, about 5 minutes. Remove meat from broiler pan rack and pour off all fat. Spread bottom of pan with sliced round carrots and onions. Pour wine, stock, thyme, bay leaf over vegetables. Place brisket on top. Cover tightly with heavy foil and place in a 325-degree oven. Roast for 3-3 1/2 hours or until fork tender. Allow meat to rest 20 minutes before slicing.

Strain vegetables out of cooking liquid. Puree the vegetables in a processor or blender until it gets thick. Add 1/4 of the cooking liquid to it and whisk together. Place in a saucepan, adding salt and pepper to taste, and more stock if a thinner sauce is desired. Reheat; serve sauce separately. Slice meat across the grain.

SALMON PASTA

12 oz. Passover noodles, cooked
1 14.5-oz. can salmon (or see note below)
1 medium onion, chopped
1 small green, red or yellow pepper, chopped
1 clove minced garlic
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 14-oz. cans whole peeled tomatoes
1 tsp. oregano
Salt and pepper to taste; pinch of sugar
Grated cheese of choice

In skillet, combine oil, onion, pepper and garlic. Saute until vegetables are tender. Add tomatoes, oregano, sugar, salt and pepper; bring to a boil for 1 minute. Reduce heat and simmer for 10 minutes.

Vegetable quiche on the menu

Add drained and chunked salmon to sauce and heat through. Serve warm over the noodles. Top with grated cheese.

Note: If using fresh salmon (4 oz. fillets), bring 1 quart water and 1/4 cup white wine to boil in a skillet. Add salmon; cover and simmer about 5 minutes until done. Using slotted spatula, remove fillets and place on top of noodles. Garnish with sprigs of fresh parsley.

VEGETABLE QUICHE

2 tbsp. Passover vegetable oil
1 onion, chopped
1 red pepper, cored, seeded and chopped
3/4 lb. mushrooms, sliced
2 large eggs and 2 large egg whites
1 1/2 cups nonfat cottage cheese
1/2 cup plain yogurt
1/4 cup potato starch
1/2 cup grated Passover Parmesan cheese
1/4 tsp. cayenne pepper
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 cup freshly ground pepper
1/2 lb. broccoli florets cut very small (about 1 cup)
1 cup grated sharp cheese of choice
1/4 cup snipped scallions

Spray a 10-inch pie plate with non-stick spray. In a large skillet, heat 1 teaspoon of oil over medium-high heat. Add onions and pepper; cook until softened, about 5 minutes. Transfer to a mixing bowl. Add remaining oil to the skillet and heat over high heat, adding mushrooms, cooking until most of their liquid has evaporated. Add to onion mixture.

In a food processor or blender, blend eggs, egg whites, cottage cheese, yogurt, potato starch, Parmesan, peppers and salt; mix into vegetables. Stir in broccoli, sharp cheese and scallions. Pour into pie plate and bake in a 350-degree oven for 40-50 minutes or until a knife inserted in centre comes out clean. Let stand for 5 minutes before serving. Makes six servings.

PASSOVER SACHER TORTE

6 oz. semisweet chocolate, grated
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 cup butter
6 egg yolks
1/4 cup matzah meal or finely grated matzah
1/4 cup finely ground almonds

Passover Foods

Some sweet delights for Passover palate

¼ tsp. salt
7 egg whites
1 cup apricot jam or preserves

In a large mixing bowl cream butter and sugar. Beat in 1 egg yolk at a time until mixture is light and fluffy. Add the grated chocolate, matzah meal, almonds and salt. In another bowl, beat egg whites until stiff but not dry. Fold into the chocolate mixture. Spoon into an ungreased removable rim or spring-form pan. Bake in a 325-degree oven for 50-60 minutes. Cool on a rack. Remove from pan and slice torte horizontally through the middle. Make sure the top has a flat surface. Place jam or preserves between the layers. Cover the cake with chocolate glaze.

CHOCOLATE GLAZE

6-7 oz. semisweet chocolate
1 tbsp. margarine or butter
1 cup sugar
⅓ cup water

Place chocolate and margarine in a double boiler over boiling water and melt. Cook sugar and water to the thread stage (230 degrees). Pour this syrup slowly into chocolate, stirring constantly until mixture coats the back of the spoon. Pour the glaze over the torte.

CHOCOLATE DELIGHTS

1¼ cups powdered sugar (pulverize regular sugar in a blender as a substitute, if necessary)
¼ cup unsweetened cocoa powder
2 level tsp. potato starch
⅛ tsp. salt
2 egg whites (at room temperature)
½ tsp. flavoring of choice
½ cup pecans, toasted and chopped
½ cup chocolate chips

Line a large baking sheet with aluminum foil and lightly coat with non-stick cooking spray. In a bowl, sift ¼ cup sugar, cocoa, potato starch and salt. With an electric mixer, beat egg whites until foamy. Add remaining sugar and flavoring; beat until soft peaks form. Add cocoa mixture; beat 1 minute or until blended. Stir in pecans and chocolate chips. Let stand 30 minutes. With a tablespoon drop mixture onto prepared cookie sheet, spacing 18 cookies 1-inch apart. Bake in a 325-degree oven for 15 minutes. Remove to rack and let cool 10 minutes. Remove cookies from sheet to rack to cool. Cookies are fragile but delicious.

Steak, potatoes on the menu

Every holiday the Kashruth Council offers recipes for your enjoyment – and this Passover is no exception. Here is just a sample.

LEMON BROILED CHUCK STEAK

4 lb. chuck steak, 1½ inches thick
Trim excess fat
Score fat edges of steak
Place in a plastic bag
Marinade:
1 tsp. grated lemon rind
⅔ cup lemon juice
¼ cup oil
⅛ tsp. pepper
1 tsp. ketchup
1 tsp. mustard flavored Dijon*
1 large onion, thinly sliced

Combine ingredients and add to bag, sealing tightly. Place in a shallow pan. Refrigerate 6 to 8 hours or overnight, turning bag several times. Preheat oven to broil.

Remove steak from marinade, pouring the marinade into the pan. Place meat on broiler rack and broil 12 minutes for rare or 15 minutes for medium, brushing occasionally with the marinade. Carve meat across grain in thin slices. Serve with roasted potatoes and glazed beets. Yields 6-8 servings.

*Note: This product contains no mustard.

ROASTED POTATOES

6 red skin potatoes, scrubbed and quartered
6 cloves garlic, peeled
2 tbsp. olive oil
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. chopped fresh rosemary, optional
2 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme, optional

Place potatoes and garlic in a large bowl. Drizzle with oil, sprinkle with salt, pepper, rosemary and thyme. Toss to coat.

Preheat oven to 425 F.

Spread the mixture on a baking sheet lined with aluminum foil (shiny side up). Roast 45-50 minutes, stirring twice until the potatoes are golden and crisp at the edges.

Note: The roasted garlic is delicious.

EASY MARMALADE GLAZED BEETS

3 tbsp. margarine
¼ cup marmalade
1 tbsp. orange juice
2 cups cooked or canned beets

Melt margarine in skillet, stir in marmalade and orange juice. Add beets; cook over low heat until beets are hot and glazed (about 6-8 minutes). Place in serving platter and garnish with orange twists. Yields 4 servings.

Cookbook lets teens help with the cooking

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

If there is any time that a family appreciates another cook, it is at Pesach, when everyone is running around hysterically or has collapsed on the nearest chair with a drink and a scowl.

It is the perfect time to get your teenagers to shoulder some of the load, and Clueless in the Kitchen; a cookbook for teens, by Evelyn Raab (Key Porter Books, 1998), is a great way to start them off.

The book is written in a breezy, chatty, humorous style, that makes it a delight to read. Pound, for example, is defined as "what you'd like to do to that idiot who wrecked your bike. In food, to flatten." A drop is "what a person asks for when they really want more." And tossing is "mixing enthusiastically. Yahoo!"

Instructions are detailed, simple, and full of extra hints, such as which vegetables in a casserole need longer cooking, what to do with leftovers, and the no doubt upsetting information that "potato chips do not count as a vegetable."

There are guides for stocking a kitchen and for efficient shopping. Recipes go from breakfasts and munchies to meat, pasta, eggs and desserts, and each is identified by an icon, such as cheap eats, mom food, dinner for the family and couch potato food.

While the book is intended for teenagers, it is interesting enough, and the recipes are sufficiently appealing, for any novice cook.

POTATO-CHIP-ENCRUSTED FISH

Absolutely juvenile! Totally unsophisticated! Very delicious.

½ cup Italian vinaigrette salad dressing
1½ lbs. fish fillets
3 cups potato chips
1 cup shredded cheddar cheese

Preheat the oven to 400.

Pour salad dressing into a flattish bowl. Dip each fillet into the dressing, coating both sides, then arrange in a single layer on a greased cookie sheet.

Put the potato chips in a large, heavy-duty zip-top plastic bag and zip it shut, leaving a tiny opening for the air to escape. Now, using a rolling pin, crush the potato chips into smithereens. Sprinkle the smithereens evenly over the fish on the baking sheet. And finally, top with the shredded cheese.

Bake at 400 for about 20 minutes, until fish flakes when you test it with a fork. Serves 4

STUFFED BAKED POTATOES

4 large potatoes
½ cup cottage cheese
¼ cup grated cheddar cheese
¼ cup butter
½ tsp. salt
pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 400.

Scrub the potatoes, poke a few fork holes into each, then bake them at 400 until really done – about an potatoes). Flip the potatoes end to end and over about halfway through the baking time to make sure they cook evenly.

Cut a lengthwise slice from the top of each potato and carefully scoop out the insides. Mash them in a bowl with the cottage cheese, the cheddar cheese, the butter, the salt and the pepper.

Spoon the mixture back into the shells, mounding the filling on top. You can leave them au naturel, or sprinkle with with a little paprika to be extra cheerful. Place on a baking sheet if you'll be baking them right away, or wrap in foil and put in the fridge for future consumption.

About 15 minutes before you'll want to eat, put the potatoes back into a 400 oven and bake until heated through, and very lightly browned.

Serves 4 as a side dish, fewer as a main course.

Veal a rare treat for holiday

Veal is a rare treat. In many households, veal is not prepared as frequently as other meals, probably because there is hesitation to venture into the unknown. However, for all its elegance, a veal roast is as simple as seasoning the surface and placing it in the oven.

Equipment is minimal: a shallow roasting pan, a rack for the pan and a meat thermometer. In this recipe, the mild flavor of veal is enhanced by three pantry seasonings – sage, garlic and pepper – rubbed over the surface prior to roasting. The homemade chutney, prepared while the roast is in the oven, makes a tangy sweet accompaniment. Serve with colorful vegetables such as baby carrots, Brussels sprouts and small red potatoes.

HERBED VEAL ROAST
With Apricot-Thyme Chutney

4 to 5 lb. veal rib roast
1 tsp. rubbed sage
2 cloves garlic, minced
½ tsp. cracked black pepper
Apricot-Thyme Chutney:
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 medium onions, sliced
1 pkg. dried apricots, coarsley chopped
1 cup chicken broth
1½ tsp. cider vinegar
½ tsp. dried thyme leaves

Combine sage, garlic and pepper and press evenly into surface of roast. Place roast, fat side up, on rack in roasting pan. Insert meat thermometer into thickest part, not touching bone or fat. Roast in 325 oven aproximately 22 to 27 minutes per pound until meat thermometer registers 155 F for medium doneness.

Meanwhile heat oil in frypan over medium heat. Add onions and cook until soft, stirring occasionally. Stir in remaining chutney ingredients. Cover and simmer 20 to 25 minutes or until apricots are soft, stirring occasionally. Set aside.

Remove roast from oven and let stand 15 minutes. Carve into thick slices and serve with chutney. Makes 10 servings.

LEMON-HERB GRILLED VEAL CHOPS

4 veal chops, cut 1 inch thick
4 slices firm, ripe tomato, approximately 1 inch thick
Salt (optinal)
Marinade:
3 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
3 tbsp. olive oil
3 cloves garlic, quartered
2 tsp. dried oregano leaves, crushed
1 tsp. freshly ground black pepper

In bowl of food processor, place marinade ingredients; process to blend. Reserve 1 tbsp.

Place veal chops in shallow dish; spread remaining marinade on both sides of chops. Cover; marinate in refrigerator up to 2 hours. Spread reserved marinade on one side of each tomato slice.

Place veal on grid over medium coals. Grill 12 to 14 minutes, uncovered (10 to 12 minutes covered), for medium or to desired doneness; turn once. Place tomato slices on grid during last 6 minutes of grilling time. Grill until heated through; turn once. Season veal and tomatoes with salt after grilling, as desired. Serves 4.

Ginger, dill add a new taste sensation

Chicken is low calorie, versatile, and liked by almost everybody. Pair it (as it is in these recipes) with ginger, dill or fruit, and each time you will have a meal that tastes completely different.

HONEY GINGER CHICKEN BREASTS

4 chicken breasts
3 green onions, coarsely cut up
1/2 cup fresh parsley, chopped
1/4 cup honey
2 tbsp. orange juice
1 tbsp. grated fresh ginger

Preheat oven to 350. Wash chicken in cold water and wipe dry with paper towels. Remove skin if desired. Spread green onions and parsley over bottom of shallow baking dish. Arrange chicken, bone side down, on onion mixture.

Measure honey and orange juice into a cup. Heat in microwave for 30 seconds at high to melt honey. Stir in ginger. Brush honey mixture over chicken breasts and bake in preheated oven for 30 minutes or until cooked (no pink juices should run out when pierced at thickest part.) Brush any remaining mixture over chicken about 15 minutes through cooking time.

DILLED LEMON CHICKEN

6 small chicken breasts bone and skin removed
1/4 cup pareve margarine
1/2 cup dry white Passover wine
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. dill weed
1 lemon, sliced
2 tbsp. chopped green onion

Cook chicken in margarine in frying pan until light brown, turning once, about 5 minutes per side. Mix wine, lemon juice, salt and dill weed. Pour over chicken. Place lemon slices on chicken. Heat to boiling, then reduce heat.

Cover and simmer until chicken is done, 10 to 20 minutes. Remove chicken from pan and place on ovenproof platter. Heat wine mixture to boiling. Cook until reduced to half, about 5 minutes. Pour over chicken. Sprinkle with onions. Serves 6.

APPLE CHICKEN SAUTE
(adapted from Foodland Ontario)

2 tbsp. Passover oil
2 or 3 boneless, skinless chicken breasts (1/4 lb.), cubed
1 tsp. pepper
1 clove garlic, minced
2 each green onions, celery stalks and carrots, diagonally sliced
1 cup sliced mushrooms
4 apples, unpeeled, cored and cut into wedges
3 cups matzah farfel (cooked)
Fresh coriander (cilantro) or parsley

Heat oil in skillet over medium-high heat. Add chicken and sprinkle with pepper. Cook, stirring, 3 minutes.

Add garlic, onions, celery, carrots and mushrooms. Saute another 3 minutes.

Add apples and saute 2 minutes or until apples are tender crisp and vegetables golden brown.

Arrange decoratively over farfel. Garnish with coriander or parsley. Serves 4.

Potatoes a constant part of seder table

If there is one food that is a constant part of the seder table, it's potatoes. Here are some different ways to serve them:

THREE PEPPERS WITH TWO POTATOES

2 medium-size yams, washed not peeled
2 medium all-purpose potatoes, washed not peeled
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tbsp. scallions, sliced
½ cup each: thinly sliced green, red and yellow peppers
1 tbsp. butter or pareve margarine

Wash potatoes and yams with cold water and a vegetable brush. Fill a large pot with enough cold water to cover potatoes and yams.

Wash peppers and cut in halves. Remove seeds and white veins. Rinse inside. Slice into slivers. Remove tip and outer layer of scallion. Wash with cold water.

Bring potatoes and yams to a boil and cook covered for 15 minutes. Cool, remove skins and cube; they will still be firm. Put oil in a skillet and add potatoes and yams, cooking for about 5 minutes, then turn over with spatula. Add onions and peppers. Stir gently, and cook for 3 minutes more. Add butter or margarine, cover and cook for 1 minute.

CLUB MASHED POTATOES

3 lb. potatoes (7 large)
½ cup butter (approx.) or pareve margarine
6 green onions, white part only, chopped
1 small sweet red pepper, finely diced
5 cloves garlic, minced
1 cup Passover whipping cream, heated

Peel potatoes. Cook covered until tender in boiling salted water. Drain, return potatoes to pot and set over low heat to dry. Press through food mill using medium blade or mash well by hand and return to pot. Set pot in large shallow saucepan with a couple of inches of hot water and place over low heat to keep warm without burning.

Meanwhile, in skillet over low heat, melt half the butter. Cook onions, red pepper and garlic covered, until meltingly tender, about 10 minutes. Stir into potatoes.

Beat in cream gradually, adding chunks of remaining butter as you go. Season to taste with salt and pepper, and extra butter if desired. Keep warm up to 30 minutes. Serves 6 to 8.

SOUTHLAND PESACH PUDDING

6 medium sweet potatoes (3 lbs.)
2 cups applesauce
¼ tsp. cinnamon
¼ cup honey
3 tbsp. melted chicken fat or pareve margarine

Cook, peel, and slice potatoes. Mix applesauce and cinnamon in a greased 2-quart baking dish. Arrange alternate layers of sweet potato and applesauce, dribbling each layer with honey and fat. Bake, uncovered, in a moderate oven (350) 45 minutes, basting occasionally. Serves 6 to 8.

Hadassah running shop-a-thon

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An upcoming Passover shop-a-thon is a win-win situation for shoppers and Hadassah-WIZO, said Sharon Kroft, president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, which is sponsoring the 12-hour event next week.

The shop-a-thon, being held March 31 from noon to midnight at the Dominion Save-A-Centre in Lawrence Plaza, will benefit Hadassah's Youth Aliyah project in Israel.

The store is donating a percentage of gross sales, said Kroft. "It's a wonderful project. Youth Aliyah has been in the business of rescuing and reabsorbing youth from disadvantaged and war-torn areas since the beginning of Nazi Germany."

This year, Youth Aliyah is expected to help 14,000 youngsters through projects such as its vocational and agricultural schools. Many of the students are from the former Soviet Union and from disadvantaged environments within Israel.

"People are shopping anyhow," said Kroft. "Dominion has a good selection. It's fun, and the money goes to Youth Aliyah and Hadassah-WIZO."

Since the store accepts Zareinu dollars, Kroft said, shoppers can also help the local Jewish school, which serves children with special needs.

Hadassah-WIZO volunteers will be on hand as greeters, and shoppers can sample kosher for Passover food as they fill their carts. In the afternoon, a local youth klezmer band will perform. There will also be hourly prize draws and "lots of surprises," said Kroft.

This is the second shop-a-thon the organization has run at the recently opened store. An earlier one in January benefited WIZO service projects in Israel.

Dominion has been very generous and supportive, said Kroft, noting that the store had a booklet of Passover recipes printed for Hadassah-WIZO. Copies will be available at the event.

As added enticement, there will be "lots of coupons" and extra carry-out staff on-hand.

"It's like a big social event," said Kroft.

Fish a nice change after seder meals

Try fish for a nice change after all those heavy seder meals.

CRUNCHY FISH

6 oz. package potato pancake mix
½ cup matzah meal
½ tsp. salt
2 eggs
2 tbsp. water
2 lb. fish fillets
Peanut oil or vegetable shortening

Mix potato pancake mix, matzah meal and salt. Combine eggs and water. Roll fish in pancake mixture, dip in egg mixture, and roll again in pancake mixture. Set aside for at least one-half hour before frying. This makes the coating adhere very well. Fry in one-half inch hot oil or melted shortening in a large skillet. Drain on absorbent paper. Sprinkle with lemon juice. Serves 4-6.

GRILLED SALMON WITH MINT MARINADE

4 small salmon steaks, ¾ inch thick (about 1½ lbs.)
½ cup chopped fresh mint leaves
½ cup olive oil
3 tbsp. lemon juice
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
1 clove garlic, finely chopped
1 bay leaf

Place salmon steaks in ungreased rectangular baking dish, 11 x 7 x 1½ inches. Beat remaining ingredients (except bay leaf) thoroughly; stir in bay leaf and drizzle over fish. Cover and refrigerate 1 hour, turning fish over after 30 minutes. Remove fish from marinade; reserve marinade.

Grill fish uncovered about 4 inches from hot coals, turning over once and brushing with marinade frequently, 10 to 15 minutes or until fish flakes easily with fork. Heat remaining marinade to rolling boil; remove bay leaf. Serve marinade with fish.

To broil: Marinate fish as directed above. Set oven control to broil. Place fish on rack in broiler pan. Broil with tops about 4 inches from heat about 5 minutes, brushing fish with marinade frequently, until light brown. Turn carefully; brush with marinade. Broil 4 to 6 minutes longer, brushing with marinade frequently, until fish flakes easily with fork. Serves 4.

Passover Foods

Creating gourmet meals need not be difficult

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

We all like to dream about whipping up gourmet, elegant dishes and meals for holidays that wow our friends and family and show our kids just what terrific homemakers we are.

Well, here's a book to help you Fast & Festive Meals for the Jewish Holidays, by Marlene Sorosky (Morrow, 1997). Not only is it chock full of recipes for the yamim tovim, as well as bar or bat mitzvah, brit milah or baby naming and Havdalah, but you can find ideas for invitations and centrepieces, hints and menus.

There are several suggestions for each holiday. The Passover section is especially good, as it gives ideas for the seders, as well as for meals during chol hamo'ed. A "game plan" as Sorosky calls it, gives a timetable that will be helpful in organizing yourself.

Now, the "fast" in the title is a tad misleading – most recipes have a long list of ingredients, and an even longer set of instructions. And do many of us have the time or the inclination to make a mock seder plate with fern and flowers, or to write the guests' names on hard-boiled eggs?

Nevertheless, the ideas are appealing, and the book is a joy to read, with clear type and lush colored pictures.

MODERN HAROSET

1 cup dried cranberries
½ cup shelled pistachios
1 large apple, peeled, halved, cored and cut into chunks
¼ tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ cup sweet red Passover wine

In a food processor with the metal blade, pulse dried cranberries and pistachios until chopped. Add apple, cinnamon, and wine, and pulse until finely chopped or ground, as you prefer. Remove to a bowl, cover, and refrigerate at least 1 hour. May be refrigerated overnight. Makes 1¾ cups.

BOUQUET OF BAKED SPRING VEGETABLES

2 tbsp. margarine
3 tbsp. olive oil
1½ tsp. dried basil
1 tsp. dried thyme
2 cloves garlic, minced
16 – 20 peeled baby carrots
1 large red onion, peeled, halved and cut into 2-inch chunks salt and freshly ground pepper
1 lb. pattypan squash, cut into ¾-inch chunks
1½ lbs. pencil-thin asparagus
1 small red pepper, cut into 1-inch chunks or strips

In a small microwave-safe bowl, heat margarine, oil, basil, thyme and garlic until margarine melts. Remove 2 tbsp. oil mixture to a small bowl. Pour remainder into a 9 x 13 inch baking dish. Stir in carrots and onion. Season with salt and pepper. Cover and bake for 15 minutes.

Add squash, asparagus, and bell pepper. Drizzle with remaining oil mixture (if margarine has hardened, microwave until pourable). Season with salt and pepper. Cover and bake for 15 minutes, or until vegetables are barely tender.

If not serving immediately, uncover and cool, then cover and refrigerate overnight. Reheat, covered, in microwave or in oven at 475 for 7 to 10 minutes.

To serve, stir vegetables gently to coat. Serve from baking dish or arrange on platter. Makes 8 servings.

TANGY LEMON BARS

Pastry
½ cup granulated sugar
1 cup matzah meal
¼ lb. margarine, melted

Lemon Filling
3 large eggs
¾ cup granulated sugar
2 tbsp. margarine, melted
⅓ cup fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. potato starch
powdered sugar, to sprinkle on top

Place oven rack in centre of oven and preheat to 350. Line an 8-inch square baking pan with heavy foil, letting it extend an inch over the sides. Oil or spray the foil with nonstick spray.

In a small bowl, stir together pastry ingredients. Press into bottom of prepared pan. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes, or until pale golden. Reduce oven temperature to 325.

In a medium bowl, whisk eggs. Whisk in granulated sugar, margarine, lemon juice and potato starch. Pour over crust and bake at 325 for 20 to 25 minutes, or until top is lightly golden and set. Remove from oven and cool to room temperature.

Remove from pan by lifting out foil. Place on cutting board. Trim edges of pastry and cut into 1½-inch squares or diamonds. The bars may be refrigerated up to one week or frozen.

Before serving, sprinkle with powdered sugar. Serve chilled or at room temperature. Makes 25 bars.

When is a matzah not a matzah?

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Pesach is the one time of year that we're all scrambling to make stuff that doesn't taste like real food taste like real food. We have at least two days where we love the matzah and the rest of the week is spent in search of something that doesn't even remotely resemble it.

I thought I'd offer some practical information on what can be substituted for what, and how to make something like macaroni and cheese taste almost (you'll note I said almost) as good as the real thing.

PASSOVER MACARONI AND CHEESE

3 large eggs
3½ cups matzah farfel (or 6 broken up matzahs)
½ cup shredded cheddar cheese
1 cup milk
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1 pt. sour cream
½ cup butter (May use less if desired.)
Parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 2-qt. casserole with butter. In a bowl beat 2 of the eggs well and pour them over the farfel. In another bowl beat the remaining egg and stir in the milk, salt and pepper. In the casserole layer half the farfel, half the cheese, half the sour cream (in spoonfuls), and half the butter. Repeat the procedure and pour the milk mixture over the top. Lightly sprinkle the Parmesan over the top. Cover with foil and bake 30 minutes. Remove foil and bake another 10-15 minutes until brown. Serves 6-8.

PASSOVER WHITE SAUCE

3 tbsp. oil
1 clove garlic, optional
1 oz. potato flour
1½ cups chicken stock
salt and pepper
2 egg yolks, lightly beaten

In a skillet heat the oil and then fry the garlic until it's clear; then remove it, if using. In a bowl mix the potato flour with the stock and then season to taste. With a whisk blend in the yolks and add the mixture to the pan. Cook over low heat, whisking very gently until the mixture thickens, stir constantly.

PASSOVER ICE CREAM

2 10 oz. pkg. frozen strawberries
1 cup sugar
2 egg whites
2 bananas

Partially thaw the strawberries. Combine all ingredients in a large mixing bowl. Beat with an electric mixer on high until the mixture is frothy. Freeze overnight to set. Serves 4 to 6.

PASSOVER SUBSTITUTES

1 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened chocolate) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1 tbsp. oil or melted margarine

16 oz. semisweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus ¼ cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar

14 oz. sweet chocolate (German-type) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2⅔ tbsp. oil and 4½ tbsp. granulated sugar

1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender

1 cup honey = 1¼ cups granulated sugar plus ¼ cup water

1 cup corn syrup = 1¼ cups granulated sugar plus ⅓ cup water boiled until syrupy

1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar

1 tbsp. flour = ½ tbsp. potato starch

1 tbsp. cornstarch = 1 tbsp. potato starch

1 tbsp. baking powder = ¼ tsp. baking soda plus ½ tsp. cream of tartar; if keeping for awhile, add ¼ tsp. potato starch

1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon

1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal

1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzahs ground in a food processor

1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup + 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted

3 crumbled matzahs = 2 cups matzah farfel

1 cup (8 oz.) cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with ½ stick butter or margarine

1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or ½ cup fruit juice plus ½ cup water, or 1 cup almond milk (blend ½ cup sliced blanched almonds with 1 cup water until smooth)

Writing Jewishly: Ever since Toronto writer Libby Scheier started it in 1994, Toronto Writing Workshop (TWW) has been gradually expanding its scope, semester by semester. Besides offering a range of workshops in fiction, poetry, novel-writing and basic creative writing, TWW runs a workshop for women writers and day-long sessions on book and periodical publishing, writing for children and black women writing.

Now TWW is adding a one-day "exploratory workshop" called Writing Jewishly. To be headed by Scheier herself, the session is meant "for Jewish writers at all levels who want to explore our varied experiences and traditions through writing."

April 26, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. $65 until Mar. 26; $75 thereafter. The workshop will be held at the Playwrights Union, 54 Wolseley St., Toronto. 260-6621.

Israeli Films in Edmonton: If you plan on being in Edmonton in May, you may wish to attend all or part of that city's fourth annual Israeli Film Festival, May 25 to 27. According to Dr. Shoshana Pollack, arts and cultural chair for the Edmonton Jewish Federation, there are about 100 Israelis living in the Albertan capital, but the films attract a much wider audience.

"The community at large is very much interested in Israeli movies," she said. "They come to our festival and they love it." For tickets, contact the Edmonton JCC, 403-487-0585.

Music From the Ghetto: The creativity of Jewish artists flourished, even in the Nazi-run ghettos of Poland and Lithuania. Ghetto Tango, the riveting Yiddish-English show that captivated packed houses at Ashkenaz '97, presents the music that was composed in those unlikely ghetto theatres and cabarets – songs of hope, satire and ironic wit, many in ragtime, jazz or tango modes.

Adrienne Cooper and Zalmen Mlotek star in Ghetto Tango, imported from New York by Olive Eye Productions for one performance only. Sat. March 28, 8:30 p.m. Trinity-St. Paul's Centre, 427 Bloor St. W. at the Spadina subway. $25-$20. 324-9413.

INSIDE THE CANADIAN WAR MUSEUM

Last month the Canadian War Museum, which commemorates Canada's role in international warfare, found itself at the centre of a heated domestic battle over its intention to include a Holocaust gallery as part of a proposed $12-million expansion.

Facing strong objections from veterans' groups and others, the Ottawa-based institution backed away from the plan as a senatorial subcommittee began public hearings to determine whether a Holocaust gallery would be an appropriate adjunct to the museum.

The main opposition to the idea came from veterans who protested that the Holocaust had little to do with the experience of the Canadian military during the war and that they had not been consulted about the museum's plans.

Canadian Jewish officials had also not been consulted about the museum's intended Holocaust gallery – a project they did not rush to defend. As the uproar increased, Milton Friedman of B'nai Brith Canada expressed dismay that the gallery was becoming "a political football" and Irving Abella of Canadian Jewish Congress suggested that a "stand-alone" facility might be more appropriate and effective.

At the senate's decree, the museum dropped its plans for the Holocaust gallery (which may yet gain existence as an independent facility) and the dispute was apparently resolved to everyone's satisfaction.

When I toured the Canadian War Museum last week, it became clear to me that there are indeed good reasons to de-emphasize the specifically European story of the Holocaust in a narrative that focuses upon Canada and Canadians at war.

The museum, which purports to relate 1,000 years of Canadian military history, opens with a Norse sword hearkening back to the days when Scandinavian explorers landed at Newfoundland and perhaps Nova Scotia. It concludes with a display of artifacts pertaining to Canada's peace-keeping missions in the Golan Heights, the Sinai, Cyprus, Croatia, Somalia – and Haiti, where Canadian troops are still stationed.

Housed in a three-story Tudor gothic stone building that previously contained the National Archives, the Canadian War Museum's first floor is devoted to the early colonial era, the War of 1812, the Riel Rebellion and World War I.

The middle floor relates the epic tale of World War II from Canadian eyes, while the top floor tells of Canada's involvement in the Korean War and its various peacekeeping roles in political hot zones.

Perhaps the most intricately realized of the museum's dioramas and displays focuses on the D-Day invasion of June 1944. One looks upon a brilliantly rendered scene of massive mobilization as many thousands of Allied troops, including Canadians, storm a beach in Normandy. I studied the display intently for some minutes, explaining to the museum guide who accompanied me that my father had been among those who had landed there.

A display on the Third Reich shows off one of the museum's most popular artifacts: the distinctive black Mercedes convertible limousine in which Hitler used to parade before his adoring public. The display also features several huge Nazi banners and a huge bust of the Nazi Fuhrer, set against an appropriate backdrop of corpses piled in a pit. Decapitated from a statue, the Fuhrer's metallic head was brought back to Canada as a war trophy.

One display case holds a mannequin of an SS officer in full uniform with death-head regalia, while another contains the striped garb of a concentration camp inmate. A sketch of Belsen by Alex Colville adorns a wall. With these allusions, the museum dispenses with the Holocaust, which is, after all, a mere subtext to the story it has set out to tell. Call it "War as seen from the Canadian point of view."

The museum tells that story well and with a Ripleyesque panache, providing us with multiple chronological perspectives of the ordinary heroic grunt in the trenches. With only a small part of its collections on view, the museum should have no trouble filling its proposed new exhibition space, even without a Holocaust gallery which would have accounted for six percent of the total.

Doc probes deeper into Oskar Schindler

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

By now just about everybody knows the story of Oskar Schindler, the Nazi spy and industrialist who saved more than 1,000 Jews from Hitler's death camps.

Schindler, airing on History Television March 30, 8p.m. (Eastern), probes more deeply into this story, interviewing some of "Schindler's Jews," as those he saved became known, plus Schindler's wife and his wartime mistress.

One of the most fascinating aspects of Jon Blair's documentary narrated by Dirk Bogarde is the interview with the mistress of Amon Goeth, the sadistic commander of Plaszow labor camp in Poland who enjoyed killing Jewish inmates for sport.

His mistress, who was dying of emphysema (she died four days after this interview was granted), defends her wartime lover with vigor, literally to her deathbed.

When asked how she could love a man who killed so many Jews, she calmly states that he wasn't that bad. "He didn't kill any more Jews than other SS officers."

When asked about Goeth's virulent anti-Semitism she evades the question and accuses Schindler of not "loving Jews," but merely being an opportunistic businessman at the right time in the right place.

And that might have been true at first, but there is no doubt that Schindler went out of his way, frequently getting arrested by the SS, to save "his Jews." This became more obvious after the Jews on his famous "list" were sent to Auschwitz. Schindler managed to transfer them out – the only such transfer of inmates out of Auschwitz.

Hero or opportunist, Schindler's life is still a fascinating one. With interviews with those who knew him, this documentary is an excellent companion piece to Steven Speilberg's Academy Award-winning movie.

16-year-old's CDs into their second printing

Special to The CJN

Aubrey Litvack

TORONTO — As part of a school program for gifted students, Aubrey Litvack, 16, recorded Heads and Tails, an album of his own guitar compositions that has sold so well that he is about to order a second printing of the CD.

A straight-A Grade 11 student at Thornlea Secondary School in Thornhill, Litvack produced the four-song CD and tape as part of the Autonomous Learner Program, which allows 20 students at the school the freedom to pursue a personal or small group project related to the community.

Besides being gifted academically, he is a talented musician who scored first place for his age group in the Kiwanis Music Festival in 1996, and has won numerous top prizes in the Peel Music Festival.

He used the proceeds of a Kiwanis scholarship to fund production of the CD and tape.

Heads and Tails, the album's title track, is a strongly rhythmic Latin-influenced piece for which Litvack double-tracked himself on guitar and percussion. The other numbers are Spanish Nights, Samba de Luna and Madawaska. The latter, a piece for solo classical guitar, is named after a river in Algonquin Park.

"Its musical structure is imitative of the river," he explains. "The river starts as a small lake, then becomes larger and faster with a few waterfalls, and ends off as a small lake again."

Besides producing the CD, he has been actively involved in promoting it with posters and performances in venues such as a local Second Cup and the Temple Sinai, where he teaches music. His older brother, Michael, teaches Grade 6 at the Temple Sinai religious school and his mother, Lyn Litvack, is a nursery school teacher at the same synagogue. His father, Paul Litvack, is a furniture salesman.

Litvack, who has been studying at the Mozart Music College for several years, is not necessarily pursuing a career in music. "I'd like music to be in my future career plans but I'm not counting on it because I know how difficult it can be. I'm planning on going to university and doing something in the psychology field."

A view of Jewish Tunisia

By GERALD SCHWARTZ
Special to the CJN

TUNIS — The film, A Summer in La Goulette, about three familes – Jewish, Christian and Muslim – in Tunisia before the Six Day War, sparked my interest in the history and fate of Tunisia's Jewish population, which once numbered over 100,000.

After contacting several Canadian Jews of Tunisian heritage and doing some research, I travelled to Tunis.

The day I arrived (Nov. 7, 1997) was the 10th anniversary of what is called the "changement" – the end of the regime of Habib Bourghiba and the takeover of President Ben-Ali, the present leader of Tunisia. Tunis, the capital, was filled with gigantic red banners and exhibits celebrating the anniversary.

Tunisia's Jewish population has dwindled to the hundreds since independence from France and the Six Day War. Le Grand Synagogue at 43 avenue de la Liberté, with its beautiful white facade and columns, was shuttered and guarded by two armed soldiers.

The only kosher restaurant, Le Duc, on a quiet side-street downtown, was no longer kosher under rabbinic supervision I was informed by the maitre d'hotel.

I took the TGM (Tunis-La Goulette-La Marsa) commuter train to the ruins at Carthage and the village of Sidi Bou-Said, which is perched on a cliff above the Mediterranean.

On the way back, I stopped at Old La Goulette, the port of Tunis, once a summer beach resort – now decaying – and once home to many Jews. Trying to locate Club Les Jasmins, owned by a Jewish couple, proved fruitless without a street address.

The northern Mediterranean coast is where most tour groups stay in such towns as Sousse, Hammamet and Monastir. The cities of Sousse and Sfax have picturesque medinas (walled old cities) and souks (markets); however, the real Tunisia is to be found in the interior and the south.

The holy city of Kairouan and the Roman ruins at El-Djem are worthwhile excursions from Sousse and are both located amidst an area of large olive groves.

It was in Sousse's medina that an elderly shopkeeper told me of his deportation to a German labor camp during World War II. Tunisia was occupied by the Nazis between November 1942 and May 1943. During this time, there were round-ups of Jews for labor camps and deportations to death camps.

The city of Gabès is Tunisia's gateway to the south and also had a significant Jewish population in the past. It is situated in a gigantic date palm oasis with hundreds of trees, all bearing fruit during the harvest month of November.

From Gabès, excursions to three Berber villages are possible. Throughout the country I travelled by louage, an efficient system of shared five-passenger taxis that leave from the bus station areas and are a great way to meet the locals. French is widely spoken, but a few words of Arabic helped to break the ice.

A unique side-trip from Gabès is a night in a cave-hotel in Matmata, a 30-minute ride away. In a large depression, the Tunisian Auto Club operates the Hotel Marhala, where guests stay in a clean, comfortable cave. Breakfast is included in the cave-hotel's dining room.

The trip from Gabès to Tozeur near the Algerian border crosses the Chott-el-Jerid, the largest salt-water flat region of the country. En route, the village of Douz, where the sand dunes of the Sahara begin, can be visited.

Tozeur is an oasis town that is starting to boom due to direct flights from Europe. From here, one must take a two-hour trip aboard the Lézard Rouge (Red Lizard), a restored train from the early part of the century, into the Selja Gorge – a unique experience. As well, the mountain oases of Mides, Chebika and Tamerza can be toured.

The famed island of Djerba, home of an ancient Jewish community from the first century BCE, is only a 35-minute flight from Tozeur. The few remaining Jews, many of whom are jewelers, live in Hara-Kebira (the large ghetto), but the main tourist attraction is the Ghriba Synagogue in Hara Seghira (the little ghetto) just a short ride south of the main town of Houmt-Souk.

This beautiful Sephardi shul, (the present building dates from the 1920s) consists of two rooms, one with the bimah and stained glass windows of the 12 tribes, the other a smaller one with the sifrei Torah.

Two good guidebooks are Essential Tunisia (British-concise) and Tunisian Handbook (Footprints Guide). The Tunisian Tourist Office in Montreal was extremely helpful with literature and information: 1253 avenue McGill College, ste.655, Montreal. H3B 2Y5. Phone 514-397-1187/-0403 or fax 514-397-1647.

Genetic research must adhere to halacha: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Genetic research must be subject to halachic imperatives, said Rabbi Moses Tendler, an expert on medical ethics.

"Our great challenge is to not be embarrassed by what we read in the Torah," he added.

Rabbi Tendler, a rosh yeshivah at Yeshiva University, chair of its department of biology, and a frequent advisor on medical ethics to various government agencies, was speaking on Advances in Genetic Research: ethical and halachic perspectives, at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

One of the more dramatic finds in recent years, Rabbi Tendler said, is p53, which "finds bad [cancerous] cells and directs the body to destroy them."

This gene, he said, is "the main repair mechanism. If it mutates, then it won't work. Current research is looking for ways to put p53 back into the body, so that it can destroy cancer cells."

The fact is, however, Rabbi Tendler said, that cancer research has been a total failure. Recent studies show that in spite of scientific advancements and years of research, the life of a cancer patient has not been extended at all.

The main hope for cancer treatment now is research into cloning, the idea being to find ways to duplicate cells that can help fight cancers.

There has been so much hysteria about cloning, though, that efforts are being made to ban it completely, even when it can be helpful, he said.

There is nothing inherently halachically questionable about scientific research, Rabbi Tendler said. "The first commandment in the Bible is not just to 'be fruitful and multiply,' but to master the world.

Since G-d gave us nature, science and religion can't be on a collision course, he said.

Halachah does have something to say about the limitations of science, however.

What is the point, he asked, of conducting genetic screenings for diseases for which nothing can be done?

"For instance, we can detect who will develop Huntington's disease, and when they will get it. But you can't do anything about it, so who wants to know?

"Should we allow research to tell people the results of such screening, and thus steal decades of quality life?"

The international Human Genome Project has as its goal to identify all the genes in the human body and find out what they do.

If they find bad genes, which Rabbi Tendler defined as genes which can cause disease, "do you tell that person not to have children?"

Genetics, he said, gave Hitler the excuse to exterminate Jews, because they supposedly had bad genes. "It's genetic cleansing, like ethnic cleansing."

Also, Rabbi Tendler asked, how soon will society be able to tell you that if you have bad genes, you have not only the right but the obligation not to have children?

He warned against potential problems in getting insurance or getting certain kinds of jobs, coupled with the fact that there is very little funding for genetic counselling. Only two programs in the United States train counsellors to advise people with problematic genes.

But the real fear, he said, is germ cell gene therapy, where the goal is not to modify existing genes to prevent or treat disease, but rather to modify the individual, or at worst to create a new individual entirely. While at the moment no one in the world will do such a procedure, "What will stop you from modifying a gene not for therapeutic reasons, but for enhancement? I fear that what can be done, will be done."

Another problem in gene research is what Rabbi Tendler called The Cain Defence, that is, if genes control behavior such as aggression, then the individual has no responsibility for what he does.

That goes against the Torah view that G-d gave human beings free will. Citing a study about a family in the hills of Arkansas that had a history of violence, aggression and rape, due, it was said, to a preponderance of the genes for aggression, he said, "If that family lived in Toronto, they wouldn't act that way."

G-d teaches you to master yourself, he said. "The decision to behave morally is yours."

In reply to a question from the audience, Rabbi Tendler said he objected to mass screenings of high school age children by Dor Yeshorim; the students are tested for genes for Tay Sachs and Canavan's disease, among others, but results are only given when a shidduch is being arranged.

"It's not so much the screening I object to, as the secrecy surrounding it," he said.

Fencing master plans to come out of retirement

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The way Ernest Meister sees it, he was tired of being retired. Or, to put it another way, he wasn't tired enough to be retired in the first place.

Any way you cut it, the lifelong athlete is eager to re-enter the world of sports. The former coach of the Romanian and (later) Canadian national fencing teams, Meister believes he still has lots to offer, from guiding the development of top level athletes to developing activities programs for seniors groups.

At 76, he's not a spring chicken anymore, but he believes his experience can't be matched.

"I still could teach fencing. I still could do counselling in different sports. I could be useful to senior groups with my personal example because I work out every day, even with weights," he said.

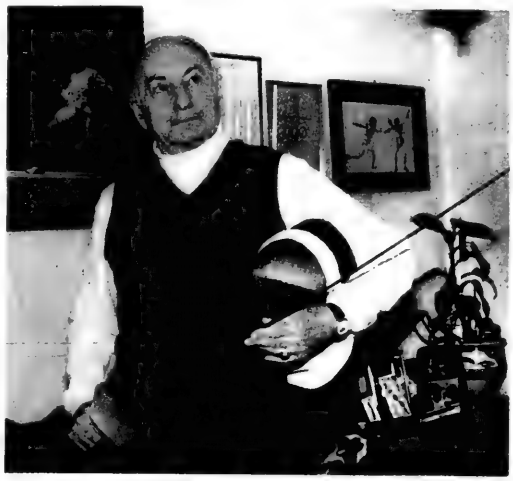
Surrounded in his home by mementoes from about 100 competitions and plaques commemorating his achievement as coach of world champion athletes, Meister is earnest in wanting to become actively involved in sports again.

As past coach of Olympic-calibre athletes, Meister had particular experience in guiding young sportsmen to perform at their best. "I can guide them, make plans for them and facilitate their improvement so they peak at the right time, at the competition," he said.

A look at his record in the world of sports gives credence to his claims.

A native of Cluj, in the Transylvanian province of Romania, Meister started his career in athletics prior to the war as a multi-sport athlete. He swam, played water polo, boxed and fenced. In 1941, when Hungary occupied his corner of Romania, Meister competed with other Hungarian Jews and won the Haggibor Trophy in fencing. Prior to that, he represented Romania in swimming and water polo at the Maccabiah Games in Palestine.

During World War II, Meister spent 26 months in a labor camp and when he emerged, he learned the Nazis had killed 54 of his close relatives, including his parents.



Ernest Meister

Shortly after the war while travelling on a bus in Cluj, he ran into a former teacher, who invited him to teach physical education at a Jewish school. At the same time, he would be allowed to pursue university studies.

He grabbed at the opportunity and never looked back. Meister quickly expanded his activities to include managing one of the city's largest sports clubs, known by the sponsor's corporate name, Dermata. The club drew from 5,000 employees and it fielded an A Division soccer club, of which he was general manager.

Meanwhile, he became a full professor at the the school of physical education at the University of Bucharest and subsequently the head of the department of combat sports, which included fencing, boxing, wrestling and weightlifting.

He also served as department head at the Ministry of Sport and from that position, became involved in helping develop world championship and Olympic teams. "My department had the duty to work out plans with the head coaches in every sport," he explained.

In 1946, he participated in his last competition, finishing sixth in the Romanian national sabre fencing championships. He coached the men's national fencing team from 1948 to 1960, including at the 1952 Olympics in Helsinki. He also served as technical director of the Romanian Olympic team at the winter games in Oslo.

His life changed in the 1960s when Nicolai Ceaucescu took over the government and began a policy of placing ethnically pure Romanians in positions of authority, Meister said.

In 1964, he left Romania for Sao Paulo, Brazil, where he became head coach of two top clubs, Pinheiros and the Athletic Club of Polistario. He coached top Brazilian fencers in international competitions.

In 1966, however, he pulled up stakes again to be with his daughter in Canada, going from a big fish in a little pond to a little fish in a little pond. From prestigious head coaching jobs in Brazil, he became a presser in Canada, working in a ladies' clothes factory. While earning a living during the day, he resumed his coaching career at night, working with fencers at the Harmonie Club. By 1969, his fencers were winning national titles at a competition in Calgary.

He also changed jobs, developing a program in remedial gymnastics at a Workers Compensation Hospital and rehab centre.

In 1975, he served as head coach of the Canadian fencing team at the Pan Am games and led the women's team to a silver medal in the foil event for the first time ever.

In 1976 at the Montreal Olympics, one of his fencers defeated the former world champion, but Canada lost the team event to the United States by a narrow margin.

"It was one of Canada's best showings until that time," he recounted with pride.

At the same time, his career on the national stage began to unravel. He criticized fencing's bureaucratic leadership and was soon pushed aside. After 1976, he served as a club coach at Humber College, retiring from coaching in 1985.

Meister believes there's no shortage of fencing talent in Canada, only a lack of proper coaching and development. That analysis extends also to the Jewish community. Some of the best international fencers of the early part of the century, many of them world champions, were Hungarian Jews, he said. Meister believes that with the proper guidance, there's no reason a Canadian couldn't do the same

Associated wins again

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Who's going to stop Associated?

Only about six weeks after the school's Danilack branch captured the boys championship in the Jewish schools basketball tournament, Associated's Hurwich Kamin Kings prevailed in the third annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Hockey Tournament.

The Kings defeated Leo Baeck 5-2 in the title game, giving the Associated schools bragging rights in Jewish inter-school athletics.

In the title game, the Kings turned the tables on Leo Baeck, which had defeated them twice during the exhibitions season by identical 5-1 scores.

Five teams participated in the annual tournament, including USDS Bathurst, USDS Bayview, Associated Hurwich, Associated Danilack and Leo Baeck.

The Kings' roster included Joel Arshoff, Kenny Erlich, Brandon Farb, Adam Gold, Ryan Herblum, Mark Kostiner, Mikki Levy, Jordan Master, Kyle Pasternac, Cory Rubin, Jory Stern, Steven Weinberg, Jeffrey Wieskopf and Aaron Zimner.

Leo Baeck's roster included Raphi Aronowicz, Paul Ceresne, Jonah Goldberg, Adam Landen, Danny Millar, Josh Mosko, Daniel Olyan, Philip Pollack, Michael Sacvitzon, Mathew Seigel, Matthew Singerman, Michael Sklar and Josh Stark.

The Inside Back

How to keep these adults awake at your seder

By JORDAN MAX

As the father of three young children, I have come to the conclusion that the essential difference between children and grown-ups is that grown-ups want to sleep at night while children do not. Put another way, the natural state of children is consciousness, while it is the opposite for adults; hence the existence of the coffee industry.

On the seder nights (fast approaching), however, we want to encourage both children and adults to stay awake. Now, keeping the children awake is a lot easier than keeping those sleepy grown-ups interested and awake, particularly without the aid of coffee. Here then are some suggestions for keeping your adults alert during your seders.

Before candlelighting, set all clocks back at least three hours and ask all participants to reset their watches too. Alternatively, tell everyone to pretend it's Saturday night or New Year's Eve. No self-respecting grown-up will ever go to bed before midnight on Saturday night.

Take turns reading sections of the Haggadah, but in an unpredictable pattern. For example, don't just say, "Hey, nudnik, it's your turn." Instead, call out "Now the person with blue eyes and a green dress with the red wine stain," or if you have a teenager, "Now the person with green hair, earring and brown eyes." Good for testing their reflexes and response times.

If you have an accountant at the table (I sometimes do), keep their minds awake and off the impending tax file date by asking them to figure out how 70 persons became 600,000 in just 210 years in Egypt, or how long it would have taken them to clear customs, if they were all to arrive at the same time on 747s. Remember, since this is yom tov, calculators, slide rules and pens and note pads are not allowed. Guaranteed to keep them occupied at least until dinner. For everybody else, ask them to tabulate their cholesterol and/or sodium intake during the meal.

Last Laugh

For the sports fan(atic)s at the table who are by now experiencing heavy withdrawal symptoms, remind them that the real hockey playoffs won't get underway for at least another two weeks; the only sports on TV right now are figure skating and curling; and the part of the seder after the meal should be thought of as overtime or extra innings, with interviews and highlights to follow.

Frequently interrupt the seder with deep probing questions for discussion. Examples: What is the significance of the Pina Colada flavored macaroon? When the Jews left Egypt, did they get a volume discount on wagon rentals? The zanier, the better. Or quiz them on what Aunt Zelda served for dessert on the second night of Pesach in 1985. Remember, "When do we eat?" or "When are we going to be finished?" do not qualify.

The post-meal parts of the seder are definitely the most challenging for any leader, as sleepiness starts to set in from the huge meal and many glasses of wine. Perhaps this explains why most people just speed through these parts. Announce a new house rule that the first one to fall asleep or leave the table for something other than a bathroom visit gets the honor of doing the dishes afterwards. A sure-fire trick.

Have a Chag Samayach and wakeful seders.

ISRAELI ORANGE CHICKEN

5 lb. roasting chicken
2 whole oranges
1/2 cup orange juice
1/2 cup wine
1 large onion, cut in large slices
2 tblsp. ginger, freshly grated
2 tblsp. honey

Rinse and dry chicken. Sprinkle with salt & pepper. Insert one whole orange in the chicken. Place in roasting pan, breast side down. Surround with onion slices. Mix juice with ginger, and pour over the chicken. Roast uncovered for 1/2 hour at 350°F.

Remove chicken from the oven, turn over, and smear with honey. Surround the chicken with the second orange, sliced, and return to the oven. After 5 minutes, baste with wine and pan juices. If browning too quickly, cover with foil. Baste again, after 1/2 hour. Continue cooking until drumsticks are removed easily, about 1 more hour.

Remove the orange from inside chicken, and slice it. Garnish with herbs. Yield: 8 servings. Serving idea: Haroseth makes a good stuffing for this dish ...

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I have an interview coming up and I haven't been to a job interview for quite some time. Do you have any advice?

Dear Reader,

Based on discussions with clients of mine who have found jobs, the most important bit of advice is to stay calm. This is only a job interview. The meeting is to see if your skills and personality match what they are looking for, and if their style of working will make the company a good place for you.

If you want to impress your interviewer, remember to stay focused on the discussion. Answer the questions you are asked, not the questions you want them to ask.

That means you may not get an opportunity to use any answers you have prepared, but that is okay. You will likely have time at the end of the interview to tell them anything about yourself that you believe you would like to add.

Answer questions to the best of your ability, referring to your experience as often as possible. Don't try to be an expert on everything. If they ask you something about which you have little knowledge, you can say you are always interested in learning and would be willing to take a course.

Sometimes people hire based on the candidate's "fit" in the organization, not only on what he or she knows.

Before your interview, go visit the place where you want to work. This is a signal to an employer that you are really interested in their organization. You may get an opportunity to meet people and see what they do.

If you found out about the job vacancy through networking, let your interviewer know and tell him who told you about the job. That person obviously thought highly enough about you that they recommended you apply.

Finally, don't consider your interview "just practice." Give it your best shot. Be positive. If this is the right situation for you, you'll land the job. Good luck.

Job Search is a monthly column by career educator Lisa Galet Klug. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

The eyes have it at Josephson Optical

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Eyewear makes a definite fashion statement says Dr. Josh Josephson, owner of Josephson Opticians.

Glasses are the first thing people see when they look at someone's face, says Josephson, whose father David Ralph Josephson, opened the first store, then called D.R. Josephson Opticians, in 1935. There are now eight stores in the Toronto area; the newest is at 466 Eglinton Ave. W.

In the new store, glasses are mounted in a special box that is lit from above, on the side and in front "so the eyewear pops out at the viewer. Lighting is critical in an optical store, because people need to see themselves. It is important to have a tremendous amount of indirect light at eye level," he says.

On the cover:

Uncomplicated fashion with a touch of the Far East in indigo and reed green from Mondi

"Together with the soothing combination of blue-toned and wood walls, it makes the store a comforting place to shop in," says Josephson.

He says the selection of eyewear today "is enormous. Selecting a frame, though, can be an overwhelming experience, we try and make things as easy as possible."

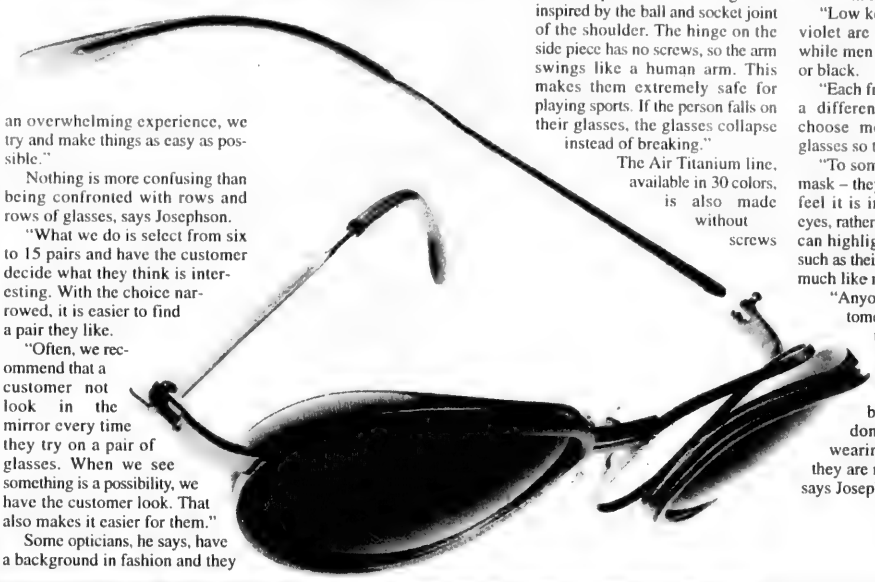
Nothing is more confusing than being confronted with rows and rows of glasses, says Josephson.

"What we do is select from six to 15 pairs and have the customer decide what they think is interesting. With the choice narrowed, it is easier to find a pair they like.

"Often, we recommend that a customer not look in the mirror every time they try on a pair of glasses. When we see something is a possibility, we have the customer look. That also makes it easier for them."

Some opticians, he says, have a background in fashion and they train other opticians in the store.

"We look for a compatibility when choosing colors. Sometimes blue frames go with blue eyes, but we must also work with skin tonality. Color also affects the form of the glasses – certain colors work best in certain shapes. We must consider shape and size when choosing color."



Josephson carries such lines as Mont Blanc, Yohji Yamamoto, Jean Paul Gauthier, Lunor, Martine Sitbon, Matsuda, Beausoleil and Face-A-Face.

"Phillipe makes a line of glasses inspired by the ball and socket joint of the shoulder. The hinge on the side piece has no screws, so the arm swings like a human arm. This makes them extremely safe for playing sports. If the person falls on their glasses, the glasses collapse instead of breaking."

The Air Titanium line, available in 30 colors, is also made without screws and is lightweight – about 2.7 grams - and durable. The line is also available in platinum and gold, but those are slightly heavier.

Trends today are towards plastic frames in a variety of shapes and colors, and light-weight metal frames in subtle shades.

"Low key, quiet colors such as violet are important for women, while men often choose dark blue or black.

"Each frame gives the customer a different look. People often choose more than one pair of glasses so their look changes.

"To some people, glasses are a mask – they hide behind them. We feel it is important to flatter the eyes, rather than hide them. Glasses can highlight a person's features, such as their eyebrows, cheekbones, much like makeup.

"Anyone can satisfy their customers – we want ours more than satisfied. If they are not happy about some aspect of their glasses, we want them to come back to the store. We don't want our customers wearing glasses with which they are not completely happy," says Josephson.

Shoes that really fit

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Axmith Shoes measures customers' feet

At Axmith Shoes, 659 Yonge St., there is no such thing as hard to fit feet.

The store, in the family since Lou Axmith opened at Yonge and Dundas in 1929, specializes in sizes that are difficult to find anywhere else.

"That's not to say we don't carry average sizes – we just carry every size from size 3 to size 13, and widths from AAAA to D," says Kathy Axmith, who now owns the store along with her mother Marlene.

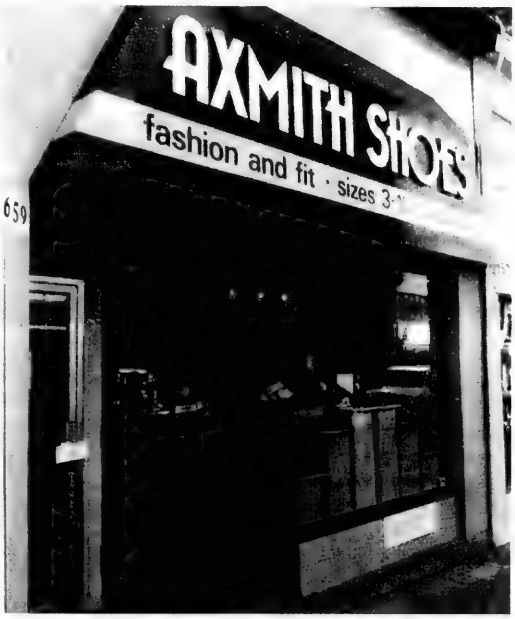
What many customers find unusual about their store, says Axmith, who works with her husband Marc Strasberg, is they actually measure their customer's feet.

"That is something that most stores do not do anymore – especially for women's shoes."

Often, she says women's feet are narrower in the back, and foot problems crop up because they do not buy their shoes accordingly.

"Most of the shoes we carry have a combination last, which means the front of the foot is wider than the heel, so a shoe that is B width in the front will be AA in the back. That way, women do not have their heels popping out of the shoes."

Shoes made with a combination last are more expensive to make, says Axmith, so many stores do not carry them.



Axmith Shoes: From sizes 3-13.

"We buy a lot of our shoes from Thomas Wallace, a company that manufactures shoes in Montreal. We also carry a lot of Italian shoes. Whereas some stores specialize in large or small shoes, and other in wide or narrow shoes, we really do have shoes for everyone.

"I laugh when a customer comes in during a sale and says 'I don't suppose you have any shoes in 8 B?' and I tell them that I do have 8 B, I just don't have 9 AAAA or size 13 left – they've all been sold. In regular stores, it's the size 8 B that goes first."

Axmith says that private stores today need their own niche in the marketplace. "We have a specific target group, and our customers come back again and again for casual and dress shoes."

Axmith, who has served such personalities as Bette Midler, Pierre Trudeau and O.J. Simpson - as well as many federal, provincial and local politicians – says they stopped selling men's shoes when the store moved to its present location last year.

"We now concentrate on women's shoes that fit well and look good.

"Our shoes are definitely fashion forward and when I buy, I try to find shoes that young girls would wear. Too many people think of hard to fit shoes as being totally unfashionable. That is not the case at all."

Teenagers and women are still wearing chunky shoes with square toes, she says. "We are really not seeing pointy toes and heels. Even sandals are chunky. We carry strappy, metallic-colored sandles with chunky heels that look great with flare pants. Just because a 17-year-old girl has size 12 feet, it doesn't mean she can't wear stylish shoes."

Black is still the most important color in shoes, she says. Muted metallic, navy, bone and cream-colored shoes are popular for the spring, but nothing beats black. "Our stock room is one huge sea of black, with little collections of other colors."

Most important, however, is that women today want shoes that feel good, says Axmith. "Women work, and they want to be able to wear shoes that are still comfortable at the end of a long day. High heels and pointy shoes may look good on the fashion runway, but they are not suitable for everyday life."

Dressing women in most flattering colors

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Designer Luba Benson said she stopped selling her fashions to retail outlets 19 years ago because she felt buyers were selecting garments in colors that were trendy but not necessarily flattering.

"I had agencies across North America carrying my line, but I got tired of buyers," Benson said, "because shoppers were at the mercy of the people who set the color trends."

She opted to create a unique fashion salon – Luba Your Fashion Image (YFI) – offering women exclusive made-to-measure clothing, from shorts to evening wear, in colors that suited their skin types, she said. "We're the only one in North America."

She noted that last year lime green, which she described as a "hot trendy disposable color," was very popular, even though it suits few people and it dates quickly.

But at YFI (488-LUBA), there are more than 800 fabrics to choose from and people get to order clothes in colors based on the palette of one of the four seasons, Benson said, explaining that everyone has a particular season that suits them best.

She said she had instinctively been putting people in their most flattering colors before season color analysis came to the fore some 15 years ago. "It [color analysis] made total sense to me."

Keeping a wardrobe in one season or palette of colors simplifies dressing because it's easier to match accessories and makeup.

"We have our fabric made so that we can offer all the colors of all the seasons all the time. If you bought a stone blue suit two years ago, we still have prints that work with that color."

Shoppers also get their clothes made in styles that suit them best, Benson said. "If you're ordering pants, we can make straight leg pants which can be pleated or not, with a back, front or side zipper – whatever suits the client's body.

Lots of attention paid to detail

"We make skirts of all lengths, we offer elastic waists for some and for others no waist band. It all depends on body shape and personal preference. Our trademark is a blouse and matching hanky."

She said that she can also customize a suit for any affair and maximize its wearability. "If you have a bar mitzvah, we can dress up the suit for you with detachable satin lapels and a shawl collar. We don't believe in one-shot occasion clothes where after the affair, the dress just hangs in the closet."

YFI, which recently moved to 3044 Yonge St. at Lawrence Avenue, has a Colours technician on the premises offering shoppers a complete color and makeup and body style analysis to help them learn what colors and styles suit them best, said fashion consultant Lindy Meshwork.

"We thought having Colours on the premises was a really nice marriage, because we're making completely customized clothes according to Colours principles."

But it's not necessary to have a complete analysis to choose the clothing. The fashion consultant can assist clients with color selection, Meshwork said. "If they don't know what season they are, we'll help them find a color palette that best suits their skin tone."

The initial appointment – all appointments are booked ahead – begins with a confidential fact sheet about lifestyle so that the consultant can understand the wardrobe needs and preferences of the client, she said.

"We encourage people coming for the first time to bring in pieces from their wardrobe so that we can incorporate something new with what they have and see what works together. The consultation is complimentary."

Jackets start at $449, with skirts and pants in the $200 range, she said.

Fashion consultants keep a file on clients and they record fabric and styles, Meshwork explained. "When we receive a new fabric, we can coordinate the wardrobe."

She stressed that a lot of attention is paid to details such as breast pockets on jackets and an inside pocket for business cards, a feature not common for women's apparel. She noted that a customized wardrobe is often useful to accommodate the needs of Orthodox clients.

YFI offers a custom-ordered line of golf and knitwear and fall and winter coats. Jewelry and accessories including scarves and hats are also available, she said. "The way we put it all together is what sets us apart."

According to Luba, YFI "takes a lot of stress out of looking good. We are an intelligent investment in your image."

Chacok line specializes in knitwear and loose fits

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Entering Quasar Mode in Yorkville is like walking into an exotic garden. The boutique is filled with clothing imported from France, in vivid colors like cobalt blue, corn and fuchsia.

Owner Ginette Beauchamp, known as Ginette to her clientele, has run Quasar Mode (964-1214), located at 1240 Bay St., at the corner of Bellair and Cumberland streets, for almost two decades.

She told The CJN that when she bought the business she retained the name Quasar because the word suggested an image of celestial and dreamlike clothing.

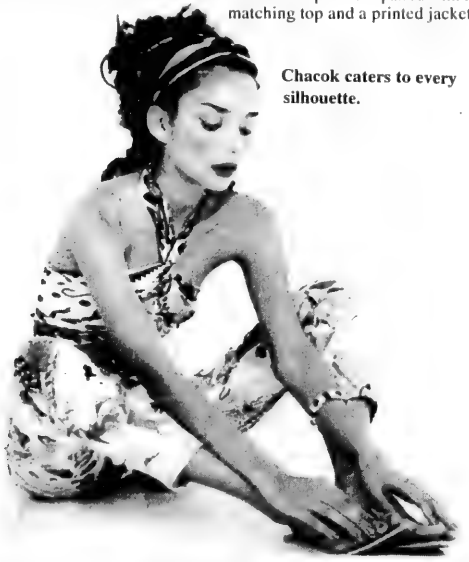
Much of the clothing at Quasar Mode comes from French-Riviera-based designer Chacok, who specializes in knitwear and loose-fitted clothing with elasticized waists, in jersey knits and other soft fabrics, like chiffon and crepe georgette.

Ginette said Chacok has been very popular throughout Europe and in Japan for the last 30 years. She described the line as "casual chic, extremely comfortable. The look of Chacok can bring you from work to a wedding. Its versatility is exceptional."

She saw the Chacok line shortly after taking over the boutique, she said. "I fell in love with the collection the moment I saw it. I believed in this line."

She built her clientele around Chacok, she said. "We had fashion shows when the collection first came to Toronto. Quasar Mode is the only Toronto boutique to carry Chacok."

Items from the spring collection include a long straight skirt with a slit, coordinated with a tunic top. Cobalt-blue pants are paired with a matching top and a printed jacket that picks up the blue.



Chacok caters to every silhouette.

Chacok, who "caters to every silhouette," is also showing coordinating vests, loose sweaters, short and long skirts, and narrow pants, Ginette said.

She said many designers are showing layered looks this spring, but that has always been Chacok's forte. "She's been doing it for years."

Unique to Chacok's collection is a 100-percent linen jersey fabric that is ideal for travel because the jersey doesn't crease, it can be hand-washed easily and it's extremely light, Ginette said.

"You can't have anything cooler for summer. I even have Israeli customers who come to my boutique to buy it."

Other French designer lines available at Quasar Mode include two Parisian designers, Genevieve Tarka, who designs business suits, and a jersey weekend-wear line by Dorothée Bis.

Ginette is very excited about a new line of well-priced embroidered silk eveningwear in an array of pastel colors by Ineptie. The styles include long dresses coordinated with shawls, and long skirts and palazzo pants with coordinated tops and jackets.

"It's a young look with an elegant textured style. I discovered this line in Paris and I was very happy to find it. I had been looking for an eveningwear line for several years. It didn't look pretentious. The lines are fluid and simple and the fabric is special."

Ginette said she makes shopping easy by displaying an entire collection for easy viewing and she does not charge for alterations. Quasar Mode carries accessories and jewelry, she said. "We like to send people out with a complete look."

One of her most popular and appreciated jewelry collections is from Israeli designer Ayala Bar. Ginette described Bar's jewelry as "art deco meets the Middle East."

Quasar Mode offers Torontonians beautiful clothing in a reasonable price range, Ginette said. "The challenge in the fashion business is to find beautiful and wonderful things without them being exorbitant."

Non-surgical method of treating fat makes it safe to go back to the water

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

With beach season right around the corner, many of us are beginning to wonder if we dare don a bathing suit this year.

Thanks to endermologie, however, a non-surgical method of treating cellulite and fat, we can look forward to getting to the beach.

Anne Vandette, an endermologist and owner of Spa Elance, says that the procedure involves an "intensive full-body, kneading massage, using a powerful suction and rollers mechanism, which stimulate circulation by making blood and oxygen flow in the suffocated tissues.

"The fat is broken down and circulated throughout the body to redistribute evenly, leaving the devitalized zones lighter and more supple."

She stresses that endermologie is not a weight reduction program. "We do recommend diet and exercise, but what we have noticed is that the endermologie program helps make it easier to lose weight."

For those who need assistance in developing an exercise and nutrition regimen, a body builder and personal trainer who specializes in weight control and fitness has recently joined the staff.

Vandette, who works with her daughter, learned about the procedure, developed in France, when she attended a seminar as an employee of Laserderm.

"The whole thing sounded too good to be true, but I discovered it really does work. I did some research, read about studies done in Europe, and thought that I would do it it Toronto. I trained here and in Florida, and became the third person in Canada to obtain an endermologie machine."

'Too good to be true.'

Most of her clients, she says, are between the ages of 20 and 50 and are at their ideal weight. "Initially, we recommend starting with two sessions a week. Problem areas are focussed on, but time is given to other areas to stimulate general circulation and eliminate toxins – drinking two litres of water a day is mandatory in helping to eliminate stagnant wastes. Depending on the areas to be treated, most clients need an average of 15 sessions."

Changes in the body, she says, can usually be detected after about five treatments. "Depending on age and lifestyle, results can last from several months to several years. After a client's sessions are completed, we recommend once-a month maintenance to maintain results."

She says that a former client, who had not kept up maintenance, approached her to begin treatments again.

"I measured her and discovered that she had maintained about 85 percent of the results we had achieved in previous treatments. I take pictures of everyone so they can monitor their own results."

Endermologie, says Vandette, is also effective in the treatment of scars, burns, circulatory problems and muscular aches and pains.

"Many plastic surgeons recognize the use of endermologie prior to liposuction as an enhancement, making the surgery easier and more successful, especially in reducing orange peel skin."

Spa Elance is at 1214 Eglinton Ave. W., 783-1148.

Designer lets his fashions tell the story

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Yaron Minkowski, Israel's hottest young designer, said he avoids the limelight and lets his clothing be the focus of attention.

"People usually don't write about me. They write about my clothing," the Tel Aviv-based de-signer told The CJN recently.

"When they men-tion my name, it's not about my life. It's about the famous people wearing my clothes. I'm in the shadows."

Minkowski, 34, made his Canad-ian debut in Tor-onto this month as the featured designer in a gala Israeli fash-ion show pre-sented by York-dale in con-junction with Israel Bonds and the Israel at 50 committee.

Specializing in eveningwear, Minkowski made a name for himself in 1989 when he won an international prize in Germany for best young designer in a contest for student designers.

The winning collection was created from embroidered floral Russian tablecloths, which he further embellished with beading, he explained.

The tablecloths were inexpensive items he had found in the Jaffa flea market, but everybody thought he had used a very luxurious fabric, he said, pointing to portfolio pictures of the colorful peasant-style collection.

Designs in unusual fabric have become the hallmark of Minkowski's work, he noted. "I specifically try to find unusual material. I'm trying to surprise with the fabric all the time... When you wear my clothes, it's a statement. Even if it's a simple black dress, the cloth will be unusual. It stands out."

Among the pieces he brought to Toronto were terrycloth cocktail dresses printed with the image of Marilyn Monroe.

"No one would recognize that the dress is made from a towel," he said.

He also showed dresses made of soft rugs with the image of Elvis.

He said his boutique, which always offers colorful clothing, attracts a lot of people in the entertainment industry. "You can always find them in my store."

One of his most famous clients is the American television comedian, Fran Drescher (The Nanny), he said.

Since his designs are geared towards younger women – the average age of his clients is 20 to 40 – he keeps his clothing reasonably priced, because younger shoppers don't have that much disposable income, he said.

Minkowski said he finds the inspiration for his designs in the glamor of old movies as well as in traditional folk costumes, and he scours the world in search of unusual fabrics. He expressed a fondness for folk fabrics – he has used Chinese brocades and kaffiyehs – which he said add a lot interest to his designs.

From his portfolio pictures it is evident that he also uses a lot of sequins, rhinestones, and beading to add texture and glamor. One of his most unusual pieces is a gold-plated rhinestone-studded bustier.

Designs speak for themselves

Minkowski said he was a gifted artist as a child and exhibited when he was a teenager. After completing compulsory military service, he studied architecture at a technical school. He said his father had hoped that his only son would go into the family business, a service centre for heavy construction equipment.

He continued painting and became a graphic artist. On a whim, he said, he took an entrance exam for the prestigious Shenkar College of Fashion in Ramat Gan and was accepted.

Throughout his studies, he worked for Gottex, the giant bathing suit company, with which he continues to maintain an association.

After graduating, he worked for Gideon Oberson, a top Israeli fashion house, before going on to design under his own label.

Minkowski is also the designer for Julian Kay, a high-end line of leatherwear which is produced in Jerusalem and sold in the United States. He said he hopes to eventually have a chain of stores bearing his name and to develop an international market for his label.

He said it may sound as if he lives a jetsetter's life because he travels frequently and works with a lot of glamorous models, but "that's only a small part of the work."

He said the travelling is tiring, "it's not a holiday," and he often puts in gruelling 12-hour days at his fashion house; so when evening comes, he's too exhausted to party. "When I finish working, I'm not going out to dance. I'm going to sleep."

A's Okay

Finally, a reward for straight A's – soft, natural B's by It Figures! swimwear.

This spring marks the launch of A's Okay, the hottest new addition to the It Figures! line of figure enhancing swimwear.

Designed specifically for women whose bra size falls within the AA to barely B range, A's Okay swimsuits feature contoured foam bra pads which enhance a woman's bust by a full cup size.

Not to be confused with the standard push-up pad swimwear inserts (which assume women have something there to push), the A's Okay pads cater to the less endowed woman by offering her a fuller, more shapely bust line that looks completely natural.

Available in a selection of one and two piece styles, fashion colors and prints, A's Okay suits will be sold in department stores across Canada beginning in April.

It Figures! swimwear is manufactured in Canada by Phantom Industries, Inc.

Clean, modern, fresh and feminine for "on the green" at Mondi

Beauty Shop

By Carol Wise

Lighten up! Spring is here

Color has never been prettier. Translucent shades dance softly in perfect harmony. Pink is stellar on lips, cheeks and eyes.

Frost, shimmer and gloss are everywhere, but not at the same time. Choose one area, or you could end up looking like saran wrap. Get in step with the season, lighten up and have fun.

Start by treating yourself to a professional facial, or take a night off and turn your washroom into your very own spa – cleanse, steam, exfoliate and treat.

Try the Natural Sea Beauty collection. It's a spa-oriented approach based on the ancient beauty secrets of the Dead Sea. The Dead Sea water and mud are unique for their high concentration of minerals believed to be the key to a well balanced skin metabolism.

Whatever your choice, welcome spring with a clean, fresh face.

Carol's Tips:

• Skin care is in the limelight with an abundance of beautifying products. Estee Lauder's Uncircle Eye Treatment screams, "Take me, I'm yours." Imagine those dark circles under your eyes diminished.

Take your eyes on a vacation with Clinique's All About Eyes. This little wonder brightens your eyes instantly. Its gel-cream texture gently hydrates while tackling a myriad of assaults caused by the environment and aging. It promises to nearly banish under-eye circles in six to 12 weeks.

Estee Lauder's Re-Nutriv Intensive Lifting Series is a powerful 14-day vial treatment that will restore skin, making it look younger, firmer and ultimately, replenished. Recommended seasonally or whenever you need an emergency treatment.

Lancome's Vitabolic is a true radiance booster containing a unique triangle of energy: Vitamin C, Ginseng and Ginkgo Biloba. These active ingredients are delivered to the heart of the skin to restore radiance from the very first application.

Dior's state-of-the-art invention of pure micro-protein in targeted liposomes produces Capture Essentiel, a complete anti-aging formula. In just one hour, this high power product promises to make skin appear smoother and more taut.

Defy your age

Give skin vibrance with Revlon's Age Defying Performance Skincare Face Cream and Lotion. Say goodbye to fine lines and dull skin in just eight days. It's the latest way to proclaim: "Don't lie about your age, defy it!"

Scientists at Estee Lauder's research laboratory have invented Diminish Retinol Treatment, a powerful and long-lasting skin care formula that is non-irritating and seems to reduce signs of aging. Retinol is a pure form of Vitamin A that activates the natural production of collagen. Diminish has a slow delivery system releasing the Retinol over a 12-hour period, transporting treatment where and when it's needed, thus making this unique formula both effective and gentle.

Elizabeth Arden's Visible Difference Refining Moisture Cream Complex and Eyecare Concentrate both bathe the skin in emollient cream, drastically reducing dryness; a younger luminous skin results.

Also from Arden, Visible Difference Eye-Fix and Lip-Fix primers not only keep these areas softer, but minimize fine lines and keep the makeup precisely where it's been applied, resistant to creasing, fading or smudging.

Biotherm introduces Biotherm Homme, a revolutionary skin care line to meet all the needs of your special guy.

• Foundation should be light and airy but provide good coverage. Ultima II invites you to discover Vital Radiance Skin Perfecting Sheer makeup. It's oil free and feels weightless, yet leaves your skin looking perfect.

Almay's Amazing Lasting Powder helps control shine so your skin stays fresh all day.

Lancome's Palette Pro Complexion Perfecting Kit combines under-eye concealer and color correctors to make you a camouflage pro. This artist's palette is designed to correct and enhance your skin. There is no secret to flawless skin.

L'Oreal introduces Feel Perfect Ultrasoft Transparent Powder and All Day Coverage Concealer, both providing a sheer, natural finish with a no-makeup feel.

Discover Estee Lauder's Uncircle Concealer designed for severely dark under-eye circles, it simply redefines the meaning of "cover-up."

For that special night on the town, dust your face and body with Poudre Blanc Neige from Lancome. This magical powder will create a halo of shimmering light.

• Eye paints this season are soft and feminine. Chanel features shades of powder blue, lemon, peach and blueberry – sounds delicious and looks oh so yummy.

Amazing Greys by Estee Lauder compliment this season's luminous fabrics and styles. Four sumptuous shades in a wet/dry formula will create many gorgeous looks.

Define your eyes with Lancomę's Artliner in the incredible new color, morphing blue.

Clinique's Stay The Day Eyeshadow colors the eyes with sun-washed tints like Honeybunch, Blue Heaven and Angelfood.

Christian Dior treats us with four gorgeous eye shadow tints for spring that are so dreamy they slide on like silk.

Visible Difference Good Morning Eye Treatment from Elizabeth Arden works wonders, helping reduce puffiness and dryness and lightening dark circles.

Mascara is a must. Maybelline's Volum'Express will give your lashes instant volume. And for you cry babies (Titaniacs), Estee Lauder's Raincoat mascara slides right over your favorite mascara and in a sweep, it's waterproofed!

• Cheeks are brought to life with Chanel's new powder blush in Candy, while Cyber Glow face highlighter, direct from the spring runway, gives sparkle to cheeks, lips and eyes with a glimmer of silver or gold.

Clinique's soft-pressed powder blusher in Honey Blush imparts a flushed glow of warmth to all skin tones.

• Hair this season is feminine, glamorous and very romantic, says Daniel Fiorio of Toronto's Salon Daniel. "Texture is the key in giving hair life and body. The classic bob comes back with a new twist and the fun lies in the cut's unbridled versatility." Mmmh, sounds like fun.

• Lips are drenched in sheer veils of color: very transparent, stunning alone or layered on last years matte. Stay-Put-Lipstick from Clinique gives a new meaning to "long lasting lipstick" – soft, silky and yes, totally loyal – the perfect relationship.

For glossy whispers, L'Oreal's Rouge Pulp liquid lipcolor glides on your lips with lustre and shine.

Chanel's Conditioning Lip Balm contains a cocktail of moisturizing ingredients to keep lips soft and inviting.

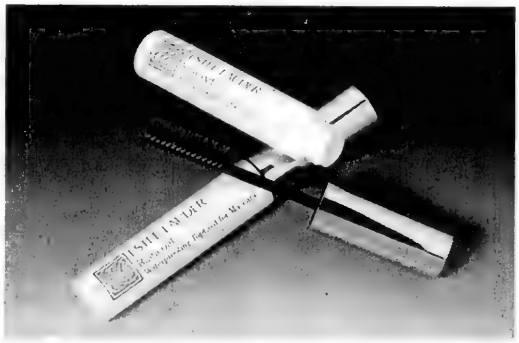
Not a lipstick, not a gloss, it's Lip Polish from Maybelline in 10 brilliant out-of-this-world shades. Fabulous! At counters in May.

• Nails compliment lips with transparent iridescent hues. Christian Dior introduces a new "light catcher' technique. Colors are so soft they appear almost by surprise. Check out Firefly Yellow and Rose Swirl. Hot trendy shades from Chanel are Confetti and Lilac #5 – a must have.

• Fragrance: Chanel #5 is now available in a luxurious bath oil and can be used in the shower or directly on the skin.

Dior's Eau de Dolce Vita has a new attitude of lightness that plays in the wake of this classic scent.

BioTherm expands its Eau Vitamin range with two sensational products, Perfumed Body Milk and Foaming Shower Gel. These products are moisturizing, refreshing and smell delicious.



Raincoat by Estee Lauder waterproofs your regular mascara.

Israel Fashion Show brings top designers to Yorkdale

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The best of Israeli design was showcased in the recent Israel Gala Fashion Show presented by Yorkdale Shopping Centre in celebration of the State of Israel's 50th anniversary.

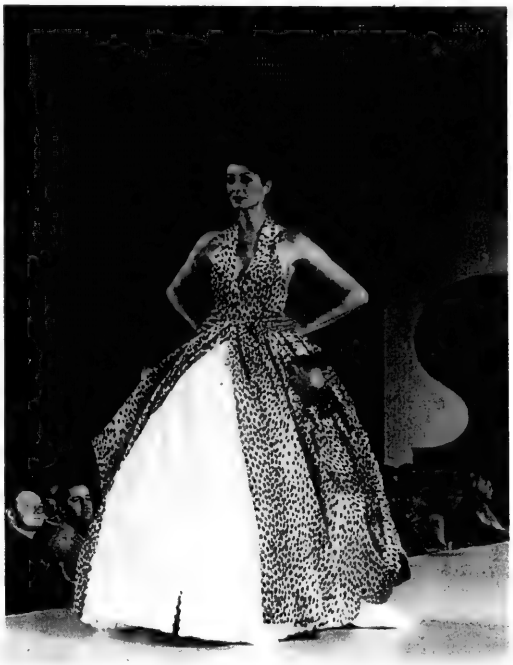
Close to 1,000 people attended this fashion event held at and sponsored by Yorkdale, in conjunction with the Israel at 50 committee and the State of Israel Bonds.

Israel's history – A Salute to Peace, The State of Israel, Ingathering of the People, Development of the Desert, The People of the Book, and The Year 2000 and Beyond – was depicted through fashions and accessories created by Israeli designers.

A multimedia show used a backdrop of images depicting historic and modern scenes of Israel, projected onto an 18 x 40 foot screen, as the models paraded down the runway. Limore Twena sang the theme song from the movie Exodus, and Shir Le Shalom.

Six haute couture peace gowns by Israeli designers were all presented in Canada for the first time, among them a gown by Gottex showed with a tulle skirt and train and the city of Jerusalem outlined in gold, and pewter sequins on the bodice.

Leading edge eveningwear designer Yaron Minkowski, the show's featured designer, made his Canadian debut. (See page 8 of this supplement.)



One of the "Peace" dresses designed by Hagar Alembic.

The evening, hosted by television personality Debbie Van Kiekebelt, began with brief speeches by Dodi Weill, vice-chair of State of Israel Bonds' North American Women's Division, and Israeli consul general Yehudi Kinar.

Kinar said Jewish-designers such as Ralph Lauren and Calvin Klein have had considerable prominence in the fashion world and Israeli designers are continuing in that tradition.

Fifteen children aged five to 10, wearing white T-shirts and blue and white Gap overalls, marched onto the stage waving Israeli flags during the Salute to Peace segment and were joined by models in blue and white dresses, holding chanukiyot.

They were followed down the runway by a model wearing a dramatic white chiffon peace gown with a feather bodice, designed by Yuval Kaspin. She wore an unusual headpiece – a bird cage with real doves flying inside.

In the State of Israel segment, Minkowski paid tribute to such leaders of Israel as David Ben-Gurion and Golda Meir. Their images were printed on gold-speckled and pewter halter gowns.

In the same segment, Sigal Dekel showed military suits in pink and pale blue Ultrasuede. The shimmering blue and green gowns and sea green chiffon cocktail dresses by Gideon Oberson in the Development of the Desert segment symbolized Israel's irrigation projects in the desert.

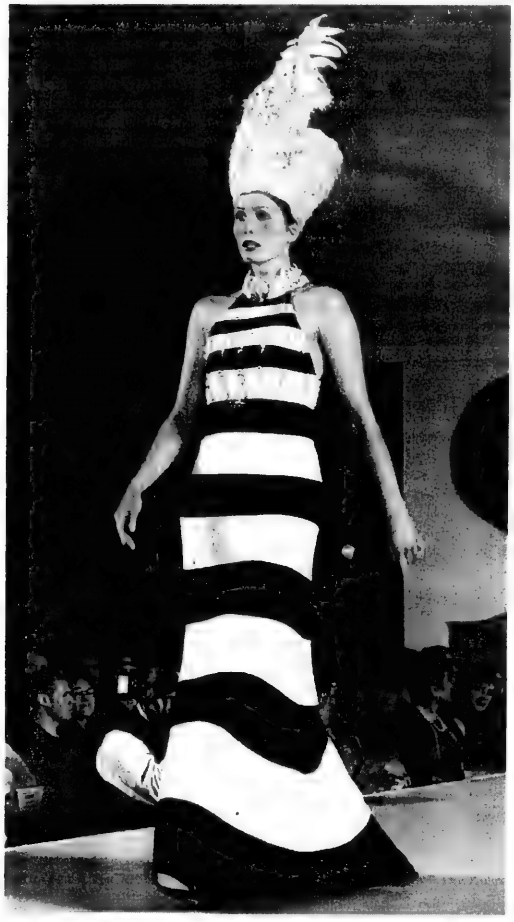
Also featured were bathing suits by Gottex, in floral and prints and earthy colors such as olive, aubergine and mustard.

The desert segment included Vivi Kinneret's simple sand-colored linen ensembles – skirts and pants paired with matching long sleeve tops – and spaghetti-strapped long dresses with kimonos.

The desert segment also included Liad Cohen's unusual collection created entirely out of paper. Her quilted off-white paper coat with orange, purple and green threading was shown with a dark purple and orange paper shawl.

Designs by Minkowski were featured exclusively in The Year 2000 and Beyond segment. He showed dresses made of soft rug carpets with the image of Elvis along with very exaggerated Elvis-hairstyle head pieces.

Pants and mini skirts made of towels with the Marilyn Monroe image were paired with black mesh sequined cropped tops. He also showed sequined mini-cocktail dresses in purple, pink, blue, gold and black and white.



This "Peace" dress was designed by Gideon Oberson.

'Top marks'

The In Gathering of People segment, featuring designs by Dorin Frankfurt, Michal Edelman, Minkowski and Oberson, was capped by Hagar Alembic's leopard print gown with a hoop skirt worn with a tall black lace headpiece covered with roses.

In The People of the Book segment, models wearing Frankfurt's designs came out in full-length veils in black and white. The veils were removed to reveal short cocktail dresses with empire waists in black and white chiffon. Under one white veil, Frankfurt showed a silk sarong paired with a white bolero jacket.

Stephanie Hill, fashion chair for the Israel at 50 Committee, told The CJN she was thrilled with the evening. She gave Yorkdale top marks for putting together a well-orchestrated and choreographed production.

"The evening had some magic," she said. "Yorkdale went all out to accommodate and promote Israel at 50."

Other people on the executive of the fashion show committee included Karen Morton, Weill and Julia Koschitzky. A percentage of the net proceeds went to the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation.

Gov't. report criticized

Former lawyers in war crimes unit discount McCamus inquiry

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A report prepared on behalf of the Justice Department has found no evidence of anti-Semitism in the department's war crimes unit.

However the report has been described as "a whitewash" by Bill Hobson, former head of the unit, while his onetime deputy, Arnold Fradkin, has criticized the report's methodology and its characterizations of him.

The 260-page report, authored by Osgoode Hall law professor John McCamus, dismisses outright suggestions that Hobson's successor as head of the unit, Peter Kremer, was anti-Semitic or that Kremer suggested Fradkin lacked objectivity because he was Jewish.

McCamus states he interviewed many of Kremer's colleagues and "not one of these individuals has alleged Kremer is, in any sense or respect, an individual who harbors anti-Semitic feelings... Kremer freely concedes he came to the conclusion that Fradkin's work on the 'R' case lacked objectivity in the sense in which that term is used by experienced prosecutors. That is to say, it was Kremer's view that Fradkin was 'too close to the case' in the sense he was not giving detached and objective advice with respect to the difficulties presented by the evidence."

Others working on the case were similarly criticized, McCamus said. McCamus also found that "none of the many colleagues, both Jewish and non-Jewish, of Kremer or of the senior management of the department have reported to me other incidents or situations that raise for them suspicions of anti-Semitism. Further, they have invariably indicated to me they do not believe that anti-Semitic attitudes or feelings are or were evident, in their experience, in either the war crimes section or in the managerial chain of command within the department."

Fradkin, who left the unit in December 1990, said he disagreed with "the way McCamus handled the question of my objectivity, which was erroneous and hurtful to me. Throughout my entire career, I have always exercised the highest standard of objectivity, justice and fairness in all my cases, especially my work at war crimes."

Ronen new CJC president

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Moshe Ronen, Ontario region chair, has been acclaimed as 15th president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). At 39, he is the youngest president in Congress history.

He will succeed Goldie Hershon of Montreal at the CJC's upcoming National Plenary Assembly in Winnipeg, May 24 to 26.

Also acclaimed were Montreal lawyer Manuel Shacter, national executive chair; Sharon Wolchock of Winnipeg, associate national executive chair; George Weinberger of Toronto, treasurer; and Michael Elterman of Vancouver, secretary.

The only election at the plenary will pit Prof. Thomas Kuttner of Fredericton against Ed Morgan of Toronto for the position of honorary legal counsel.

Ronen now closes the circle he started in 1986, when, as a student activist, he ran against Dorothy Reitman and lost.

At 20, Ronen, who did not fear taking on the establishment, was president of Jewish

Rabbi Throws First Pitch

TORONTO — Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, will throw the first pitch April 2, at the Blue Jays' second game of the season-opening series against the Minnesota Twins.

CZF Reviews Activities

TORONTO — The Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) is updating its mission statement, including reviewing its Zionist role in the community and its financial capabilities.

It was reaffirmed at a recent meeting of the national executive that despite cutbacks, there is a need for continued CZF activities in Jewish education, Hebrew courses and Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations, on national and regional levels.

Kurt Rothschild, CZF national president, said the organization is updating its mission in order "to assure our valued contribution to the Israeli focus in Jewish communal life."

WORLD

AJCommittee Survey

NEW YORK — A poll released by the American Jewish Committee has found that 72 percent of American Jews believe Switzerland is being uncooperative in providing accounts of its dealings with the Nazis during the Holocaust. More than half of those polled support imposing sanctions against Swiss banks and companies.

The findings were released as part of the committee's annual survey on American Jewish opinion.

Germany Donates Sales

BERLIN — The Deutsche Bank has donated about $3 million, the proceeds from the sale of a gold reserve stemming from World War II, to two Jewish organizations. Research showed that the gold was possibly stolen from Jews during the Holocaust.

The money will be divided between the World Jewish Restitution Organization and the March of the Living, which sponsors trips by Jewish youth to former concentration camps.

Rabbi: Free Pollard

NEW YORK — Rabbi Alexander Schindler, immediate past president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, has written an editorial in the Reform Judaism magazine accusing former defence secretary Caspar Weinberger of responsibility for the life-without-parole sentence meted out to Jonathan Pollard 13 years ago.

Rabbi Schindler said in the editorial that Pollard's continued incarceration "has long since crossed the line where justice ends and vindictiveness begins. He urges President Bill Clinton to commute the sentence.

The rabbi said that Weinberger brought pressure to have Pollard permanently imprisoned in order to hide evidence of shipments of American weapons to Iraq prior to the Gulf War.

Trial Postponed

PARIS — The war crimes trial of Maurice Papon was postponed after his wife died. The jury was expected to have delivered its verdict on April 1.

Lawyers for the plaintiffs expressed concern that the jury may pity Papon and give him a more lenient verdict.

Pensions Cancelled

BONN — Germany has transferred about $111 million to the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Israel as an initial payment to help locate Nazi war criminals who are receiving pension benefits from Bonn, according to Israel Radio.

Germany recently passed a law cancelling pensions to those veterans believed to have been war criminals.

France to Change Laws

PARIS — French President Jacques Chirac promised on national television that he would seek to change the country's electoral laws in an effort to diminish the political influence of the extreme-right National Front.

Calling the front "racist and zenophobic," Chirac said the party was at the centre of a political crisis that could "damage France, its values, its image."

His comments came after six rightist politicians were elected regional presidents after receiving the National Front's support.

Italy Marks Anniversary

ROME — Italy's highest government officials joined hundreds of Romans and representatives of the Jewish community to mark the 54th anniversary of Italy's worst wartime atrocity.

President Oscar Luigi Scalfaro and Rome's chief Rabbi Elio Toaff, were among the officials who placed wreaths at the Ardeatine Caves south of Rome, scene of a 1944 massacre of 335 Roman men and boys, including about 75 Jews.

Earlier this month, an appeals court in Rome handed down life sentences to two of the Nazi SS officers involved in the killings. Erich Priebke and Karl Hass, both in their 80s, are being held under house arrest.

Kibbutz leaders in U.S.

NEW YORK — Leaders of the three kibbutz movements in Israel were to arrive in the United States last week to meet with Jewish leaders. The delegation, which includes Orthodox and non-Orthodox Jews, planned to voice its support for religious pluralism in Israel and to back the proposals of the Ne'eman Committee regarding conversions performed in the Jewish state.

Dream Fulfilled

LOS ANGELES — A dream has come true for a 12-year-old Israeli leukemia patient who will get the chance to watch the taping of the final episode of the television sitcom Seinfeld.

A foundation that attempts to fulfil the dreams of sick children got the show's producers to allow Eyal Bir and members of his family to observe the taping. The family was to leave for Los Angles last week.

ISRAEL

Knesset Rejects Bills

JERUSALEM — The Knesset has rejected three bills calling for a widespread prisoner amnesty as part of Israel's 50th anniversary commemoration. The votes were held as part of a flurry of parliamentary activity aimed at wrapping up outstanding Knesset business before its Passover recess.

In another vote, lawmakers overwhelmingly rejected a bill to oblige all citizens, including Haredim and Israeli Arabs, to serve in the army or do national service.

Restricting compensation for survivors said not 'fair'

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Restricting compensation to Holocaust survivors whose income does not exceed $20,000 is not "fair," but to try and change the rule would be a waste of time, according to Kert Herzstein, director of the United Restitution Organization in Toronto.

"It would be tilting at windmills," he said in an interview.

Single survivors who earn more than $16,000 (US) or married ones who have an income above $21,000 (US) are not eligible for payments from a hardship fund set up by the German government.

Canadians who earn less than $18,000 are considered below the poverty line.

"We know from bitter experience of dealing with the bureaucrats that the Germans will not increase these ceilings," Herzstein said.

Despite the income restrictions and long delays of up to three years in providing enough documentation, he said the Toronto office is still making claims for Holocaust survivors under the Article 2 fund and 65 to 70 percent are approved.

Applications are still coming in and are being processed, he said.

But the road to a survivors' pension is a rocky one, he said, citing the case of a Toronto couple, now in their 90s, who made an application under the fund in 1993. and are still waiting for a decision.

Road to a pension is a rocky one

"The income ceiling is too low," said Jack Silverstone, Montreal, national executive director, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Nevertheless, CJC is urging survivors in severe financial need who don't know about the fund to apply for a lifetime pension.

Those eligible are people who spent six months or more in a concentration camp, were held in a forced labor camp, suffered 18 months or more of imprisonment in a ghetto, or endured 18 months or more in hiding under inhumane conditions

For more information or for an application kit, contact the Fund Administrator, The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, 15 East 26th Street, Suite 906. New York, N.Y., 10010.

Creative writing by CJN readers

Many are the activities we undertake that can provide us with that rare special moment, that certain mellow poignancy, and deeply satisfying, good feeling about ourselves.

As varied as our natures, so too are those activities. Very often however, there is a creative element to them. One such activity is that of creative writing.

In appreciation of this fact, and to the extent possible, The CJN strives to encourage its readers inclined to write creatively, to share their writing with us.

That is why, for example, in next week's issue of The CJN we will be publishing the second annual Passover Literary Supplement of readers' poetry and prose.

That is also why, in this column, I wish to draw attention to original, creative, literary works recently published by some of our readers.

Bread and Salt, by Renee Rodin, Talonbooks, is a wonderfully engaging anthology of poetry that is often humorous, though penetrating and insightful.

Rodin today lives and writes in Vancouver. But she was born and grew up in Montreal. Much of her poetry evokes that earlier, formative time in her life.

Rodin captures in her poetry exquisitely personal moments. But because they are moments we have all experienced, they are also universal. Reading them is not an intrusion into an intensely private realm but rather an illumination of a darker instant we too have known.

For example:

Bites

I remember you lying on the bed reading and eating apples the kind that crunch with each munch
Spartan MacIntosh Granny Smith for years I couldn't start a book without going through the same ritual

when I visited the cemetery others had put pebbles on the gravestones to mark they had been there
I left you a hard green apple

She often laughs at herself as well as at the situation. The self-as-foil is a device she uses to good effect in Jeu D'Esprit, a poem about attending a lecture by Mavis Gallant: (only parts of which I reproduce)

"I'd almost killed myself rushing to be on time for her free reading at a downtown university campus
"I'll be the first real martyr (there've been many metaphorical ones) to Canadian literature" I mused as I ran across a busy street and almost got hit by a bus

"after I went to tell her how much I enjoy her work and appreciate the authenticity of her voice that I'm from Montreal too
"ah" she said "we Montrealers first thing we do when we get up in the morning is put on our earrings" we showed each other our earrings
I wished her to keep writing
she wished me to keep wearing earrings
I floated out of there"

Renee Rodin will be reading her poetry in Montreal on April 8 at 6:00 p.m. at the Double Hook Bookstore; in Toronto on April 15 at 8:00 p.m. at the Art Bar of the Imperial Public Library and in Hamilton on April 14 at 7:00 P.M. at Monaco's Restaurant.

My Ninety Years: Confessions of a 14-Year-Old High School Dropout by Alex Beder is a different sort of work.

Beder, 92, has published this collection of autobiographical vignettes himself. It recaptures the many difficult, though exhilarating challenges of life faced by a newcomer family in a new land in an exciting, eventful period of time that essentially scans the entire 20th century.

As Beder writes, "In these pages, the reader will find stories about my experiences in the fur business and in the worlds of mining, real estate, show business, sports promotion, boxing, racing and the armed services. There are also many tales related to growing up Jewish: encountering discrimination at Eaton's, and a race riot at the Christie Pits park."

Beder's book is deeply personal, raw, and unvarnished, enthusiastically recounting episodes from his past that chronicles the development of his family and the cacophonous immigrant experience in bustling muddy York/Toronto.

A two-fold national love oozes from the book. One is for Canada – "Yes, I feel a tremendous gratitude and love for Canada. In what other country could a person like myself, a 14-year-old high school dropout, have had so many opportunities for advancement and even had lunch with the Queen? If I may be permitted to impart a few words of advice to the youth of today, they would be simply to have vision, work hard and don't give up!"

The other love is for Israel. "One of the most significant events [in my lifetime], of course, must be the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, nearly fifty years ago."

Originally, as Beder notes in the book, he had no intention of writing about Israel. But "the constant stream of negative comment in the press and on television spurred [him]" into raising his voice in support of the Jewish state, which on the eve of its 50th anniversary remains a solitary outpost of democracy in the Middle East. Indeed in the foreword of the book, Beder advises the reader of his intention to donate all proceeds that arise from its distribution to the Association for the Soldiers of Israel.

* *. *

For having written down what was in their souls to express, both Rodin and Beder deserve high praise. MBD

Kwinter, Castrilli square off in Grit turf war

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A nasty political turf war is shaping up within the Ontario Liberal party.

Rookie Liberal MPP Annamarie Castrilli of Downsview is openly defying party leader Dalton McGuinty by challenging veteran Wilson Heights representative Monte Kwinter for the Liberal nomination in the riding of York Centre.

The riding won't exist until the next provincial election. It's part of the redrawing of the electoral map to reduce the number of ridings from 130 to 103 and make provincial ridings conform to their federal counterparts.

The jockeying and infighting have boiled over to the public realm. Last week, Kwinter released to The CJN several anti-Semitic letters warning him to stay out of the race.

The letters are signed "York Centre Liberals," and all appear to be from the same source. One, mailed to McGuinty, says local Grits "do not want that old, jew bastard Monte Kwinter running for us in the next election."

Another warns that Kwinter is "finished" and that Castrilli will "destroy" him. "Why don't you retire to Florida with all the rest of your people?"

Another is a poster saying, "No Jews in York Centre."

The missives have upset Kwinter, but not enough for him to drop out of York Centre.

He vows to run and win the riding, which won't exist until the next provincial election.

Wilson Heights has the highest Jewish population of any Ontario riding, and Kwinter, a former cabinet minister, has held it since 1985.

York Centre will be comprised of parts of Wilson Heights, a good chunk of Castrilli's Downsview riding, and a small portion of Willowdale, currently held by Tory Charles Harnick.

Monte Kwinter

Annamarie Castrilli

Kwinter says York Centre will have the highest concentration of Jewish voters in the province.

A March 10 letter from McGuinty openly endorses Kwinter.

"It remains my position that Monte Kwinter be the candidate in York Centre," the leader states, adding he hopes the "situation" between Kwinter and Castrilli is resolved "quickly and amicably."

According to Kwinter, McGuinty wanted Castrilli to run in neighboring Eglinton-Lawrence riding, which has a large Italian population.

But Castrilli, elected in 1995, says fellow Liberal Mike Colle will contest Eglinton-Lawrence. She wants York Centre, making her a holdout in a party-wide agreement to carve up Ontario's new electoral map.

Castrilli told The CJN it's up to voters to decide who will carry the Liberal banner in York Centre.

"Our party is an open party. There's no power to appoint candidates, as there is at the federal level. It will be essentially up to the people in the riding to determine who they want, in a democratic way. The people will decide."

McGuinty's endorsement of Kwinter merely states the leader's "preference," she said.

Castrilli said she's "very troubled" by the anti-Semitic letters sent to Kwinter and they "should not be condoned."

Kwinter is puzzled by his colleague's action. "She's not only challenging me, she's challenging the leader," he told The CJN.

He said a party study based on the 1995 election results and extrapolated for York Centre shows he would pick up at least 58 percent of Liberal votes, to 35 percent for Castrilli.

Castrilli said numbers "are open to interpretation."

Daffodil Days arrive

TORONTO — Spring is here and that means it's time for the Canadian Cancer Society's annual Daffodil Days. Trucks filled with daffodils arrive from the west coast the week of March 30.

The refrigerated trucks heading to the Greater Toronto Area are carrying 4,000 boxes of daffodils. With 65 bunches in each box, a total of two million bright yellow blooms will be arriving.

Volunteers will then load boxes into vehicles to distribute the blooms across Metro for sale during Daffodil Days.

Canadian Cancer Society volunteers will be selling bunches of Hope – eight daffodils at $4 a bunch – from April 2 to April 5. The society hopes to raise close to $1 million in the Toronto area.

ASSOCIATED...INTO THE 21ST CENTURY

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

In 1907 the Simcoe Street Talmud Torah opened its doors. By promoting an education based on Torah values and academics, the pioneers of Associated Hebrew Schools pursued a vision upon which the modern day Jewish Day School system was built. Their dream for the children of the community — acculturation, integration and knowledgeable committed members of the Jewish community — remains our dream 90 years later.

A "Day School for the Community," Associated has distinguished itself worldwide by its commitment to continuously strengthening its academic and social programmes. As important, Associated has a strong history of responding to the growth patterns of Toronto's Jewish community. Each of the school's four branches are a testimony to Associated's commitment to meeting the needs of the community.

Strategic Planning Brings New Directions for a New Millennium

To establish its route into the 21st century, Associated Hebrew Schools undertook a strategic planning initiative 18 months ago. Under the direction of the Future Planning Committee (Va'ad He-Atid), WorkGroups are focusing on 5 critical areas: Educational Standards, Culture & Identity, Spirit & Involvement, Tuition & Funding, Facilities Utilization and Communication.

"We view strategic planning as an ongoing process," stated David Wm. Brown, Chair of the Va'ad He-Atid. "We subscribe to the 'Planning in Action' theory. We are constantly reviewing our system and strategic planning is a major part of that process."

The Vision Takes Form

The Management Committee and the Board of Directors are called upon to review the recommendations of each WorkGroup. Most recently, the Board, in a dramatic move, agreed to consolidate the two Junior High branches at the Danilack Education Centre on Leslie Street. This decision means that the Hurwich Education Centre on Finch Avenue will temporarily suspend operations. "It was a carefully considered decision. Our education staff has been advocating for a consolidated Junior High for 6 years," stated Lindy Goodman, Co-Chair of the Education Committee (Va'ad Hachinuch).

"As part of the strategic plan, we will reconfigure the Hurwich Centre and are currently investigating the establishment of a Middle School (grades 6-8) there. The Hurwich Centre will reopen within the next few years."

"Inasmuch as the many changes to the Associated system will vastly improve our ability to deliver high quality education to Jewish children, we recognize that change may be stressful to our students and their parents," commented Sheldon Goodman, President of Associated. "Our parent body should rest assured that we maintain our commitment to excellence."

Posluns Branch is Proving Popular

The opening of the Posluns Education Centre in September also signals a rebirth for the community in the central part of Toronto. "Applications for the Posluns Centre are coming in at a very good pace," reported Lou Isaacs, Manager of Admissions and Tuition. "We are looking at two classes per grade along with a vibrant Pre-School." Surie Nagel, Supervisor of the Bet Hayeled, is ecstatic. "Our morning classes are already full. Fortunately, we still have space in the afternoon."

The Next Step

In the coming months, a detailed plan articulating priorities, timelines and responsible parties will be tabled. "Implementing the recommendations – turning vision into reality – will take time, will and the participation of everyone," noted Arthur Landa, Executive Director. "Associated's strength lies in its leadership. They are the key to success. They have perceived the winds of change and for that reason they have chosen to embark on this quest. We will continue to succeed."

Nathan & Roey Hurwich

"Only For the Children"

Associated has solicited the involvement of its lay leadership to develop its future plans. Most notably, Nathan Hurwich, the benefactor of the Hurwich Centre, helped shape its future. Mr. Hurwich, 89, recently recalled how he and his wife Roey "live for the children." The Hurwichs are the last of a very precious generation. Having no children of their own, they adopted the children of the community. "We have always believed that the key to the future of the community is Jewish education. With all the hubbub about Jewish continuity, world leaders need look no further than our own Associated Hebrew Schools. We have the future right here."

Nathan has been part of every Associated building campaign. As most Associated leaders, he and Roey have played active roles in their synagogue, the UJA and Israel based institutions. "Nathan is a yes man," remarked Sheldon Goodman. "When it comes to the welfare of the community, you can depend on him to say - Yes."

"G-D has provided us with a few tools," said Hurwich. "Roey and I have been blessed. We were influenced by good people who were committed to Jewish Education and to Associated. We hope that our children (the students of Associated) learn from us as well."

When the Strategic Planning Committee recommended the move to a consolidated Junior High, the Hurwichs helped assure the outcome. "To undertake a change of this nature," reflected Sheldon Goodman, "is a huge responsibility. Without the absolute agreement and support of Nathan and Roey, I don't think it could be done." At a recent meeting of the Board, Nathan reflected on the recommendation. "I am proud that the Hurwich Education Centre will in the near future become the permanent home for the senior grades. I know that there is much to do and I support the leadership of the school as I have for more than 50 years."

I'm Associated with Success

Project Hatzlacha

Three years ago, Associated established Project Hatzlacha, a creative contributor-centered development programme. Each interim goal has been reached and additional contributions will help Associated continue to provide the finest programmes and services. "We have spent 90 years building one of the finest day schools in the Diaspora," remarked Chairman of the Board, Dr. Harry Krakowsky. "We have an obligation to ensure that nothing gets in the way of providing outstanding Jewish educational programmes to all who desire. We have committed ourselves to move boldly into the 21st century, and that's just what we are doing."

Vitols war crimes case enters final phase

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Former Latvian police lieutenant served in collaborationist units

TORONTO — The final phase of the Peter Vitols war crimes case kicked off in a Toronto court last week, with Crown attorney Roslyn Levine accusing the former Latvian police officer of membership in wartime police units that collaborated with Nazi forces in rounding up and killing civilians.

Evidence presented in court showed Vitols was an officer in several units during the war – the Madona district auxiliary police, Schuma 281 and the Latvian SS Legion, Levine said.

Had he revealed his membership in any of those units, he would not have been allowed into Canada and would not subsequently have been granted Canadian citizenship, she said.

Federal authorities are seeking to deport Vitols, 84, as an alleged Nazi war criminal. His case was launched in January 1997 and is scheduled to conclude later this week. It is expected that Federal Court Judge William McKeown will reserve his decision.

Levine acknowledged the government case against Vitols is purely "circumstantial." There is no direct evidence of Vitols killing anyone or participating in atrocities, but she argued that he must have done so, given his position in the various police units.

Wartime documents made it clear the Madona police worked with German forces in arresting and rounding up Bolsheviks, Jews and political prisoners, she said. The unit was also involved in executing communists and others designated criminals, while the unit's leader, Valerian Reinicke, with whom Vitols worked closely, is considered one of seven Latvian policemen most complicit in wartime atrocities, Levine said.

Asked by McKeown to respond to a defence contention that all the Jews in the Madona district had already been killed by the time Vitols joined the unit in September 1941, Levine said that argument was "a red herring."

"Our allegations are far more general, that the crimes committed were in regards to civilians. Some were Jews, others were labeled as communists and some partisans."

Levine also slammed Vitols' testimony, in which he claimed he was merely a clerk while with the Madona police.

Vitols' evidence was "deliberately evasive," while some of his responses were "absurd," leaving him with little credibility, she said. The facts are that Vitols, a former member of the Latvian army, volunteered for the police unit and served as a lieutenant under Reinicke. The unit participated in systematic persecution of minorities, rounded up and executed Jews and confiscated property, and transported others to concentration camps, she said.

Vitols' claim that he was only a clerk is "a classic case of minimization," and is not believable given his position in the unit. In Vitols' own testimony at one point, he admits he trained other men in using arms, and a wartime letter sent by Reinicke to the SS and police regional leader for Rural Riga mentions Vitols by name and describes him as being "responsible for the structure and leadership of Group C of the Madona police," Levine said.

As a volunteer, Vitols could have left the unit after his six-month contract, as others did. But he remained until early 1943 when Group C was incorporated into Schuma 281, which then took part in operation Winter Zauber (Winter Magic), a brutal campaign led by the Germans to clear the Latvia/Russia border of partisans. Vitols served as a lieutenant in that operation, Levine said.

Historian Konrad Kwiet described that operation "as one of the most horrific criminal acts committed in the history of Latvia," she added.

Captured partisans were executed on the spot and 83 villages were destroyed, creating a "dead zone" along the border. The Latvian police participated and were a party to the offence. Vitols was present for eight weeks of the operation and for him to claim he did not know what was happening is "totally incredible," she argued.

He admitted firing a few shots at partisans and he claimed he heard of anti-partisan atrocities later, while in Riga. He also admitted he saw ordinary chimney smoke from cooking but no smoke from burning villages. Levine called that testimony "ridiculous" and containing "no shred of credibility."

Furthermore, Vitols was decorated by the Germans for retrieving slain German troops under fire. "This is not the action of someone who didn't want to be there," she argued.

Later in the war, Vitols joined the Latvian Legion and fought for the SS, even while other Latvians declined to join. After the war, Vitols applied for assistance from the International Refugee Organization (IRO) and lied to them about his wartime service, since he would have been ineligible due to his membership in collaborationist police units. In documents he completed for the IRO, he provided "false and inaccurate" information claiming he was a railway worker from 1941 to '44, Levine pointed out.

Vitols' lawyer, Donald Powell, who is also his son-in-law, is scheduled to present his final arguments this week.

A familiar voice

The announcement last week by Jean Charest that he would run for the leadership of the Quebec Liberal party will prove, one day, to have been a watershed event in the struggle for a united Canada in the closing years of the 20th century.

At merely the suggestion that he would become leader of the Quebec Liberals, even before the announcement, a new comforting breeze began to blow across the land. For the first time in a long while, the sails of federalism snapped smartly, more confidently in the reviving wind.

But we all know, even as breezes can both refresh and discomfit, or as winds both wax and wane, last week's heady confidence will soon settle into a lower, more realistic awareness that a great deal of strife still lies ahead and that a great deal of work awaits before the day can be declared finally won.

No one knows this better than Charest himself.

In announcing his candidacy for the Liberal leadership, he warned Quebecers to soon expect "an unprecedented barrage of propaganda" aimed at discrediting him personally. Knowing beforehand what to expect, however, will only partially, if at all, diminish the bite and sense of injury from that barrage.

Nevertheless, that Charest is so familiar with the separatist adversary is significant in its own right. It is one of a number of benefits brought to the "battle for Canada" by Charest's entry into the provincial political arena.

By inclination and by resolve, Charest has as much passion for advancing the Quebec interest within a united country as Lucien Bouchard has for advancing that interest within a dismembered country. He also has equal intellect and equal oratorical skill. But, in our view, and perhaps most important, as we wrote three weeks ago, Charest "represents the future of Quebec." He embodies and credibly speaks for the young, entrepreneurial, innovative, self-confident generation of Quebecers that "has not fashioned its separatist sincerities upon the resentment of Pierre Trudeau, his contemporaries and their policies.

We commend Jean Charest for deciding to lead the federalist forces in Quebec and for accepting this very onerous responsibility.

His is a familiar voice that will now be raised in a new political arena.

It falls to all Canadians to ensure it has a supportive chorus.

Urgency in the shuttle

As of this writing, it is uncertain whether the fevered efforts by U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross to broker an agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) are still at an impasse or on the verge of breakthrough. Ross has been in Israel four days, each day shuttling between Prime Minister Netanyahu and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat trying to find the common thread that might tie up an agreement.

For Israel, the main issue appears to be the extent of the army's next redeployment from the West Bank. For the PA, the main issue appears to be its unwillingness to publicly commit to a policy of reciprocal enforcement of the obligations under the Oslo accords. "Reciprocal enforcement" is a euphemism for rooting out terrorists and stopping all manner of incitement against Israel.

Ross was also rumored to be trying to conscript Hosni Mubarak in an effort to persuade Arafat to re-commit to his existing commitments. Due to the warning last week by Madeleine Albright that the United States is almost at the stage of "walking away" from the peace process, there is a renewed urgency to this latest fatiguing shuttle. If the Americans are truly serious about "walking away," the space they will leave behind might be occupied by the Russians or the Europeans, God forbid.

Vatican's apology fails to acknowledge guilt

The so called apology that the Vatican promised to Jews 10 years ago, is much too little and definitely much too late. By criticizing ordinary Christians and exonerating from any blame Pope Pius XII, the Roman Catholic Church is in effect reversing the defence used by high ranking Nazis at the Nuremberg trials. There Nazis contended they were only following orders. The Vatican is trying to say that Pope Pius XII maintained a high moral ground condemning Nazi atrocities, but it was the ordinary European Catholic who failed to follow Christian principles and allowed Jews to disappear without protest and without taking adequate steps to ensure their safety.

There is a very telling photograph in the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial Museum in Jerusalem showing Pope Pius XII embracing the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem. The Grand Mufti was an active ally and supporter of Adolf Hitler. Nor is the Catholic Church alone to blame. Your readers should read Daniel Goldhagen's most recent bestseller entitled, Hitler's Willing Executioners. The author provides a compelling historical analysis of how church leaders, both Catholic and Protestant, in pre-war Nazi Germany encouraged and preached anti-Semitism, which provided the environment and the fuel needed to ignite the Holocaust.

As proof of the Vatican's ongoing and tolerant attitude towards Nazism, one need only cite the instance where Cardinal Lubachivski, head of the Ukrainian Catholic (Uniate) Church, bestowed his church's blessing on the Ukrainian Waffen SS Division at its 1993 Veteran's reunion in Lviv. The Vatican has been challenged time and time again to discipline Cardinal Lubachivski but has remained silent and continues to do so in its recent release of We Remember: A Reflection Of The Shoah. Unfortunately, for victims of the Holocaust and their survivors the title represents a flawed remembrance and a reflection that fails miserably to acknowledge a modicum of guilt and responsibility.

Lost his family in Warsaw Ghetto

I wish to speak out about the anniversary of the end of the Warsaw Ghetto. On the second day of December in 1943, the liquidation of Ghetto Warsaw began.

My letter is to remind the Jewish people that a community of 500,000 Jews ceased to exist as of that date.

In my conscience, I believe that this date is important. I lost all my family.

Darchei Noam also helps homeless

I would like to clarify a reference to Out of the Cold in CJN, Mar. 19.

Out of the Cold is a coalition of religious, charitable and community organizations – over 40 in the Toronto area – participating in a program whose activities include providing meals, clothing and overnight shelter. Although Holy Blossom Temple is the only host synagogue, it is not the only Jewish participant in Out of the Cold.

The Reconstructionist synagogue, Darchei Noam, has formed an interfaith Out of the Cold program with St. Peter's Church. Their program operates on Thursday nights and accommodates up to 100 guests for dinner, of whom 50 to 60 stay overnight and are served a hot breakfast the next morning.

Although Holy Blossom and Darchei Noam are the only synagogues participating in Out of the Cold, there are many Jewish volunteers and/or donors who are not members of these congregations but support their programs or other Out of the Cold programs. Our programs also enjoy support throughout the broader community. On behalf of Holy Blossom Temple, I would like to take this opportunity to thank our volunteers and donors.

A year later: remembering Nehama Leibowitz, z'l

By RABBI NATHANIEL HELFGOT

Many years ago as I was perusing one of the volumes of responsa by the renowned Torah scholar Rabbi Ovadyah Yosef, my eye caught a glance at the title of one question in the table of contents: "Must one stand (out of respect) for a woman Torah scholar?"

Instantly the only picture that popped into my head was of Prof. Nehama Leibowitz walking into her weekly Bible class at Yeshiva University's Gruss Institute in Jerusalem as I and my fellow smichah students stood up with a mixture of deep reverence and love for our unique teacher. Every week, it was the intellectual joy and rigor, coupled with the knowledge that you were privileged to be at the feet of the master teacher of Tanach in our generation, that made every moment in her class a pure delight.

What made this simple, unassuming old woman, who could have passed for a typical Jewish grandmother or in her later years a great-grand mother, into such a dominating figure in the intellectual culture of Torah and Jewish studies of the past six decades?

On one level, of course, it was her wide-ranging erudition in all of biblical literature and commentaries, her extensive knowledge of rabbinic literature both ancient and modern, and her vast knowledge of secular literature in many languages. This scholarship was combined with an outstanding ability and willingness to deploy her vast storehouses of data in the effort to unravel a difficult verse in the Torah or shed light on a dispute amongst the commentaries.

Upon entering Nehama's class, one could expect to struggle mightily with the text of the Chumash and the intricacies of the classical commentators. But then the class might take a turn and Nehama would show us translations of that verse in five or six different languages, all of which she read fluently and incisively. She would then ask us to match up the commentaries with the translations.

Later in the class, a point made by Rambam might be contrasted with a host of more obscure medieval and modern biblical commentaries that the average rabbinic scholar had never even heard of, let alone controlled to the degree she did. The class might do more textual work, busily writing answers to the "easy" questions on the study sheets she would use to teach her lessons. Often we had trouble with the "hard" questions marked with the double Xs on her sheets. She, however, would carefully direct us and help us think through some possible solutions.

Finally, the class might close with an excursus into literary comparison between an insight of the midrash and a passage from Shakespeare, Ibsen or Agnon. This hour or so class would, of course, be peppered throughout with charming stories about Israeli cab drivers, invaluable pedagogic insights into teaching high school students and her occasional mini-lectures to us about the importance of teaching only in Ivrit.

On a second level, what made Nehama so unique was that she totally devoted herself to teaching and students, rather than pure scholarship, and that came through in every contact that one had with her. It is clear that had she so desired, she could easily have led the cloistered life of the academic, writing many interesting and novel ideas in journals and books. She, however, saw herself on a mission to teach Torah and bring others to learn it and be able to pass it on with depth, rigor and love.

In the early 1930s, Nehama moved to (then) Palestine from her native Germany and soon was involved in teacher training under the auspices of the Mizrachi teacher's seminary. Parenthetically, her affiliation with that institution was not by chance. Nehama was a passionate and vocal religious Zionist who fully identified with the ideology of religious Zionism and the wonder of the renaissance of the Jewish people and its return to its ancient homeland.

As many of her lectures and classes in the last 20 years of her life were given to students and teachers from the Diaspora studying in Israel, a constant refrain from her lips was the importance of aliyah and celebrating the miracle of the State of Israel. Nehama herself often turned down lucrative offers to speak in the United States and Europe because she simply did not want to leave her home, her homeland. In addition, she refused on principle to teach in a prominent women's Torah college in Jerusalem because they did not encourage their students to participate in the national service program. For her, principle was principle.

In those first decades of her career, she taught high school students and teachers. This last group was especially dear to her as she knew that she could affect so many lives by teaching the teachers methods, content and passion.

In the early 1940s, she launched her series of Gilyonot – weekly study sheets on the portion of the week that were mailed out to all corners of the globe. Simple Jews and scholars alike would work on the questions and send her back the answers for correction and comment. Thus another teaching link was forged with an ever widening circle of men and women, old and young, joined by a desire to study and grow in Torah.

Recently, I heard that in the 30 or so years that Nehama wrote original Gilyonot on a weekly basis, she marked over 50,000 study sheets from all over the world! This work, which won her recognition in the form of the prestigious Israel Prize, was supplemented by a constant stream of weekly shiurim and lectures delivered to rabbis, teachers, factory workers, students and kibbutzniks.

Nehama would often travel to far-flung moshavim and army bases throughout Israel to teach and engage people at all levels. She loved the Torah and she loved the people. Many times she would receive phone calls late at night from soldiers, workers and just plain folks who were stuck on a question in her Gilyonot and needed to talk it over with her. Though these late night conversations were often taxing, she reveled in them and took great pleasure.

"How can one not answer a telephone inquiry of a young Israeli soldier stationed far from home in the Golan, who when he has a few spare moments takes the time to study some Torah?" And this devotion and love combined with her charm, genuine humility and Torah greatness simply made her enthralling.

In her long career, Nehama was one of the greatest Marbetzei Torah (spreaders of Torah) of our generation. However, more than simply spreading facts and ideas, she influenced three and four generations of teachers throughout the world. She thus transformed the study of Bible and commentaries for hundreds of thousands of Jews and especially for the entire educational world of modern or centrist Orthodoxy both in Israel and the entire Diaspora.

In academic parlance, we would say she defined the field. Questions such as, "What is bothering Rashi? Compare and contrast these two commentaries, listing their advantages and disadvantages. What is the key word in this section? Why is there a subtle shift in order of presentation from the event as it happened and how it is retold by one of the characters?" These and many more of her questions are now commonplace in almost any classroom, at almost any level. Nehama's teachings reverberate in our classrooms, in our very approach to the text of the Bible.

Towards the end of the introduction to one of her most explicitly pedagogically oriented volumes Limud Parshanei ha-Torah u-Derachim leHoraatam, Nehama closes with these words (my translation):

"The teacher should always remember: Our main goal in the school context is not to increase knowledge per se, and it is not in our ability to produce from it Torah scholars who are erudite and extremely knowledgeable in all areas of Torah. Rather our goal is to increase the love of Torah, that the words of Torah should be precious and beloved by the student, that he should see the great light that emanates from the commentaries shines illuminating (the meaning) of the verses so that our students' hearts are warmed by their light."

In your life, Nehama, you indeed increased in hundreds of thousands love and respect for Torah and we and generations to come will continue to warm ourselves from the warmth of your being and your teaching. Yehi Zichra Baruch.

Opinions

Jordan's warm peace

The true test of peace is not whether leaders can shake hands and exchange toasts when signing agreements, but how well the relationship endures when problems arise. While both the Egyptians and Palestinians have failed this test, Jordan has passed with flying colors.

By Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In the past few weeks, Jordanian Crown Prince Hassan led members of the Jordanian parliament in an official visit to Israël, ministers Natan Sharansky and Ariel Sharon went to Jordan to meet with senior officials, and a number of measures to increase trade have been signed.

These activities and events demonstrate the enduring strength of the strategic relationship between Israel and Jordan. The past year has not been an easy one for these relations. After King Hussein sent a sharply critical letter to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, a Jordanian soldier opened fire on and murdered a group of Israeli school girls. A few months ago, the Jordanians appeared to be furious after the attempted assassination of Hamas leader Khaled Meshal in Amman. The ability to recover from these blows shows the extent of common interests, the far-sightedness of the Jordanian leadership and the ability of Israeli officials to recover and learn from mistakes.

Cooperation between Israel and Jordan goes back more than 50 years.

Indeed, after the 1948 war, Jordan was the only Arab country that called for acceptance of the UN Resolution on Partition, and peace talks took place before the assassination of King Abdullah. Both countries faced threats from Arab radicalism and Palestinian extremism. In September 1970, when Palestinians in Jordan attempted to overthrow the Hashemite regime and the Syrian military prepared to provide assistance, the Israeli army came to Jordan's aid.

The 1994 Peace Treaty moved the secret contacts, meetings and exchanges into the open. Indeed, the formalization of the Jordanian-Israeli relationship is the most substantive and enduring achievement of the Middle East peace process that began with the 1991 Madrid Conference. While relations with Egypt are frozen by Cairo's policy of "Cold Peace," and the Palestinian tolerance of terrorism has halted the Oslo process, Jordanian officials have nurtured a "warm peace."

Jordan has also eclipsed Egypt in efforts to strengthen the foundation of public support for the peace process in the Arab world. Now, when Israeli and Arab officials, academics and business executives meet, they prefer Jordan. Not only do Jordanian leaders visit Israel and receive Israeli officials frequently, but these meetings are very public, precisely in order to demonstrate that the level of "normalcy" is increasing. On his recent visit to Israel, Prince Hassan held a joint press conference with Netanyahu that was carried on television in both countries.

The last Iraqi crisis further reinforced the degree of security coordination between Jerusalem and Amman. In 1990, after Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait, Jordan supported Iraq, in large part due to the fear of Iraqi reprisals and even an invasion. However, during the war, Jordanian and Israeli leaders attempted to avoid misunderstandings or incidents that might lead to a clash between them. Since then, and during the latest period of tension, the level of coordination and exchanges of information have increased. After the resignation of Mossad head Dani Yatom, whom the Jordanians held responsible for the botched assassination attempt in Amman, full intelligence cooperation was restored.

Jordan is now the key state in the peace process, and its role is increasing. King Hussein was never happy with the Oslo agreements and the Labor party's policies, and while Jordan officially endorses a Palestinian State, the Hashemite leaders recognize that a state encompassing most of the West Bank, and with a control over eastern Jerusalem, could become a major threat to them as well as to Israel. For this reason, King Hussein is not pressing Israel to make substantial concessions to the Palestinians in the interim redeployment process. The shared interests and strategy provide the basis for continued cooperation with the Israeli government in controlling the flow of the peace process.

Substantively, the links with Jordan are also growing. In addition to the traffic of tourists and trade across the bridges, El Al now flies directly from Europe to the jointly operated Aqaba/Eilat airport. In their recent meetings, the heads of Israel and Jordan announced agreement on reconstruction and expansion of the Allenby Bridge, which will make it easier and much quicker to go from Jerusalem to Amman.

While this may be an exception in today's Middle East, with the sustained efforts of the Jordanians and Israelis, this warm peace could one day become the norm for other leaders and countries in the region.

Illuminating the aging process

On my lecture tours during the last few months, I have spoken increasingly on the subject of aging. Of course all of us age differently, some better than others because of genetics, illness, social and economic circumstances, upbringing and personal habits. We prepare for many things – for school, profession, trade, athletics, and even for retirement – but rarely for the process and the nature of aging that retirement involves.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I shall always remember what my Dad once said to me, using a puzzle as his form of teaching: "What is it that everybody wants to become but nobody wants to be?" The answer, I learned, is "old."

We can disguise our age to some degree and pretend to the outside world that we have lived fewer years than is actually the case, but deep down we know what we can do and what we no longer are able to accomplish.

While there is no question that our own attitude plays a tremendous role in enriching our lives, most of us are quite unaware that our Jewish tradition can give us a big hand in doing so.

I therefore cordially welcome a collection of a long list of materials from a variety of Jewish sources, all of them illuminating some corner of the aging process. They are found in a book edited by Susan Berrin called A Heart of Wisdom – Making the Jewish Journey from Middle to Elder Years. It is divided into eight major parts the headlines of which reveal something of their rich content: Texts Studies, Middle Passages, Intergenerational Relationships, Women and Aging, Journeys and Discoveries, Meeting the Challenge of Aging, Poetry and Stories, and finally Ceremonies. There are also various useful appendices, such as a guide to Jewish textual sources on aging, and lists of national and international organizations that deal with these subjects and other resources.

It is indeed a rich collection that deals with a great variety of challenges and opportunities. It focuses generally on the person who is aging, and the consent that he or she must give to the process in order not only to survive but to live in the fullness of possibilities.

However, I miss a greater emphasis on the problems of personal (rather than institutional) caregiving, which becomes an evermore important aspect of the sandwich generation, and on a discussion of negative attitudes that we who are getting older so frequently find in our society. The biblical admonitions to "rise before the hoary head" and "to respect the aged" are rarely observed nowadays, and the cry of the Psalmist, "Do not forsake me in my old age, do not abandon me as my strength wanes," is not always as clearly heard as it might be. Without a forthright recognition of the negative aspects of aging and a discussion of what we can still do with our lives, our perspective is likely to be flawed.

I would like to believe that our Jewish communities do a better job of caring for the aged than most, and in many respects that is so. But we can always do better and Berrin is to be commended for bringing her rich collection to a wide public.

It's difficult to escape reality in Israel

Getting away for a weekend in Israel can be lot harder than in most countries. To really get away from reality here, you have to plan carefully or else you'll have your nose rubbed in it.

By Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

For Purim, my wife and I planned to take our three children up north for a two-day break as it had been months since we last spent a weekend out of the city. As part of our family escape plan, we decided to keep the car radio off to avoid spoiling the three-hour drive with news bulletins every 30 minutes. We were on holiday after all and wanted to take our minds off the state of the nation. Fat chance.

In Canada, a drive through the country usually resembles a trip through a nature reserve. Inevitably, once out of the city, the postcard-perfect vistas of countless lakes, fields and forests leave you blissfully divorced from the issues of the day. As one should be when on vacation.

No such luck here. Talk about reality bites! It seemed virtually everywhere I looked, I was hit with another sober reminder of Israel's geopolitical reality.

Leaving our home in Jerusalem, we were excited about spending time again in our favorite part of the country – the Golan Heights. Shortly after departing the capital, we drove past an army checkpoint. Only 24 hours earlier, Arab residents nearby had clashed with Israeli troops during riots triggered by the fatal shooting of three Palestinian workers by IDF soldiers a few days before.

Minutes later, we passed Ma'ale Adumim, the largest so-called "settlement" in the West Bank. With close to 25,000 residents, this fast-growing community is more a full-fledged city by Israeli standards but in Arab eyes and to much of the world, it symbolizes Netanyahu's controversial "expansionist" policies.

We were then greeted by the sight of what elsewhere might seem more an image of folklore than a source of conflict – the tent camps of Bedouin families. They are members of the Jahalin tribe, many of whom have been forcibly evicted in recent months after losing a Supreme Court battle against being relocated to make way for the growth of Ma'ale Adumim. The Court ruled they were living illegally on state land.

We then arrived at the proverbial fork in the road. In this case, it entailed the existential decision of whether to save about 20 minutes by driving through the Palestinian autonomous area of Jericho or to take the longer way via the bypass road. I couldn't recall facing such quandaries last summer when, during a visit to Canada, I drove from Toronto to Muskoka.

The next leg of our trip took us through the Jordan Valley. It would have been more easy-going had we not had to share the highway with psychotic Israeli motorists whose daredevil driving create headlines and casualties every day.

Lest we forgot which country we were in, the plethora of bumper stickers plastered on the back of every second car removed any doubt.

Stickers espousing every political cause and struggle of the day from "Peace Now" to "Jewish Hebron Forever" provided yet another glimpse at the unresolved national agenda.

Next, on the right side of the road, a big sign announced "Naharayim – Island of Peace", a small piece of land Israel returned to Jordan as part of the 1994 peace treaty. We happened to be driving by one year to the day after a Jordanian soldier opened fire on a group of Israeli school girls visiting the site, killing seven and wounding dozens of others.

By now, our kids were asking impatiently how many minutes until we reached Metulla as we had promised them a side-trip there so they could go skating at the Canada Centre, the country's only decent ice rink. While in Metulla, it crossed my mind where we were – next to the border with Lebanon in an area often the target of Hezbollah Katyusha rocket attacks.

After a good skate, we headed to our destination, the Golan Heights, arguably the most tranquil, majestic part of Israel, where we spent a terrific weekend at Kibbutz Afiq. But wouldn't you know it? One of the main topics of discussion with our friends there was on the future of the Golan Heights, especially in light of current efforts to withdraw Israeli troops from south Lebanon and resume negotiations with Syria.

Keeping reality at bay in Israel, even while on holiday, is no simple proposition.

The Kirshner File

A Montreal doctor who broke barriers

By Sheldon Kirshner

Harold Nathan Segall (1897-1990) was an illustrious Canadian doctor, a pioneer in the practice of cardiology, a founder of the Canadian Heart Association and of the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal, and one of the first Jewish professors of medicine at McGill University.

I don't know how many readers are familiar with his name or his achievements. Certainly, I was not. But now that I've read Charles Roland's biography, Harold Nathan Segall (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), I can no longer plead ignorance.

Segall was born in Jassy, Romania, the son of a bookkeeper who became a presser in Montreal's booming garment industry after immigrating to Canada in 1899. His family joined him a year later.

In 1915, Segall entered McGill. He left temporarily in 1918 to be a ship's doctor aboard a White Star liner. Graduating in 1920, he began work as an assistant curator at McGill's pathology museum and subsequently as a researcher in its pathology department.

From 1922 to 1926, Segall continued his studies at the Harvard Medical School, the Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston and University College in London, finishing his apprenticeship abroad in Vienna and Paris.

Returning to Montreal, Segall embarked on a flurry of activities. He started cardiac clinics at the Herzl Dispensary, the Women's General Hospital (known today as the Herbert L. Reddy Memorial Hospital) and McGill. He was appointed a junior assistant physician at the Montreal General Hospital, and joined the Canadian National Railways' clinic, tending to the medical needs of Sir Henry Thornton, president of the CNR.

In 1928, he participated in the campaign to build the Jewish General Hospital. When it was opened in 1934, Segall was named its senior physician.

An indefatigable man, Segall was elected secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Medical Association in 1947 and president of the Canadian Heart Association in 1953.

Keenly interested in the history of medicine, Segall wrote numerous monographs, as well as a major study, Pioneers of Cardiology in Canada, 1820-1970. In 1975, he was president of Montreal's Jewish Historical Society.

Roland — a doctor himself and the author of Courage Under Siege: Disease, Starvation and Death in the Warsaw Ghetto — is not unmindful of the endemic anti-Semitism which limited the professional opportunities of Jewish physicians like Segall before World War II.

Segall had to wait until 1949, when he was past 50, to be appointed an assistant professor in clinical medicine at the Montreal General Hospital, the first Jew to hold that position. And Segall, who retired in 1984, never rose above the rank of associate professor at McGill. Roland acknowledges, somewhat reluctantly, that McGill's "failure to promote him to full professor was perhaps in line with contemporary practice."

Roland's soft-peddling of this issue is also evident in his account of the formation of the Jewish General Hospital. It's clear that its establishment was necessitated by the prevalence of anti-Semitism, particularly in the hiring of young Jewish doctors. Strangely enough, however, Roland does not take this factor into consideration in his cursory discussion of this important subject. A glaring oversight, to say the least.

Lamentably, this is not the sole deficiency in Harold Nathan Segall, the latest in a series on renowned Canadian physicians and the only one so far to honor a Jewish doctor. Roland, to put it charitably, is not a great writer. He lacks the gift for clear and concise narrative and he utterly fails to infuse even a scintilla of color and human drama into his portrait of Segall.

For all intents and purposes, therefore, this is a dry and airless book. Be that as it may, it's the only one which commemorates the life of an outstanding doctor who, until now, had not received the recognition he so richly deserves.

Clinton under a microscope

Mike Nichols' newest film, Primary Colors, now playing at Cineplex Odeon theatres, is based on Joe Klein's novel about the 1992 U.S. presidential campaign. The central character is a philandering southern governor named Jack Stanton, otherwise known as Bill Clinton.

Literate, fast-paced, beautifully performed and perhaps the finest drama about American politics since All the King's Men (1949), Primary Colors is notable for several Jewish references.

At the outset of the campaign, Stanton's manager asks if any staff members possess special skills. "I speak Hebrew," a worker pipes in sheepishly. Barnstorming through Florida, Stanton, wearing a white kippah, appears at a Jewish seniors' home. Fishing for their support, he declares that Israel is America's best friend. Later, in New York, an aide warns him that he risks losing the state if he cancels a meeting with the Lubavitcher Rebbe. At Stanton's inaugural ball, an anonymous man offers him his congratulations with these hearty words, "Mazel tov, Mr. President."

In light of these scenes, should we be surprised that Clinton is the most pro-Israel president since Ronald Reagan, and that he has appointed a record number of Jews to his administration?

Orthodox Judaism in the spotlight

By RABBI
HOWARD S. JOSEPH

The news has recently been filled with items concerning Orthodox Judaism. There was a wild story about an Israeli couple being forced to divorce because of the wife being raped. However, it is still unclear if this really happened or was only the result of some modern urban myth invented to discredit a community.

Then there has been the conversion bill controversy in Israel. Haredi groups introduced proposed legislation that would severely limit Conservative and Reform groups. This has caused quite a reaction in North America, where these groups are particularly strong. The Ne'eman Committee seems to have offered a reasonable compromise that may yet be accepted despite the furor surrounding it. Those introducing the legislation failed to appreciate that in a democracy compromise is necessary. In effect, their efforts will lead to more involvement for the groups they oppose rather than less. It is good to understand the game of politics before you play it. Religious fervor is a risky foundation for political judgments.

In February, the second International Conference on Feminism and Orthodoxy was held in New York. A local wedding kept me from attending this year. However, my wife, Norma, participated and presented a workshop on halachic issues.

Two thousand people attended. Numerous sessions covered a range of subjects of concern to Orthodoxy, with a focus on those issues relating directly to women.

One of the major points of interest was the recent announcement by various Orthodox synagogues that they were hiring women as congregational interns to assist the rabbis in various responsibilities, such as visiting women in hospital, consulting with women on personal matters and offering study sessions.

My daughter-in-law, Julie Stern Joseph, has been selected as one of these interns and has already begun her work while she continues her studies at Yeshiva University and the Drisha Institute. Julie will be working with Rabbi Adam Mintz of the distinguished Lincoln Square Synagogue in New York.

Rabbi Mintz addressed the conference on this issue, as he was first to appoint a female congregational intern at an Orthodox synagogue.

The social and historical context is critical in determining what role a woman can play as a rabbi, Rabbi Mintz said. Over the centuries, the rabbi has evolved from a judge to a model of chesed or kindness, to the multifaceted public servant today expected to balance cheque books as well as meet religious needs.

He acknowledged that he did not know where the intern position might lead, but hoped it would become a full-time job with increasing responsibility, but short of the conventional pulpit rabbi leading the service.

Finally, this year's conference drew the participation of Rabbi Yehuda Henkin, a highly respected Jerusalem religious authority, about 20 percent of whose responsa writings deal with women's issues. A surprise guest, he called for serious dialogue between Orthodox feminists and those rabbinic authorities who have banned women's ritual activities, including prayer groups.

Rabbi Henkin drew wide applause when he closed his remarks with the hope that next year's conference will be on the topic of feminism "in" – not "and" – Orthodoxy.

"We need to bridge the gap between Halachah and reality," he said in an interview, adding that "nothing negative will come from anyone learning Torah."

In the future we look forward to the activities of EDAH and MEIMAD, two new groups in North America and Israel respectively, who are actively promoting the agenda of Modern Orthodoxy. Of course, this includes concerns for women's place in our communities as well as questions of harmonious relations among Jews of diverse commitments and viewpoints.

Rabbi Howard Joseph is the spiritual leader of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in Montreal.

What is this matzah we eat at Passover?

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As Passover approaches, we again prepare our homes for the holiday. The Torah forbids us to eat bread or leavened products for the duration of a week and Jewish law prohibits even the ownership of these goods.

The consequence of eating leavened foods during Passover is karet – the soul of the person is severed from the souls of Israel. Many people have questioned the severity of this consequence and whether or not it suits the act of simply eating food that is permissible at any other time.

The usual response is to associate matzah with the frenzied departure of Israel from Egypt. The bread did not have a chance to rise and therefore we do not eat any foods that have had a chance to rise.

Interestingly, this reason centres on the speed with which we left Egypt. It is not commemorative of the miracles or the redemption itself, but rather of the fact that we felt we might run out of time. However, if one connects the image of bread to the larger frame of the experience in Egypt, an interesting parallel appears.

The plagues in Egypt are traditionally seen as attacking the Egyptian gods, thereby nullifying the false gods and leaving the one true G-d. Thus everyone should recognize the G-d of Israel as the true Creating Being, unique to the universe.

If that is the only message, one is left with the statement, "My G-d can beat up your gods," and it simply asserts the higher power of the Israelite G-d, but it does not nullify the possibility of other weaker gods.

However, this is not the only message in the plagues. If one notices where or how each plague originates, as well as what it is attacking, the language of the text draws the mind back to Genesis.

The order of the plagues and the details involved set the creation story of Genesis running in reverse. The first chapters of Genesis describe the systematic ordering of chaos through specific stages. The plagues in Egypt describe the systematic reversal of these same stages, which border on a return to chaos. Now the message is not one of greater power but one of knowledge.

Only the true Creating G-d would know how the world was created; therefore, only the true Creating G-d could undo the process.

The creation of the nation of Israel mirrors the creation of the world; it places us back into Genesis when humanity dwelled in the Garden of Eden. All our needs were easily fulfilled. We did not need to toil for our food, since the earth provided everything in its completed form and all we did was harvest and eat. We made bread only when we left the Garden once creation had ended.

To eat matzah on Passover is to reaffirm the identity of G-d, to eat bread is to deny the Creating Being. Perhaps the suitability of the deed and the consequence is not as simple as it seems.

Mission to Israel made a difference

By GERDA FRIEBERG

Many of us have had the good fortune to visit Israel in the last 50 years. Many of us joined missions coordinated by local organizations or synagogues. And having experienced Israel, we resolved to return. It is impossible to leave our ancestral home complete – we leave our hearts there and must return.

I have visited Israel many times, travelling the country by train by bus and by car, and I thought I knew Israel quite well. Last spring, I read in The CJN that the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem were planning their fourth hiking/biking fundraising mission in Israel, and I was intrigued. This, I thought, would definitely be a mission with a difference.

After a simple phone call, all my arrangements were made. Participants could chose either a hiking or a cycling option, and as an avid hiker, I chose to hike.

We arrived in Tel Aviv, and the next morning we made our way to Haifa, where our adventure began. It was quite a sight to see all the bikers and hikers outfitted for the day. As we would do each morning, we bid goodbye to the bikers, who were taking a slightly different route. The hike through the forest of the Carmel Mountains was a great beginning.

That night, as we did every following night, we were joined by the bikers, who described the experience of their cycling adventure. This also gave us an opportunity to socialize and to exchange tales of our escapades, each of us sharing our unique perspective.

Our journey continued along the Mediterranean shore to Caesarea, from Natanyah to Petach Tikvah, and then through the Judean Hills to Jerusalem. This was not just a simple hike through the countryside, it was also a lesson in Jewish history. Every corner we turned brought us to a historical site. The Bible came alive.

On the last day, we met the bikers early and together we entered Jerusalem on foot, just as our forefathers did. As we approached Mount Scopus, we were greeted by students from Canada studying at Hebrew University. It was truly a sight to behold. The sense of accomplishment and emotion was overwhelming for all of us, especially with the magnificent campus behind us and Jerusalem in all its glory at our feet. Our journey sadly had come to an end.

This was the moment when we realized that we are indeed the chosen generation, to have witnessed the birth of the State of Israel.

Internet has plenty of Pesach fun, activities for children

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

There is chametz in your computer. Oh, it's hiding in there all right – a donut, a cake, a loaf of bread and even some flour. But before you do anything drastic, get your kids to help with the cleaning. Virtual cleaning. Have them go to Chometz Hunter [http://www.anshe.org/chometz.htm], play the game and your computer will be 100 percent kosher for Pesach.

Chometz Hunter is just one of the many kosher for Passover Internet games and activities for kids that we will sample today.

I really enjoyed Virtual Jerusalem's Passover Virtual Quiz Mania [http://join.virtual.co.il/show/]. The questions are both funny and interesting and the music and sound effects will give you a good laugh.

Here's an example: "What did the Egyptians say when they were no longer able to copy the plagues? (a) This is the finger of G-d; (b) The new technology is amazing; (c) It is that fellow Moses again!; or the correct answer (d) Nothing – the Egyptians might have been dumb, but they weren't stupid. They were duly impressed."

A couple of notes about this site: when I visited, the quiz still seemed to be under construction and was prone to crashing my computer. Also, for you to do the quiz, your Internet browser must be able to handle Java.

We all know that the Israelites wandered in the desert for 40 years. But they need your help to get them out. Try your hand at the Wilderness of Sinai interactive maze [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/pesach/jmc/passover/maze.html]. (You will need the free Shockwave plug-in to play this game [http://www.macromedia.com/shockwave/download/].)

Do you need help with the cooking? Put your kids to work. At Kids Kook for Pesach [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/pesach/kidkook.htm], there are easy recipes for Charoset (The Mortar You Love to Eat!), Cheese Blintzes and Matza Pizza Treatsa. And when you're finished with that, try the Matzah Ball Game Quiz [http://www.his.com/~chabad/passover/].

On the other hand, if you want to get your kids out of the kitchen, Jewish Family & Life has some links to some Passover crafts and activities. There are directions for your own Hide-the-Afikomen Bag and a Stained Glass Kiddush Cup for Kids. Check out these and other kid-related links at HappyPassover.com [http://www.HappyPassover.com/] and while there, add your two cents worth to their great debate: Does having a separate kids' table enhance or detract from their participation at the seder?

And as always, Virtual Jerusalem offers an excellent site with many areas geared toward children [http://www.virtual.co.il./city_services/holidays/pesach/]. Don't miss it.

Last week, we looked at online Haggadot and seder guides for adults. For the past 10 years, John Kador has been writing Child-Centered Passover Haggadahs [http://www.otn.com/kador/child.html] and includes three of them on line. These are not really Haggadot, but skits that you can act out with your family. The Committee Interviews Moses, is an irreverent take on the Exodus story while Scenes from an Egyptian Family uses a more traditional approach.

But my favorite is Uncle Eli's Special-for-Kids Most Fun Ever Under-the-Table Passover Haggadah [http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Uncle_Eli/Eli.html]. Written in the style of Dr. Seuss, Uncle Eli retells the Haggadah in a familiar yet unique way:

Why is it only on Passover night/ we never know how to do anything right?/ We don't eat our meals in the regular ways/ the ways that we do on all other days…/ Cause on all other nights we may eat/ all kinds of wonderful good bready treats/ like big purple pizza that tastes like a pickle/ crumbly crackers and pink pumpernickel…/ Yes – on all other nights we eat all kinds of bread/ but tonight of all nights we munch matzah instead.

Munch on that until next week's final look at Pesach on the net.

Diplomatically Speaking

By JEHUDI KINAR

I was lucky to have joined the Federation/UJA Mission from Canada that visited Israel from Feb. 23 to March 4 this year.

This was not the first time I joined such a mission, but this time I was even more impressed than before by the links between the Canadian Jewish community and Israel. From the north in Metulla to the south in Eilat via Kfar Gvirol in the centre of the country, I was confronted with the wonderful contributions of Canadian Jewry. It is not just the fundraising involved that was so impressive, but the care and devotion that was and still is given to the various projects.

The school being constructed in Kfar Gvirol is under the scrupulous supervision of the Toronto UJA Federation. Every change in progress is being discussed by both partners, and the input of UJA Federation shows the care given by this community to just one of the projects of which Torontonians can be proud.

Walking around in Eilat and meeting the small (3- to 5-year-old) children at a youth science centre was elevating. Many of the children were not so fortunate as to have a computer at home. It made me quite jealous to see how they were learning at such a young age the elementary knowledge of motor rotation and electrical circuits and weather maps.

This mission also allowed me to meet with many people from different walks of life living in Toronto and western Canada. A highlight for me was also to meet former volunteers for the Israeli army (MAHAL) who fought in 1948 and 1949 for the independence of Israel.

It was fascinating to hear the stories told by Stanley and Marilyn Sober, now of Toronto. (Stanley was in Palestine/Israel as a medical doctor from England and Marilyn was a nurse from the United States.)

Similarly, it was wonderful to meet Albert Solsberg from Saskatoon (who arrived in Palestine on the important date of May 14, 1948, joined the Israeli Air Force and returned to Canada in 1949).

This mission showed what the Diaspora and Israel have in common. The Toronto group and the "coast-to-coast" groups arrived during the crisis with Iraq. Being confronted with a threat that is so often part of daily life in Israel must have been an eye-opener for the Canadians. In Israel, this threat has become part of our routine, and fears are felt much more abroad than in Israel itself. I am sure that those who cancelled their participation will now regret not having joined the mission. They really missed a wonderful and educational experience.

Israeli minister blasts U.S. plan

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel should rebuff Washington's current proposal to break the year-long impasse in the Oslo peace process, an Israeli cabinet minister said here last week.

"Such a plan should be opposed in no uncertain terms," declared Communications Minister Limor Livnat in a speech delivered under the auspices of Herut Likud Canada and One Israel.

Livnat, one of the most hawkish members of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government, likened the United States' attempt to impose the plan on Israel as "an affront to democracy and the will of Israelis."

Further withdrawals from the West Bank, she said, can only be determined by Israel.

Livnat, who voted against last year's Israeli redeployment from Hebron, was reacting to the news that Dennis Ross – the U.S. presidential envoy – had called on Israel to cede 13 percent of the West Bank in the next few months in exchange for Palestinian steps to combat terrorism.

Israel rejected the proposal two weeks ago and again last week.

A member of the Knesset since 1992 and an eighth-generation sabra who referred to herself as "a full-blooded Palestinian," Livnat claimed that Washington's insistence on a 13 percent withdrawal ran counter to its promise that Israel, and Israel alone, would decide the depth of any withdrawal.

"Is there no meaning to U.S. promises?" she asked plaintively, a touch of anger in her voice.

Elaborating on her theme, Livnat wondered how the United States could act as a guarantor of the peace process if it was incapable of keeping solemn pledges.

Israel, she said to smattering applause from her partisan Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue audience, could not and would not compromise its security.

"A 13 percent redeployment sounds insignificant, but it is not." One percent, she noted, equals 25 square miles, an area larger than Manhattan.

Limor Livnat

Answering a written question from the floor following her remarks, Livnat said media reports that Israel had decided to relinquish more than nine percent of the West Bank were false.

"There will be no more concessions until the Palestinian Authority fulfils its commitments. We have to stand firm to pressure. I don't believe this government will make more concessions. The prime minister is determined not to go forward without the Palestinians fulfilling their commitments."

Saying she had "grave doubts" whether Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat had changed his views since making peace with Israel in 1993, Livnat observed: "We have to be very careful with promises coming from Arafat." Not everyone who signs a peace treaty has peace in mind, she said.

"Attempts to annihilate us didn't begin or end with the Holocaust."

Charging the Palestinian Authority with having consistently breached the terms of the Oslo accords, Livnat warned her listeners not to confuse "hopes with reality. Peace is the first item on our national agenda. But we have to be very careful."

Alluding to Israel's bilateral agreements with the Palestinian Authority, she cautioned that peace treaties which bring popularity in the short run may bring war later on.

Flatly rejecting the idea of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Livnat denounced the concept as "politically foolish and morally wrong."

Judea and Samaria, she asserted, constitute Israel's "heartland," and cannot be bargained away. "Beit El and Shiloh belong as much to us as Jerusalem."

Praising Jewish settlers in the territories as "heroes" and "modern-day Maccabees," she said their "numbers must grow."

Israel had no intention of complying with American and Palestinian demands to freeze settlement activities, said Livnat, the former vice-chair of the World Likud Movement.

Amnon Ajzensztadt, author, posed as German agent

By JOSHUA GOLDHAR
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Amnon Ajzensztadt, author, lecturer and Holocaust survivor, died in Toronto March 17, a few weeks short of his 79th birthday.

Obituary

His remarkable odyssey as a Polish engineer, a Luftwaffe supply agent and a touring Gestapo inspector is told in his acclaimed autobiography Endurance, Chronicles of Jewish Resistance. When it appeared in 1987, its admirers included philosopher Emil Fackenheim and then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir.

Ajzensztadt was born the son of the Tsouzmerer rebbe, in Sandomierz, Poland. He later attended a yeshivah and a teachers' seminary in Warsaw. His father, who died in Treblinka in 1942, urged him not to give in to "rebellious thoughts which question HaShem and his mysterious ways of permitting all this to befall His Chosen People."

Following his father's injunction, Ajzensztadt retained his faith and carried it with him as he tried to escape death throughout the war, assisted by a blend of courage, ingenuity and miracles.

Unexpected help came from a German Luftwaffe supplier named Muhl, who had lived in Warsaw. Recognizing Ajzensztadt, then disguised as a Polish-Aryan official, as a former chassidic youth, Muhl helped him with documents and a uniform so that he could move about freely.

Never staying more than three weeks in any spot, Ajzensztadt played the part of a Nazi officer to the hilt. He spoke both perfect Polish and German and was able to totally hide his identity as a Jew.

The most trying part of his deception came at night, every night, when Nazi officers were carousing, often all night long. To avoid suspicion, Ajzensztadt was obliged to join in, but he exercised strict self-discipline and never betrayed himself.

Unlike many survivors, Ajzensztadt's faith was affirmed by the war. He attributed to G-d the strength he found to carry out his innumerable escapes from death.

Fighting spirit defied all odds

After eluding the Germans, Ajzensztadt fell into Soviet hands. The KGB interrogated him at great length. They were incredulous: How could a Polish Jew infiltrate the Gestapo and roam freely behind the lines for years? Ajzensztadt's persistence convinced them that such an unlikely tale could not have been made up.

He married Kati Weiner in 1945. Immigrating to Toronto in 1948, Ajzensztadt became a tile setter. But his passion was writing. He submitted work to a variety of publications, notably the Canadian Eagle and The CJN. He was soon in demand as a lecturer and journalist.

He was frequently asked to officiate at High Holy Day services in smaller communities. His daughter Miriam has a photo of her father from the mid-1950s in which he is blowing a shofar at a Rosh Hashanah service in Stratford, Ont.

In 1962, he published his first book, And the Earth Did Not Cover the Blood. It is written in Yiddish and honors the life in his shtetl, Sandomierz.

His 1987 autobiography, his second book, was written in English. In it, he refutes the once-popular notion that European Jewry submitted meekly.

In Toronto, Ajzensztadt walked five miles daily, as well as to the Markham Street shul, and loved discussions about Torah. His enthusiasm for Ze'ev Jabotinsky's ideals made him a lifelong supporter of Herut-Likud. On his many trips to Israel, he delighted in the occasional meeting with Shamir and Menachem Begin.

Another of his passions was Yiddish literature and conversation. He remained an avid reader and a loyal member of the Tsouzmerer Friendly Society.

He faced further adversity in 1991, when he was struck by a taxi. The accident caused severe injuries, including a broken pelvis. Ajzensztadt was confined to hospital and told he would not walk normally again.

But again, his fighting spirit to defy the odds asserted itself. He undertook a tough series of exercises and massages and was soon back on his feet. He also resumed his long daily walks to the synagogue and kept up his writing. There are many unpublished manuscripts left by Ajzensztadt, both in Yiddish and English.

He leaves his ex-wife Kati, daughter Miriam Bester, son Sidney Eisenstat and four grandchildren.

Low income seniors face loss of free dental services

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Low income seniors in the new megacity may be facing the elimination of free dental care.

A proposal before the city budget committee would privatize the Department of Public Health's (DPH) existing dental service and do away with its salaried dentists.

The Toronto Board of Health has rejected the proposed 15 percent cut, which includes dropping the dental services for seniors.

"This is another case of health services being corroded and money being put above care of citizens," said Goldie Leibman, a coordinator with the Association of Jewish Seniors, an agency that serves the Jewish elderly.

After Jan. 1 when the new city came into being, seniors in North York became eligible for free dental care in the former City of Toronto and some were treated for emergency conditions at the city's most northerly clinic at 2398 Yonge St., north of Montgomery Ave. (392-0907).

The clinic is now receiving five calls a day from North York seniors seeking treatment, and a total of 10 calls a day from seniors in areas outside the old boundaries of the city. Most of the calls are about the need for treatment of advanced peridontal disease or replacing damaged or missing dentures.

The existence of the free dental care program is not well known in North York.

The city's nine dental clinics treated 2,500 seniors last year and 5,000 seniors in nursing homes and chronic care hospitals.

Seniors earning less than $16,750 if single and less than $25,500 as a couple are eligible for the free service.

One of the targeted groups are seniors who cannot eat properly because their dentures are loose or broken, or because they have no dentures at all.

Last year there were 33,000 patient visits to the nine clinics, whose services include fillings, extractions, root canal treatment and dentures.

A list of its dental services by the city's department of health includes the following statement: "Our salaried dentists provide dental services in a cost-effective manner. If these services were contracted out to the private sector, the cost to the taxpayer would be substantially higher than the cost of operating the DPH dental treatment program.

"We try to deliver services in an ethno-sensitive manner, since many of our clients are recent immigrants Our staff speak 24 languages and all printed material is available in nine languages."

The issue of cutting health services is scheduled to be discussed by City council at Metro Hall, 55 John St., April 15, 16 and 17.

Shul to welcome rabbi, cantor

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Internationally acclaimed Cantor Yaakov Motzen, who was recently appointed chazzan of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, will be welcomed by the congregation at an installation dinner on Sunday, April 5.

Rabbi Moshe Shulman, the recently appointed spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim, will also be installed at the gala installation dinner.

"For a chazzan, it is very gratifying to work as a team with Rabbi Shulman, who has extensive knowledge and love of chazzanut, and to work alongside Cantor Shlomo Simcha Sufrin. We are from three different backgrounds – chassidic, a Lithuanian yeshiva and from a Hesder yeshiva — we bring together a unique combination."

Motzen, a native of Tel Aviv, is a fifth generation cantor.

He began his career at age six as a soloist with the choir of Cantor Shlomo Ravitz. He attended the Kol Torah, Be'er Yakov and Ponevitz Yeshivot, and studied music and vocal technique with Yosef Goland and chazzanut with Cantor Yitchak Eshel.

While serving in the Israeli Army, Motzen performed for wounded soldiers after the Yom Kippur War. He served as vice-president of the Nachala Organization which is dedicated to entertaining wounded soldiers; held major positions in Givatayim, Haifa and Ramat Gan; and sang on Kol Yisrael radio and television.

Cantor Yaakov Motzen

In 1978 he came to Montreal, and for nine years held the position of cantor of the Shomrim Laboker-Beth Yehuda-Shaare Tefillah Congregation. Recently he was at Adath Israel Synagogue in Montreal.

Known worldwide for his exceptional voice and outstanding cantorial repertoire, he has released more than a dozen recording of liturgical, chassidic, Yiddish and cantorial music. He has performed throughout the world including South Africa, the former Soviet Union, Hungary, Romania, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Israel, Australia, England, and throughout the United States.

"Some people say that chazzanut is a dying art," says Motzen, who has established a choir of 18 men, more than half of whom are under the age of 40. "I personally believe that...davening with kavanah (feeling) will educate a congregation to love this art."

Motzen leads the services each month on Shabbat Mevarchim, Rosh Chodesh, Kabalat Shabbat, and the yamim tovim. He officiates at synagogue events and also teaches adult education classes.

"One of the things that excites me at Shaarei Shomayim is the ongoing activities in the shul," he says.

The shul has people from all levels of observance, says Motzen, and he is pleased that there are programs for all ages, particularly the youth.

"They are a very friendly, hospitable group of people," he says, despite the fact that people in Montreal warned him that Torontonians are "cold people." He adds that even though he davens only once a month, "I feel part and parcel of the congregation because of my everyday involvement – the choir, study groups I lead, and numerous other activities."

On May 26, he will be appearing with chazzanim Benzion Miller, Alberto Mizrahi and Sufrin at Shaarei Shomayim's first annual cantorial concert arranged by a committee of 20 members.

On Thursday, April 30, at 7:30 p.m. in celebration of Israel's Independence Day, "The Three Tenors," Motzen, Benjamin Maissner and Paul Kowarsky, will perform at an Israel at Fifty program titled, The Night of a Lifetime, at the National Trade Centre at Exhibition Place, Coliseum Arena.

Buddies throw bowling Betty 90th birthday bash

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Betty Lockhart celebrated her 90th birthday recently at a surprise party held at Bathurst Bowlerama.

The party was organized by her bowling buddies, many of whom have bowled with her for more than 45 years.

Lockhart was one of the original bowlers in the Monday afternoon ladies league of Associated Hebrew Day Schools.

Evelyn Silverberg Hoffman, chair of the League, describes Lockhart as a "very spunky lady who is always there on time.

"She is not a complainer but takes life as it comes and enjoys every minute of it. She is an example for all of us. She proves that age is just a number and it's mind over matter. If you don't mind, it doesn't matter."

Born in New York, Lockhart, now a widow, married dentist Dr. Lou Lockhart, and came to live in Toronto in 1934. She is the mother of three sons, Herbert, Bernard and Earl, seven grandchildren and three great-grandchildren. Lockhart says she does her own cooking and enjoys having her family for supper.

Lockhart sings at Betel centre

She watches quiz programs on TV but keeps busy singing with the Bernard Betel variety group, which entertains at seniors' homes. Another hobby is ballroom dancing and she is a regular at the dances at the Betel Centre and Earl Bales Park. And "bowling is a major thing in my life," Lockhart says.

Asked how she has kept a youthful outlook on life, she says, "I worked hard in my life raising three boys and that wasn't very easy. I did all my own cooking and cleaning and still do. I go shopping every day – that's kept me young."

She says she enjoys her independence. "I do everything myself. When the weather is bad I need transportation, otherwise I walk and take the bus, and my son takes me shopping once a week."

Other original bowlers still in the league include Janet Blatt, Mona Krehm, Marie Parker, Shirley Seigal, Marie Silverberg, Fran Wolfson and Helen Zimmerman.

Passover goods arrive in Cuba

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Passover products, a gift from the Jewish community of Ontario, have already arrived in Havana, according to a telephone call from the Cuban capital.

For 25 years, the community here has been sending Passover food to Cuban Jews who would otherwise be unable to get them, as a result of trade restrictions imposed by the United States.

"There is no possible way for them to prepare the foods themselves," said Moshe Ronen, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The shipment, valued at $34,000, wholesale, includes 110 cases of matzah, 70 cases of horseradish, 100 cases of gefilte fish and 13 cases of tea, all kosher for Passover.

About half the shipment is sent by air, while the rest is sent by ship, adding a transportation cost of about $13,000. The bill is covered by donations from individuals and synagogues fulfilling the biblical commandment to feed the poor, Ronen said.

The food has always come to Havana where most of the Jewish community lives, aided by the goodwill of the Canadian Embassy and the Cuban government, which sees it as an important humanitarian effort.

Most of the Cuban Jewish community, which numbered about 12,000 before 1959, fled to Miami when Fidel Castro came to power. Although the community is aging, it has recently undergone a minor renaissance, with a growing number of children enrolled in religious schools and youth programs.

First female Israeli Reform rabbi fears split

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The first Israeli-born woman to be ordained as a rabbi in Israel is hopeful the Jewish people will remain one nation, but says it has never been so close to splitting in two.

Rabbi Maya Leibovich is spiritual leader of Kehillat Mevasseret Zion, the Reform congregation outside Jerusalem whose kindergarten was destroyed by arsonists last September. She was here last week to speak on religious pluralism in Israel, at Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill.

The event was co-sponsored by the New Israel Fund (NIF), Temple Kol Ami and Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. Rabbi Leibovich also spoke to students at Leo Baeck Day School and at an NIF event in London. She came here from the United States, where she was fundraising for her congregation.

Her main message for Diaspora Jews, she said in an interview at the CJN offices, is the need to be involved with Israel.

"At a problematic time, many people turn their backs....It's important to come to Israel and visit places that proclaim ideas you believe in. If you believe in religious pluralism, you should be visiting Reform and Conservative congregations and projects supported by the New Israel Fund. You should personalize them to people back home, so they want to be involved."

Rabbi Leibovich was heartened by the moral and financial support her congregation received from Jews abroad following the arson incident, she said. The outcry by

Rabbi Maya Leibovich

North American Jews over pluralism issues has had an enormous impact in Israel, she added.

'Lots of problems'

The fire did increase awareness outside of Israel about ongoing tensions between Orthodox and non-Orthodox Israelis, as did the recent proposal by the Ne'eman Committee for a central conversion institute and its subsequent rejection by Israel's Chief Rabbinical Council, said Rabbi Leibovich.

As a Reform rabbi, she admits to having "a lot of problems" with the Ne'eman proposal, which would allow Reform and Conservative rabbis to help educate potential converts, but would not give them licence to perform conversions.

"And yet I think the gains are enormous," she reflected. For the first time in Israel's history, the "alternative streams" of Judaism were represented on such a commission, she noted. "That by itself [gives us] legitimacy."

Israelis now have a better understanding of Conservative and Reform ideology, she added.

There is, however, a growing feeling among Israelis of being "fed up" with religious institutions.

Rabbi Leibovich believes that assimilation is as serious a problem in Israel as it is in the Diaspora.

"There are Israelis who don't know how to bless the candles, wine or bread. There are Israelis whose seder is a regular family dinner, who are satisfied with living in the country [but] it doesn't make them Jewish."

The rabbi herself grew up in a home devoid of Jewish observance and yearned to celebrate her religion as her schoolmates did. The daughter of Czech Holocaust-survivors, she recalls sneaking off to synagogue one Yom Kippur, while her mother scoured the city trying to find her.

It wasn't until she was in her late thirties – with four children and a career as a high school literature teacher – that she decided to study for the Reform rabbinate, after seeing a woman Reform rabbi on television.

"Maya, you were born for that," said her husband, Menachem, who is now director of the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism.

She was ordained in 1993 by Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem and has served the Mevasseret Zion congregation since that time, when it began as "a chevra of six families."

Today there are 130 paying members and High Holy Day services attract 700, Rabbi Leibovich said. Last year, after protracted negotiations with the town council, the congregation acquired a plot of land where they plan to build a centre for Reform Judaism.

Although Israelis "tend to think of Liberal Judaism as an import," Rabbi Leibovich, as the only Israeli-born woman rabbi in Israel, is challenging that perception. "I'm a fact, and my congregation is a fact."

(Israel's other female rabbis – less than a dozen in all – were born elsewhere.)

She envisions a "democratic, liberal, Jewish state." And at the word "Jewish," her voice rises a few decibels, underscoring her passion on the issue. She fears Israel will become a secular country if Judaism is not made relevant to more of its citizens.

"But I don't want this to be a monolithic interpretation," she clarifies. "I don't want this 'Jewish' to be coercive. I want this to be a Hillel, not a Shammai, school. I want the Israelis to see the beauty of their own heritage."

If she didn't have hope, she emphasized, she wouldn't stay in Israel.

Jewish war orphans marking 50 years in Canada

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like so many newcomers to Canada, John Freund remembers the cold and the snow.

Freund was just shy of 18 when he landed in Canada 50 years ago this month – one of just over 1,100 Jewish World War II orphans allowed into this country.

It was a minor miracle the orphans were permitted entry to Canada at all, given Ottawa's dismal record on admitting Jewish refugees before, during and after the war.

Despite the government's "none is too many" policy, the orphans, all of whom had survived the Holocaust either in the camps or in hiding, found a haven here.

Indeed, many, like Freund, excelled. Among the orphans admitted were Leslie Dan, now chair of Novopharm Ltd., the generic drug giant.

"Most of us did well," Freund says. "We were young and times were good."

Like so many of the others, Freund, now 68, arrived in Halifax from Southampton, England, aboard the S.S. Aquitania, . Both his parents and his brother perished at Auschwitz. On the long train ride to Toronto, "we saw miles and miles of snow, and it was so cold," he recalls.

Born near Prague, he survived Terezin and is one of the so-called Birkenau Boys, a group of 90 boys who had been selected by Josef Mengele at Birkenau for a special work detail. Only 45 survived the war and they still stay in close touch.

Now, he would like to establish a similar network of contact with the surviving war orphans.

Establish network of surviving children

The children – some as young as 13 – were admitted by a reluctant Canada between 1947 and 1952 under the terms of a federal order-in-council approved in 1947. The order was rubber-stamped thanks to pressure from Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which persuaded anti-Semitic immigration officials to resurrect a 1941 directive that had authorized 1,000 Jewish war orphans from Vichy France admission to Canada. The earlier order had come to nothing, and those children were likely murdered.

The later orphans, stunned and battered from their nightmare, arrived under CJC's sponsorship. Some were adopted by Jewish families. Others, like Freund, were taken to rooming houses and group homes.

Their plight has been documented in two books, The Redeemed Children by Ben Lapin, and Open Your Hearts by Fraidie Martz.

Almost immediately, Freund found a job as a busboy at the Downyflake Doughnut shop on Sunnyside Avenue, for 35 cents an hour. He was soon promoted to dishwasher, at 50 cents an hour.

"There were lots of jobs then," he says. "You could get five streetcar tickets for a quarter. My room and board were $15 a week."

He went on to finish high school at Bloor Collegiate and completed a correspondence course in accounting, landing him an auditor's job with the federal government, a position he kept for 33 years.

Now, he and his wife, also a Czech Jew, have three daughters and eight grandchildren.

Freund would love to hear from other war orphans. He can be reached at 416-481-1933.

John Freund came to Canada 50 years ago as one of just over 1,100 Jewish war orphans admitted by Ottawa. He wants to establish contact with others who came as orphans. [Ron Csillag photo]

Israel said lacking comprehensive AIDS policy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — According to the World Health Organization, more than 5,000 Israelis carry the AIDS virus, although government figures are much lower, says the executive director of the Israel AIDS Task Force (IATF), a non-governmental organization that assists people living with AIDS and educates the public about the disease.

"Israel remains one of the few countries in the world not to have implemented anonymous testing, and as a result, a lot of people have not been tested," said Patrick Levy, at a recent lecture co-sponsored by the New Israel Fund and Holy Blossom Temple.

According to Ministry of Health policy, AIDS is a minor problem primarily imported from other countries by tourists and immigrants and affecting specific marginal population groups, said Levy. "Consequently, the Israeli government provides no major preventive programs, has no clear policies regarding people living with AIDS, no clear guidelines for hospital staff treating AIDS patients and few testing centres, none of which provides counselling.

"Some people do not even know they are HIV positive. It is really a frightening situation," said Levy, a former elementary school teacher who is himself HIV positive.

There has been an increase in the number of cases, said Levy, because among other reasons, young homosexuals believe that AIDS is a disease that affects older people, a lot of activists have died of the disease, and a lot of people in the gay community are in complete denial.

"Gay people in Israel face a lot of challenges, and they feel that AIDS will stigmatize them more. So they deny the whole thing."

AIDS is everywhere in the country, he said. "Men, women, gay, Orthodox, non-Orthodox – there is no one high risk group and the situation is not getting better."

Last November, Levy said, the Israeli government refused to underwrite new life-saving drugs for people with HIV/AIDS, even for those in the middle of treatment. The IATF advocated for immediate reform and as a result, the ministry declared AIDS a critical disease. In Israel, critical diseases are treated for free.

"We went as high as the Court of Justice and we did eventually get everything we wanted. On the one hand, we were very happy, but on the other, we had the bad feeling that people had to go to the Court of Justice of fight for their life."

Levy said the task force provides the only anonymous HIV/AIDS testing centre in Israel. It also educates the public about the disease, sponsors lectures and provides support groups, a buddy system, a newsletter and information booths. As a result, "things are beginning to move, but we do not have hope from the government. The move will have to be from the community."

The Ministry of Education did print a pamphlet about AIDS prevention, said Levy, but it was not used. "There is no global plan for sexual education. There are good private initiatives, but nothing national."

He said that people living with disease need social workers and legal and financial advice.

"It is important for me to be speaking to you, because I want people to understand that there is AIDS in Israel, and that nice, Jewish people do get AIDS."

The task force requires vitamins, books and information about AIDS, as well as financial support, said Levy.

"The Israeli government is only providing us with five percent of our budget. We must get the rest from other sources. Social programs are not a priority in Israel and AIDS is the lowest on the list of priorities."

Toronto group helps Israeli musicians get new centre

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Stage for Young Musicians was recently opened at the Jerusalem Youth Music Centre, thanks to a gift of $150,000 from Jerusalem Foundation Toronto.

The Jerusalem Youth Music Centre located in the Hinnom Valley, provides a setting in which young Jerusalemites can participate in performance-level ensembles. Some 400 youngsters are involved at the centre, and many of the students between the ages of 10 and 18 are part of three ensembles and a mixed Jewish-Arab orchestra.

The Arab-Jewish ensemble, composed of Jewish, Arab and Armenian children who play mandolin, guitar, oud, kanoon, mandola and mandola-cello have repertoires of Middle Eastern and Western music. Since its creation in 1986, the orchestra has performed in numerous public venues.

Dr. William Dunphy, founder of the Jerusalem Foundation and chair of its international council, has been with the organization for 20 years, working with former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek. Dunphy, a former headmaster of St. Michael's College, told The CJN his involvement began when Kollek asked him to be part of the newly founded Toronto branch.

"In its early days," Dunphy said, "the Jerusalem Foundation concentrated on projects for both east and west Jerusalemites in the general areas of health, education, the arts, and sports-recreation."

He said the foundation believes the creative process to be of enormous value to children and youth.

Dunphy explained that in recent years, the foundation has made a special effort to bring together Jerusalem's young people. "Thus, our Toronto board's first project involved the Israeli-Palestinian youth orchestra in the Hinnom Valley."

Connie Putterman, co-chair of the New Leadership Group of Jerusalem Foundation Toronto with artist Ian Leventhal, was recently appointed president of the Toronto chapter.

Putterman, who has worked on many Jerusalem Foundation projects, including a youth library at the Jerusalem Central Library, will be going to Israel next month to attend a ceremony at the Saul Herschel School dedicating a mosaic mural consisting of some 200 wooden tiles, a gift from Toronto's Jerusalem Foundation in honor of Jerusalem's trimillennium. The theme of the 28 foot x 20 foot mural is The Children of Toronto Paint Jerusalem.

Under the direction of Leventhal, some 100 Toronto children painted the tiles for the mosaic. The mural depicts Jerusalem's Jewish, Christian and Muslim shrines and other archaeological and historical sites.

U of Waterloo ready to fill Jewish studies post

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After 3 1/2 years of quiet fundraising, the University of Waterloo is almost ready to hire its first chair of Jewish Studies.

Qualified candidates have already approached Paul Socken, chair of the dean's advisory committee on Jewish Studies, to inquire about the position.

"That's encouraging," Socken said recently.

With close to $1,300,000 in private donations, Socken has a hiring committee in place and is within striking distance of the minimum $1½ million (ideally $2 million to meet longterm goals) needed to begin the hiring process.

Socken, who raised the money through one-on-one conversations, uses words like "magical" and "bashert" to describe the project.

He was recruited by Waterloo's dean of arts Brian Hendley, who came up with the idea of establishing the chair after attending a Holocaust memorial at a local church and, some time later, seeing the movie Schindler's List.

The plan has been strongly backed by the university's president, Jim Downey, Hendley said in a phone interview last week.

Socken, who has been chair of Waterloo's department of French Studies for the past three years, entered the picture with no experience in fundraising and no professional expertise in Jewish Studies.

Hendley approached him because he knew Socken was Jewish and he respected his opinion, he said.

A former president of Kitchener's Beth Jacob Congregation, Socken was the liaison between the shul and the university's Jewish Students' Association when he lived in the Kitchener-Waterloo area. (He and his family moved back to his native Toronto eight years ago.)

Socken never imagined his personal life and his professional life would merge so dramatically.

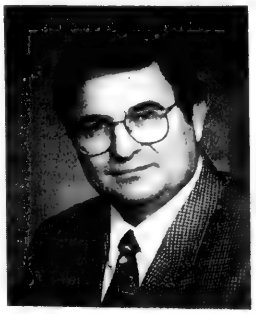
"It took a non-Jewish dean to come up with the idea," he admits.

But he couldn't be more enthusiastic about the program had he thought of it himself. He is likewise sold on the university.

"I'm a convert to the University of Waterloo philosophy of traditional studies wedded to marketable skills," he said. "Waterloo started out as a unique experiment, and I think it's proven itself."

The 40-year-old University of Waterloo offers 61 co-op programs. Thirty percent of full-time arts students are enrolled in such programs.

When Socken began teaching at the university 25 years ago, people he spoke to here weren't quite sure where it was. Now its profile is national, he noted.



Paul Socken

In the 1997 Maclean's Guide to Canadian Universities, Waterloo ranked first in the reputational categories of quality, innovation, leaders of tomorrow and best overall, for "comprehensive" universities (those with a wide range of programs).

Socken is sometimes asked whether the University of Waterloo has enough Jewish students to make Jewish Studies viable. (According to the Hillel Guide to Jewish Life on Campus, there are 300 Jewish students out of 26,121 total.)

Although Jewish students are an important constituency for the program, Socken feels the non-Jewish student population is equally important. "We feel it will be an important bridge to non-Jews."

Even if students take one or two courses, "that exposure will be a potential boon for them and for the Jewish community."

Socken has had "nothing but encouragement" from non-Jewish faculty members, some of whom teach courses – like Racism and the Holocaust – that could fall under the banner of Jewish Studies.

And why shouldn't non-Jews be interested? he asked, noting the Jewish roots of Christianity. "I'm a professor of French literature, and I'm not French. To me the culture is fascinating enough that I'm drawn to it."

Socken looks forward to co-operation among the 100 or so endowed Jewish Studies positions in North America. To the best of his knowledge there are only four such chairs in Canada – at York University, the University of Toronto, Queen's University and McGill University.

Among the emerging components of the Waterloo project is the possibility of "distance education" using taped lectures from York University. An exchange program with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem is also in the works.

With his term as arts dean ending in 15 months, Hendley said it's his fond hope "that before I'm through I will be able to shake the hand of the person we've hired. That will be a really nice legacy to have left, and I think we'll make it."

Israeli youth meet with Canadian peers

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — What questions do Canadian teens most frequently ask about Israel?

"They all want to know what the legal drinking age is in Israel, and what the price of marijuana is," Sivan Pardo, 16, answers with a laugh.

Pardo, from Tel Aviv, and her male counterpart, Alon Linial, also 16, who hails from Kfar Saba, are winding up a month-long visit to Canada. As members of the Youth Delegation of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the duo have been crossing Canada to meet with young Canadians and discuss what Pardo called "the other side of Israel."

"We want to tell Canadians that Israel isn't just wars and desert," she explained. "Alon and I talk to them about other things – about the political situation in Israel, about the peace process, and about youth, culture and religion, too."

The teenagers' itinerary has been as packed with speaking engagements: nine schools in Toronto; six in Winnipeg; four in Saskatoon; four in Calgary; and five in Vancouver, including Magee, Maimonides, Prince of Wales, Sir Charles Tupper and David Thompson.

'We want to reach non-Jewish kids'

With the exception of Maimonides, all the Vancouver schools at which they have spoken are in the public school system, as are most of the schools in the other cities they have visited.

"The kids who attend Jewish schools already know about Israel," Linial explained. "We want to reach the non-Jewish kids. Many of them know little or nothing about our country."

The visit to Canada is part of the Israeli government's Young Ambassadors program, which has been in existence for about 20 years. Ran Harash, director of the Israel Program Centre's Pacific Northwest region, said that in Canada, the program is paid for by the Israeli consulate in Toronto. The Canadian Zionist Federation and the Israel Program Centre in each Canadian city coordinate the students' schedules and arrange room and board in private homes.

When Linial and Pardo address a class, they follow a one-hour routine. First, there is a 15-minute presentation.

"We show maps of Israel superimposed on maps of Canada, to show Canadians the size of Israel," said Pardo. "We show other maps of the Middle East, too – Israel before and after 1948, Israel after 1967 and Israel today."

Pardo and Linial also give a brief lesson in the alef-bet, showing the Canadians how to spell their names in Hebrew.

The presentation is followed by a 20-minute video, The Wonder of Israel. After the video there is a 25-minute question and answer session.

Their visit to Canada has been full of surprises for the young Israelis, especially Pardo, for whom it is her first trip outside Israel. What made the strongest impression on them in Canada, they agreed, was the weather.

"Snow everywhere, and cold. It was minus 30 degrees in Calgary," said Linial.

They also said it was exciting to be the first Israeli – or Jew – that many of the Canadian students had met.

RONALD APPLEBY, Q.C. NAMED REENA GALA DINNER CHAIR

In Support of the Al and Faye Mintz ElderHome

. TORONTO - Get ready for the best Reena Gala Dinner yet and the most outstanding fundraising event of the season.

When Alex Eisen, Project Chair for the new Reena Seniors' Housing Project known as ElderHomes and Harley Mintz, past Reena Chair and son of this year's Gala dinner honourees, Al and Faye Mintz, got together to choose a dinner chair there was one person who fit the requirements perfectly.

Accordingly to Alex, "The one person to take on the responsibility for ensuring the fundraising success of the dinner, who can chair the evening's proceedings and make sure that this event is truly exceptional, is Ronnie Appleby.

When asked why he agreed to undertake such a significant task, Appleby answered; "There are basically three simple reasons why I accepted the invitation to Chair the Reena Gala Dinner. Reena serves a vital need in our community. The Al and Faye Mintz ElderHome will be a prototype, a model fulfilling requirements for older people with a developmental disability and I am proud to be able to help make it a reality. And he added "I will be helping to honour two people that I love very much, my aunt and uncle, Faye and Al Mintz."

Ronald Appleby's contributions to the Jewish community are considerable. He is Past President of what is now known as Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (UJA/Fed) and remains as honourary Life Member of the Executive Board and member of the Board of Trustees of the Endowment Fund of UJA/Fed.He currently sits on the boards of Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Geriatric Centre, Canadian Society for the Weizman Institute, the Haifa Foundation, the Jewish National Fund and is Vice-President of the Canadian Friends of the Shalom Hartman Institute. He is Chairman of the Maurice Pulver Scholarship Fund for Study in Israel. Past positions as chairman and board member of many prestigious and important organizations are too numerous to mention here.

His experience as Negev Dinner Chair, twice, will undoubtedly be a further asset in organizing this exciting event.The Black Tie Gala Dinner will feature music, dancing, gourmet dinner and a key raffle event. "Committees are already hard at work planning all aspects of the evening," notes Appleby. "We are very excited by the enthusiasm generated by the terrific people who have volunteered to help."

Ronnie Appleby is senior partner of the law firm of Robins, Appleby & Taub. He has published extensively on the topics of income tax, estate planning and business law. He is often a featured speaker and popular lecturer in these areas as well.

Appleby brings his acclaimed organizational abilities, his celebrated speaking skills, his leadership expertise and his wonderful sense of humour to this role of Gala Fundraising Dinner Chair for the Al and Faye Mintz ElderHome.

The dinner will take place on Monday June 22nd at the Regal Constellation Hotel. For further information or to make reservations, please call Julea Gasner, Coordinator of Special Events, at (905) 889-6484.

Toronto lawyer Ronen acclaimed CJC president

Students' Network, fighting for Soviet and Ethiopian Jewry.

He has had a number of positions on the Congress national executive, including chair from 1989 to 1991. In that election, he defeated three other candidates.

Ronen told The CJN he believes strongly in the unity of the Canadian Jewish community and in the unity of Canada. He also wants to strengthen the CJC's traditional role in supporting human rights.

After attending a recent meeting of the national executive in Montreal, Ronen said he is convinced he has national, solid backing for his presidency.

A crucial item in his decision to run, he said, was the support of several past presidents.

Ronen said he would use the 60-day period between the close of nominations and the plenary to work on the serious issues which confront the Canadian Jewish community.

Though the position of CJC president is voluntary, Ronen said he will treat it as a full-time job. He is able to do this, he said, because of the support of his law partner, Lawrence Zimmerman, and the firm's counsel, Ed Morgan, legal counsel for the Ontario region.

Ronen is the son of Holocaust survivors, Mordechai and Ilana, who reside in Toronto. He said his upbringing led him to an awareness of the situation facing Jews, and that it was responsible for his career as a student activist fighting to make the CJC agenda more responsive to the needs of young Jews.

Because of his 25 years of service to the Jewish cause, he believes he has the suppport of a broad base of Canadian Jews who know his interest in Israel-Diaspora relations.

His own law work often takes him to Israel, where he acts on behalf of Canadians doing business there. "I'm as comfortable in Israel as I am in Canada," says Ronen, who is fluent in Hebrew and has a good understanding of Yiddish.

He said he would not take on the job of CJC president without the support of his wife, Dara, a teacher at Netivot Hatorah, who was born in St. John's, Nfld. They have two children, Sari, 7, who attends Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, and Shye, 2.

Anti-terrorist measures should be front and centre of the CJC agenda along with ways to strengthen Israel-Canada links, Ronen believes.

Ronen's activities have included working with Avital Sharansky for the release of her husband Natan (now Israel's industry minister), and other prisoners of Zion.

As a student, he worked with Nobel Prize laureate Elie Wiesel to coordinate opposition to then American president Ronald Reagan's 1985 visit to Bitburg, Germany's Nazi cemetery.

Shacter, the national chair elect, served as chair of the CJC Quebec region from 1992 to 1995.

Wolchock, the national associate chair elect, is a resident of Winnipeg. She recently completed a four-year term as president of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada.

Weinberger, the treasurer elect, is a Toronto chartered accountant who presently serves as treasurer for the CJC Ontario region.

Elterman, the secretary elect, is presently completing his second term as chair of the CJC Pacific region.

Conservative Jewish women to meet in Victoria

By SUZANNE KORT
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — The Women's League for Conservative Judaism's Pacific Northwest branch will host its 1998 Spring Conference May 3 to 5 at the Harbor Towers Hotel.

Women's League Pacific Northwest branch president, Addie Banasky, is organizing the program here, with Audrey Citak, Women's League immediate past national president, as conference consultant.

An optional Shabbat program will precede the conference.

Workshops and presentations will reflect the conference theme, I have promised...I will fulfil.

"Most of the [workshops], like Women of Courage and Enriching our lives with Jewish Rituals, were created by the sisterhoods attending the conference," said Banasky.

Workshop leaders will help delegates take Jewish home traditions off the back burner and into the next century, discuss religious pluralism and celebrate Rosh Chodesh.

The league's new healing service, Under the Wings of the Sh'Khinah, will be introduced by Carole Rotstein of Portland, Ore., along with several other members of her Congregation Neveh Shalom Sisterhood. Rotstein worked with Rosalind Karby of Vancouver, B.C., and five other American league members to develop the hour-long service.

"Our mission was to answer the need of people who seek a caring community and a mechanism for self-reflection," said Rotstein.

She explained that the informal service uses music to help create a restful atmosphere. Other essential ingredients are a slow pace, soft lighting, guided imagery, moments of sharing, and the recitation of traditional prayers that articulate Jewish concepts of healing. Conference delegates will learn about the service by doing it and will receive written instructions to help them integrate the program into their own congregations.

Citak, the league's National Consultant, will give the keynote address at a banquet featuring a special tribute to Israel.

Conference organizers are banking on Victoria's natural beauty to draw delegates from across the Pacific Northwest. High tea, breakfast in Canada's oldest synagogue and relaxed forays through a garden city as it blossoms are some of the added highlights promised.

Delegates must be Women's League members. League membership is available through sisterhoods at Conservative synagogues.

"New delegates are extremely welcome. There will be a special new delegate orientation, where people who have never been to a spring conference can learn the ropes and meet other new delegates," said conference chair, Laura Bramly, of Victoria's Synergy Communications.

Incoming branch president, Linda Gold, of Vancouver's Beth Israel Synagogue, will begin her two-year term at the conference, along with the new branch board.

Registration for the event, including five vegetarian meals, is $149. Guests can attend the Sunday banquet for an additional $40 each. Child care will be provided during the banquet.

For more information, contact Bramly of Congregation Emanu-El Women's League at 250-382-0615; fax 250-380-3553; or e-mail [bramly@islandnet.com].

Contact local sisterhoods for information about Women's League membership or spring conferences in other regions.

Jewish agency gives 'mitzvah miles' for charity

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Jewish Family Service Agency (JFSA) of Greater Vancouver has developed an innovative program in an effort to attract more donors and bigger donations.

Thanks to a recently signed agreement with Calgary-based Canadian Airlines, the agency is offering Canadian Plus points to anyone who donates more than $100.

JFSA executive director Barry Corrin said the purpose of the "loyalty" program is to attract new donors to the agency, and to encourage those who have given in the past to give a little more.

"It's a different way to encourage philanthropy," said Corrin. "We're rewarding giving, rather than buying, which is the usual purpose of loyalty programs."

In return for their cheques to JFSA, donors receive a tax-deductible receipt and Canadian Plus points toward travel. Up to five points can be earned per dollar, depending on the amount of the donation.

A $5,000 gift earns enough Canadian Plus points for a free flight anywhere in Canada or the continental United States, a $10,000 donation is worth a flight to Europe or Japan between October and April, and $15,000 puts a donor on a plane to Israel.

Corrin said that, although it's still too soon to tell if Canadian Plus points "are the answer to JFSA's funding prayers, so far, the program has worked. It's resulted in an increase in the number of donations and in the amount of donations collected, compared to last year."

JFSA, formed in 1936, serves the entire Lower Mainland of British Columbia (Greater Vancouver) with 18 staff members. The agency offers four "core" services: counselling, services for seniors, resettlement assistance and poverty relief.

"The Lower Mainland is right behind Montreal as [a] Jewish destination in Canada," Corrin said.

During the fiscal year 1996-97 (the most recent year for which records are available), JFSA helped 3,000 people.

"Although many people already use our services, we could accommodate many more if we just had the money in our budget to do so."

Pesach full of memories – both bitter and sweet

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Is there a time in the Jewish calendar so full of memories as Pesach? Both bitter and sweet?

Even in the hustle and bustle of Pesach preparation, they are with us.

Do you remember the color of the dishes you used on Pesach when you were a kid? The special frying pan your mother used to make bubbeles?

I do. The dishes were orangy-yellow, and my parents used to reminisce how they got them as favors in movie theatres when they first got married. The frying pan was cast iron, and no new-fangled substance can make food as good.

My father used to stagger up and down between the basement and the kitchen, shlepping cartons and boxes of dishes, serving pieces, pots. My mother and I used to unwrap each item, wash it and stack it on the buffet until everything was done. It was a massive undertaking.

And the seder – didn't you wait all year for it? All the aunts and uncles and cousins squeezed themselves around a table that usually held half the number. And it lasted for hours, and you hoped that your parents wouldn't say anything as your bedtime came and went.

Then you got older, and had your own family, and your own children. Remember when they were small, and felt so proud when you gave them a small job to do for Pesach. When they drew pictures and wrote slogans on the boxes, noting how much more mature their creations were than the year before.

When they insisted on staying awake at the seder, until their eyes were glassy. When it got too much for them, they collapsed where they were, and you would fall over small sleeping bodies on the floor and on the sofa.

Over the years, the seders got bigger, as people got married, and as children came along. Then, suddenly, there began to be empty spaces at the table. Suddenly you were the "older" people at the seder. You were the ones who told the stories of the old days, who kids asked questions of.

You were now the ones obligated to pass the traditions on, special recipes, family customs, tales of how things used to be, probably embellished with the halo of passing time.

But you are passing on more than that. You are passing on the experience of the exodus from Egypt. The Hagaddah does not talk about how G-d took them out of Egypt – it says that G-d took us out, and that we must each feel as if we ourselves packed up our household goods, gathered our children together, put the dough that hadn't had time to rise on our backs, and ventured into the desert, probably terrified of what would happen there, but realizing that anything was better than a lifetime of slavery.

The story goes that when Jacob left Caanan to join Joseph in Egypt, he sent his sons back to get seeds from acacia trees that Abraham had planted near Beersheva. He planted the seeds in Goshen, where the Jews settled, and instructed his family that when they left Egypt, they should cut the trees down and take the wood with them. He foresaw that that same wood would be used to build the Tabernacle, which held the tablets with the Ten Commandments. That wood was a link between times and people long ago, themselves and generations to come.

That is what makes those memories that crowd around us on Pesach so significant. They bind together the generations in a chain of molten steel.

Hang on to those memories and cherish them. Tell your family histories; follow those food customs that seem rather silly, but which generations back observed. Make sure that your children realize how precious these are to you and should be to them, retell the story of that first Passover.

Then and only then will that chain remain unbroken and unbreakable.

From all of us at The CJN, a Chag Kasher v'Samayach.

Diabetics must tailor food requirements for Pesach

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Diabetics, like anyone with a medical condition, must tailor the requirements of Pesach to their own food requirements, says Rabbi David Bagley.

Rabbi Bagley, a chazzan, and spiritual leader of Beth Radom Congregation in North York, was speaking at the recent Pesach meeting of the Jewish Diabetes Chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association.

The question is, he said, how one fulfils the mitzvah of the seder, but also fulfils the halachic ruling that you shall guard yourself lest you injure your health.

The main problem at the seder is the injunction to drink four cups of wine, Rabbi Bagley said.

The rules say that the drink at the seder must be intoxicating, he explained. Thus, he said, to accommodate diabetic food exchanges, it is preferable halachically to use diluted wine rather than grape juice.

If, however, you cannot drink wine at all, you can use grape juice, tea, or water with saccharine.

"While theoretically coffee is permissable, it is better not to use it, because it leaves an after-taste, so one can't taste the afikoman."

The laws about matzah require a keziat of matzah, theoretically the size of one half of a large egg or 2/3 of a standard-size matzah.

But the over-riding rule, he said, is "if you are not able to [eat a keziat], then don't."

These leniences, he stressed, are for those with medical conditions, and not for those who don't like matzah or wine.

Nicole Shuckett, a clinical dietician at Baycrest Centre, as well as in private practice, said that diabetics should eat "the way most people should eat," a diet "rich in complex carbohydrates, vitamins and minerals, and low in fat and protein."

The trick is moderation, she said. "Remember that 2½ tbsp. matzah meal is one starch, as is one slab of matzah."

Use non-stick pans and parchment paper to avoid cooking with fat, she advised. And when you do have to use oil, use unsaturated oils, like olive oil, or, even better, a cooking spray.

"You can even put the oil in a spritzer bottle, so you use less."

Cut down on processed foods, she said, as they are high in fat and salt. She suggested using egg substitutes or four egg whites and one yolk for three eggs; sugar-free gelatin; and lean meat, especially turkey and chicken without the skin.

If your grocery store does not stock low fat dairy products, "ask them to order it – there are low fat cheeses, milk, and sour cream."

Try to bake, broil, roast or microwave instead of frying, but if you must fry, use a very hot pan, so you can use less oil. Drain fat off roasts and ground beef.

Use lots of herbs and spices, such as parsley, coriander and dill, as well as lemon juice and broth.

Don't completely deny yourself high-fat foods if you really crave them, Shuckett said, or you will want more and eat more. "Just use moderation."

To fight constipation during Pesach, have lots of fibre – prunes, fresh fruits and vegetables, potato and apple skins, salads, whole wheat or wheat bran matzah, and drink six to eight glasses of water a day.

Current thinking allows diabetics a small amount of sugar, so long as it is worked into an individual food plan. Sugar substitutes, like aspertame, cyclamate, and saccharine do not affect blood glucose levels.

Splenda is the best bet for baking.

Among the recipes handed out at the meeting was this one for vegetable muffins.

PASSOVER VEGETABLE MUFFINS

3 tbsp. oil
1 medium onion, chopped
1 clove garlic, crushed
¼ cup chopped green or red pepper
½ cup celery, chopped
1 ½ cups carrots, grated
1 cup zucchini, grated, drained
3 eggs, beaten
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
¼ cup matzah meal

Preheat oven to 350. Saute onion and garlic in hot oil; add pepper, celery, carrots and zucchini. Cook over medium heat for 10 minutes. Let cool. Add beaten eggs, salt, pepper and matzah meal. Mix until blended. Line 12-muffin tin pan with paper baking cups. Spoon mixture evenly into muffin cups. Bake for 45 minutes or until golden. Makes 12 muffins.

Each muffin is ½ starchy choice; ½ fruit and vegetable choice, 1 fat and oil choice, and 77 calories.

Though the customs of Jewish communities vary around the world, the essence of the Passover seder is the retelling of the story of the exodus around the table for the benefit of family, friends and other guests. Passover Foods

Vegetables offer tasty menu alternative

YE'ATAKLIT ALICH'A (VEGETABLE STEW)

1½ cups oil
1½ cups chopped red onions
6 medium potatoes
5 medium carrots
1 small can tomato paste
1 small cabbage
6 medium green peppers (or use hot peppers)
¼ tsp. garlic powder or fresh garlic
Salt to taste
¼ tsp. black pepper

Cook onions in oil in a medium pan without browning. Add tomato paste and mix well. Set aside. Peel and slice carrots. Wash cabbage and cut into large pieces. Add carrots and cabbage to onions. Stir gently and cook until tender. Peel and cut potatoes and add to mixture. Add garlic powder and cook 35-40 minutes. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Just before serving, slice green peppers lengthwise and dip into the sauce. Serve hot or cold. Serves 6.

Variations: Substitute cauliflower or broccoli for cabbage and omit potatoes. Optional: add fresh ginger.

BEEF STEW BORBONNAISE

2 to 2½ lbs. lean beef chuck
2 cloves garlic
2 medium onions, chopped
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1 can undiluted Passover tomato soup
¼ cup dry red wine
2 to 4 potatoes, quartered
½ tsp. dry basil
½ tsp. dry thyme
1 cup ketchup
4 carrots, cut in quartered pieces
2 cups celery, cut in 1-inch pieces

In a Dutch oven, brown the meat in its own juices, add the garlic cloves and the onions, and then saute until the onions are clear. Add salt and pepper. Stir in the tomato soup and red wine.

Cover and simmer for 30 minutes or until the meat is tender. Par boil the potatoes and add to the stew. Add the basil and thyme. Add the ketchup, carrots and celery. Cover and simmer for one hour.

Taste and add more seasoning if necessary. Simmer one-half hour more. This tastes better the second day.

Zucchini's really a great side dish

Zucchini is such a prolific vegetable that it has become the butt of jokes. That's really unfair, as it is great side dish.

ZUCCHINI IN LEMON SAUCE

2 lbs. small zucchini
½ cup water
3 tbsp. olive oil
Juice of 1 lemon
1 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. salt
10 peppercorns
1 tsp. coriander seeds
2 sprigs of parsley
1 stalk celery, whole, or cut in half if it does not fit into saucepan
2 tbsp. chopped dill

Wash and slice zucchini into diagonal slices ½ inch thick. Put the slices in a saucepan and add the water, oil, lemon juice, sugar, salt peppercorns, coriander seeds, parsley and celery. Bring to a boil; lower the flame, mix well and simmer covered until barely tender, not more than 10 minutes.

With a slotted spoon take out the zucchini and as few of the spices as possible to a shallow serving dish. Strain the liquid, discarding the celery, parsley and remaining spices. Add the dill to the sauce and pour over vegetables. Cool before serving. Serves 6.

ZUKES WITH ROSEMARY

Zucchini – as much as you would like to serve
Olive oil
Rosemary

Wash zucchini and cut into ¼ inch rounds. Brush lightly with olive oil and place in an oven pan. The zucchini should be set out in a single layer. Sprinkle with rosemary leaves that you crushed between your fingers. Bake at 375 degrees for 20 minutes. The zukes should be soft on the inside but crispy on the top.

MINTED ZUCCHINI AND CHERRY TOMATOES

Marinade:
¼ cup fresh mint leaves, tightly packed
3 tbsp. vinegar
1 tbsp. water
1 rounded tbsp. Passover brown sugar
3 (about 1½ lbs.) zucchini, unpeeled and thinly sliced
1 pint cherry tomatoes

Prepare marinade: In blender jar, place mint, vinegar, water and sugar. Whirl at high for 10 seconds until mint is finely chopped. Set aside. Heap in centre of a non-metal serving dish. Prick each cherry tomato a few times with a fork and arrange around zucchini. Drizzle marinade over and refrigerate at least 3 to 4 hours.

Vegetables help deal with that hungry feeling

Besides being good for you, vegetables help round out a meal, add color to the table and help deal with that always hungry feeling we all have at Pesach.

CARROT LATKES

4 eggs
1 lb. carrots, grated
1 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. chopped parsley
1/4 cup chopped onion
1/2 cup matzah meal
1/2 cup water
Peanut oil for frying

Beat eggs well, add remaining 8 ingredients. Heat 1/8-inch of oil in a large skillet. Drop mixture into the oil by tablespoonful spreading slightly with back of spoon. Fry on both sides until lightly browned. Makes 14 to 16.

SWEET 'N SOUR RED CABBAGE

1 tbsp. butter
1 onion, chopped
4 cups shredded red cabbage
1 apple, cored and chopped
1 tbsp. Passover brown sugar
2 tbsp. apple juice
1 tbsp. cider vinegar
1/2 tsp. salt
Pepper to taste

Combine butter and onion in an 8-cup microwavable casserole. Microwave, uncovered at high (100 percent) for 1 min. to soften onion.

Stir in cabbage and apple. Combine remaining ingredients and pour over cabbage mixture. Toss well.

Cover and microwave at high for 8-10 min. or until tender-crisp. Stir at least once during cooking. Let stand a few minutes before serving. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Serves 3-4.

WINTER SQUASH WITH SWEET SPICES

2 lbs. winter squash, such as butternut, acorn, or sweet dumpling
2 medium garlic cloves, peeled
1/4 tsp. ground black pepper
1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1/4 cup water
Salt to taste

Cut off squash peel, remove seeds and strings and cut flesh into 1-inch pieces. Combine remaining ingredients in a large saute pan and bring to a simmer. Add squash and stir until coated. Sprinkle with salt and heat until sizzling. Cover and cook over low heat, occasionally stirring gently, for 30 minutes or until squash is tender. Remove garlic, chop, and return to pan. If sauce is too thin, uncover and cook 2 to 3 minutes or until it thickens. Taste and adjust seasoning. Serve hot. Makes 3 or 4 side-dish servings.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE TSIMMIS

2 large sweet potatoes, peeled
8 carrots, peeled and trimmed
1/2 cup raisins
1/2 cup pitted prunes
1/2 cup dates, pitted and cut-up
1/2 cup apricots, cut up
1 seedless orange, peeled
1 tbsp.lemon juice
1/2 cup honey
2 tbsp. water
1/2 tsp. salt
Dash pepper

Slicer: Cut sweet potatoes and carrots to fit feed tube. Slice, using medium pressure. You should have about 8 cups. Add raisins, prunes, dates and apricots.

Steel Knife: Process peeled orange until finely ground. Add with remaining ingredients to vegetables and mix well. Place in an ungreased 3 quart deep round casserole. Cover with casserole lid or vented plastic wrap.

Microwave on high for 20 to 25 minutes, until tender stirring at half time. Uncover, mix gently but thoroughly; cover with lid or a dinner plate. Let stand covered for 10 minutes. Freezes well. Yield: 8 to 10 servings.

GINGER CARROTS IN FOIL

1 1/2 lbs. carrots
1-inch piece fresh ginger or
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1 tbsp. Passover brown sugar
Salt
1 tbsp. unsalted margarine

Peel carrots and slice on the diagonal into 1/4-inch thick slices. If using fresh ginger, peel and finely grate to make 1 tsp.

In large bowl, combine carrots, ginger, brown sugar and salt to taste. Toss well.

Cut 4 sheets of foil 12 x 20 inches. Grease foil with margarine and fold in half. Place 1/4 of carrots on each foil piece and dot with 1 tsp. of margarine. Fold other half over carrots and seal packets well so no steam can escape. Place in baking dish and bake 30 minutes at 375. Serves 4.

2 tbsp. matzah meal
8 eggs, well beaten
1/2 cup potato starch

Ratatouille can be prepared in advance

COLD RATATOUILLE

One evening try this main course, which is prepared in advance and served chilled.

1 medium green pepper
1½ medium zucchini (½ lb.)
¼ lb. medium mushrooms
½ medium eggplant (½ lb.)
6 tbsp. salad or olive oil
½ cup thinly sliced onion
1 clove garlic, crushed
2 medium tomatoes (¾ lb.) peeled and cut into wedges
⅛ tsp. black pepper
2 tbsp. chopped parsley

Halve pepper and remove ribs and seeds. Cut lengthwise into ¼ inch thick slices. Cut zucchini diagonally into ¼ inch-thick slices. Slice mushrooms lengthwise, right through stems, ¼ inch thick. Cut eggplant lengthwise into quarters; then cut crosswise into ¼ inch slices.

In two tablespoons of hot oil in a medium skillet, saute green pepper, mushrooms, onion and garlic for 5 minutes, or until onion is transparent. With slotted spoon, remove to medium bowl.

Add two tbsp. oil to skillet. In hot oil, saute zucchini, turning frequently, until tender – about 10 minutes. With slotted utensil, remove from skillet to same bowl.

Add remaining oil to skillet. In hot oil, saute eggplant, turning occasionally, until tender – 5 minutes.

Return vegetables to same skillet. Layer half of tomato wedges on top. Sprinkle with pepper and ½ tbsp. parsley. Stir gently to mix. Layer remaining tomato on top. Sprinkle with ½ tbsp. parsley.

Simmer mixture, covered, over low heat 10 minutes. Remove cover, cook 5 minutes longer, basting occasionally with pan juices or until liquid has evaporated. Turn into large, shallow serving dish. Refrigerate, covered, until very well chilled – several hours. Sprinkle with remaining parsley. Makes 8 servings.

Food that really schmecks at Passover

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One of the most popular Canadian cookbook series is Edna Staebler's Schmecks series – Food That Really Schmecks, More Food That Really Schmecks and Schmecks Appeal (McClelland & Stewart).

Classic cooking of the Mennonites of the Kitchener-Waterloo area is presented in a homey, chatty style, replete with anecdotes about Staebler's family, friends and neighbors.

More Food That Really Schmecks has just come out in paperback, and is well worth getting, if you don't have the original hard cover editions.

Of course, this is not a kosher cookbook, but many of the recipes can be adapted, such as by using non-dairy creamer, or oil instead of bacon fat or butter with meat or poultry. It is a great example of a general cookbook that the kosher cook can – and will – enjoy too.

You can even find great recipes that you can use on Pesach, especially the salads and entrees. Here are a few examples.

COLD CUCUMBER SOUP

2 tbsp. butter
1 medium onion, or 1 leek, or green onions, sliced
1 unpeeled cucumber, diced
1 large potato, sliced (or 1 cup leftover or mashed potato)
2 cups pareve chicken broth
Salt and pepper to taste
Several sprigs parsley
½ tsp. thyme
1 cup thick or sour cream
Chopped chives for garnishing

Melt the butter and cook the onion in it until it is transparent, but not brown. Add the remaining ingredients, except the cream and chives; bring to a boil. Lower the heat and simmer until the potatoes are tender, about 25 minutes. Puree in blender, or put through a colander. (Staebler blends hers, then puts it through a sieve to remove the cumber seeds.)

Taste for seasonings. There's nothing to prevent you from eating this soup hot, but it's best when chilled thoroughly. Before serving, stir in the cream, and sprinkle with chives. Serves 4.

RUNDLES POULET SAUTE CHASSEUR

1 fryer chicken, or pieces
¼ cup pareve margarine
salt and pepper
¼ cup chopped shallots or green onions
1 cup sliced or button mushrooms
½ cup dry white Passover wine
1 cup chicken broth
1 cup peeled and chopped tomatoes
Chopped parsley and tarragon

Melt the margarine in a pan over a fairly hot fire. Season the pieces of chicken and place them in the pan. Cook to a golden brown on all sides, cover with a lid and cook for a few more minutes. Lift the pieces with tongs into an entree dish that can be put in the oven.

Drop the shallots into the pan, cover and cook for a few minutes without browning them; add the mushrooms, cover and cook gently for 3 to 4 minutes. Drain off the fat, add the wine and the chicken broth. Add the tomatoes and simmer for 5 minutes.

Correct the seasoning, pour the whole bit over the chicken in the entree dish and put it into a 300 oven until the chicken is tender or till you are ready to serve it. Sprinkle it then with parsley and tarragon. Serves 4.

APPLE SALAD FOR HILDA

2 or 3 large apples
1 thick stem of celery handful of walnuts enough Passover mayonnaise to coat everything
¼ cup cubed cheddar (opt.)
¼ cup raisins (opt.)
½ cup sliced cabbage (opt.)

Core and slice the apples, chop the celery and nuts. Mix with any optional ingredients and mayonnaise. Serve on lettuce. Serves 2 or 3.

Cott

What is Passover?

"For most people, Spring is the time of new crops. It is a promise that they will have a fine harvest - so they celebrate. For Jews, too, the new growing things are a great joy, and they thank God for them. But it is also a time of freedom. So Passover is a double celebration: the Feast of unleavened Bread, and also our springtime Festival of Freedom."

During this special holiday, Cott Beverages is pleased to offer 3 quality Kosher-for-Passover soft drink products in a 2-Litre bottle size - RC Cola, Cott Club Soda, and Cott Ginger Ale.

These soft drinks are available at selected Highland Farms, Knob Hill Farms and Food Basics stores.

Good wishes for a happy Passover from Cott Beverages Inc.

Consult with a rabbi about non-food products

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council of Toronto has circulated a request to drug firms and other related manufacturers asking them to provide a list of ingredients in their products.

All products ingested during Passover should have a "Kosher for Passover" endorsement. If "Kosher for Passover" products are not available and there is a medical need for any of the products, the items should be used in separate utensils.

Generally, when taking medication during Passover, preference should be given to non-chewable tablets rather than liquids and chewable tablets. Many products contain ingredients that are only permitted to be used on Passover for medical reasons. A competent rabbi who is familiar with the information upon which this flyer is based must be consulted prior to the use of these products. If there is any item that you must take during Passover and it is not found with reliable Passover supervision, please contact your rabbi who may have additional information.

For over-the-counter medications, call the Kashruth Council, 416-635-9550.

Milk Enzyme: Lactaid Tablets, Caplets and Drops should not be used on Passover. In case of great need, Lactose Free Milk should be purchased before Passover. Use separate utensils.

Infant Formula (Kitnyot): All infant formula listed below should be used in separate utensils. Formula is available in liquid and powder. Check each container for a hechsher, since not all forms are kosher endorsed. Enfalac, Isomil, Prosobee, Similac, Enfamil.

Nutritional Supplements (Kitnyot): These products are not produced under Passover supervision. They should be used only when there is no alternative in consultation with a rabbi. Boost, Ensure, Isocal, Sustacal.

Oral Care: Kosher for Passover toothpaste is recommended. Johnson & Johnson Dental Floss (unwaxed and unflavored), Polident.

The following oral care products are kitnyot: Crest Regular, Crest Coolmint Gel, Crest For Kids Sparkle Gel, Colgate Regular, Colgate Superstar, Colgate Gel, Fasteeth, Poligrip, Corega.

Mouthwash: Listerine – Regular, Coolmint, Froshburst, Steri/Sol.

Rubber Gloves: Playtex; Rubbermaid.

Aluminum Products: Special Passover certification is not required; any brand bearing kosher endorsement may be used.

Paper Products: Plates – Use plastic or styrofoam plates for food that contain moisture. Paper plates are permissible for cold, dry foods. Parchment Paper – Peterson/Norscan Silicone Paper, Baker's Mate Cooking Parchment Paper. Some napkins and paper towels may contain starch. Therefore some suggest that they not come in contact with wet foods i.e. latkes. The following, however, are free from starch: Scott Napkins, Scott Towels, Ultra and Viva Paper Towels, White Swan Towels and Napkins. In all cases, it is preferable not to use the first and last three sheets. Cut-Rite wax paper can be used.

Miscellaneous Baby Products: All Alcohol Free Baby Wipes, Johnson's Baby Powder, Johnson's Baby Powder Pure Cornstarch.

Alcohol: Isopropyl Rubbing Alcohol (any).

Deodorants: Old Spice Stick Deodorant/High Endurance, Old Spice Solid Antiperspirant, Secret Aerosol (all), Mennen Stick (all scents), Lady Speed Stick (all scents).

Hairspray: Vidal Sassoon, Pantene.

Fragrance: Charlie, Jean Nate, Revlon Fragrance, Ultima II Fragrances.

Skin Care: Almay Time-Off Toner, Almay Time-Off Moisture Lotion, Almay Time-Off Cleanser, Revlon Results Day-Light Replenisher Moisture Lotion/Moisturizer Oil-Free Fluid, Moon Drops Nourishing/Soothing Moisture Lotion.

After Shave: Old Spice (regular and sensitive), Blue Stratos, Mennen Skin Bracer (all fragrances), Mennen Afta Shave (all fragrances).

Shampoo and Conditioners: Head & Shoulders, Pert Plus, Ivory and Ivory Plus Shampoos, Vidal Sassoon, Pantene, Flex.

Cleansers: Spic and Span powder, Mr. Clean, Murphy's Oil Soap, Ajax Powder.

Oven Cleaner: Any brand.

Spray Starch: Glide Liquid Starch.

Dishwasher Detergents: Palmolive Automatic Dishwasher Gel (all scents) with a hechsher. Manual Dishwashing Liquid (must bear an OU): Joy, Ivory and Dawn.

Coffee: Nescafe Rich Blend Instant Coffee is available this year with a COR "Kosher for Passover" label.

Artificial Sweeteners: Sweet n Low (powder) with an OU and Passover symbols is available.

Silver Polish: Hagerty Silver Polish with an OU may be used.

General Guidelines

Brown sugar and icing sugar should be used only with Passover supervision.

Cosmetics, toiletries, soap, topical medications, which are in solid form or are thick creams, ointments and salves, may be used (preferably without perfume). Please consult your rabbi about wheat and oat based soaps.

Fat-free kosher cookbooks now available

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

There are a number of fat-free kosher cookbooks and a number of cookbooks that offer quick meals. Books that offer low fat, kosher, tasty and quick recipes, however, are rare.

One such book is Secrets of Fat-Free Kosher Cooking, by Deborah Bernstein (Avery Publishing Group, New York, 1998).

Bernstein has included chapters on keeping a kosher kitchen and ways to cook low fat, including sections on cholesterol, the food pyramid, and spices.

Beautiful coloured pictures add to the appeal of this book.

Recipes are fairly simple in both ingredients and technique, and include nutritional facts and suggestions for variations on many recipes. She even has a good selection of cholent recipes, including one for tex-mex (with pinto beans and salsa), a vegetarian cholent with wild rice, wine and spices, and one with beer.

While there are no specific chapters on holiday cooking, many recipes can be used on Pesach.

PARSLEY, SAGE, ROSEMARY & THYME CHICKEN

2 lbs chicken breast cutlets, rinsed and patted dry
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley
¼ cup fresh whole-leaf sage
¼ cup fresh rosemary
¼ cup fresh thyme
¼ cup water

Preheat oven to 350. Coat a 9 x 13-inch baking dish with olive oil cooking spray.

Combine parsley, sage, rosemary, thyme and water in a small bowl. Rub mixture into the chicken cutlets, then place in the baking dish.

Bake 20 to 30 minutes, or until the chicken is no longer pink inside. Serves 8.

MANGO CHICKEN SALAD

1½ lbs. skinless, boneless, boiled soup chicken
8 oz. fresh spinach leaves, washed and patted dry
1 large ripe mango, peeled, pitted and cut into 1-inch cubes
1 large Vidalia or other sweet onion, thinly sliced
1 medium green pepper, seeded and thinly sliced
8 oz. fresh mushrooms, sliced

Dice the chicken and place it in a large bowl. Add remaining ingredients and mix well. Cover and refrigerate.

Serve chilled. Serves 6.

TURKISH MEAT PIE

3 sheets matzah
1½ lbs. ground white meat turkey
1 cup sweet wine
3 medium egg whites
2 tbsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. ground black pepper

Preheat oven to 350. Coat bottom and sides of a 9 x 13 inch baking dish with olive oil cooking spray.

Place 1½ sheets matzah in a large shallow dish. Pour just enough boiling water over the matzahs to make them soft and pliable, but not so soft that they fall apart.

Pat the matzahs with paper towels to remove any excess water, then use them to line the bottom and sides of the baking dish.

Combine turkey, wine, egg whites, cinnamon, and pepper in a bowl. Spoon this mixture in an even layer on top of the matzahs.

Soften the remaining matzahs and use them to cover the turkey mixture

Bake for 1 hour, or until the matzah is lightly brown.

Allow to sit 5 minutes before cutting into squares and serving.

A SEDER IN BOHEMIA

This illustration is the frontispiece to the companion of the Van Geldern Haggadah, written and illuminated by the Moravian artist Moses Leib ben Wolf of Trebitsch. Moses Leib was a contemporary of Aaron Ben Wolf Chazan Herlingen, who lived in the 18th century. [From Jewish Liturgy, R. Posner, U. Kaploun, S. Cohen Editors, L. Amiel Publisher, Keter Publishing House, 1975]

Non-food products

The following may contain chametz: Pet and fish food (i.e. hydrolysed vegetable protein, starch, etc.), baby powder. The following are chametz: Play Dough and Postum.

Balloons and rubber gloves may have starches inside.

Plastic bags and wraps do not need kosher supervision when used for cold food.

The above information pertains to Canadian products only for 1998.

STRUB'S Pickle Corner STRUB'S

Vol. 1, No. 1 • April 2, 1998

Hello! How are ya? Welcome to the first edition of "Pickle Corner". It's my pleasure to shmooze with you about ideas for Strub's products, talk about current issues, Holiday ideas — or even the state of the world! Write to me, Pickle Guy, and look for your letter in "Pickle Corner" the first edition of every month in your CJN.

Question of the Month

Dear Pickle Guy:

Ever since your "Old Dills" started showing up in stores with your new labels, the taste of the pickles seems not quite the same. Have you changed your recipe? — Sincerely, S.W., North York — A True Strub's Pickle Fan

The Pickle Guy Replies

Dear S.W.:

Only the label is new! For almost 70 years, I have followed my great-grandmother's original recipe for naturally fermented full sour Dill Pickles, New Dills, Dill Tomatoes, and Sauerkraut. Enjoy them now as you have always! (And don't those new labels look great? Does Herring Guy look like anyone you know?)

Remember, send your letters, pictures, and postcards to me:

Pickle Guy

I answer ALL my mail, and if I use your letter in "Pickle Corner", I'll send you one of my "Pickle Guy" T-shirts and Hats. Thanks, and talk to you next month in the May 7 issue of the CJN.

All of us at Strub's wish you a very Happy and Kosher Pesach

Enticing salads

Pesach is the first time we really believe that spring is here. And what better way to celebrate the coming of spring than with healthy enticing salads.

COLORFUL CARROT SALAD

A rainbow of color makes this vibrant salad a feast for the eyes and a delight to the palate.

¼ cup vegetable oil
1 tbsp. vinegar
1 tbsp. mayonnaise
½ tsp. chervil
¼ tsp. celery seed
¼ tsp. salt
2 cups grated carrots (4 medium)
1 cup grated rutabaga
4 small cooked beets, thinly sliced

In jar with tight-fitting lid, combine oil, vinegar, mayonnaise, chervil, celery seed and salt. Shake well. Pour over grated carrot and rutabaga in bowl; toss gently to coat.

Arrange beet slices on 4 salad plates. Spoon vegetable mixture on top. Makes 4 salads.

SASSY STRAWBERRY SPINACH SALAD

¼ cup vegetable oil
2 tbsp. Italian style salad dressing
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. grated lemon rind
¼ tsp. each, salt and pepper
1 bunch fresh spinach, washed and torn into pieces
2 cups halved strawberries
½ sliced medium red onion
¼ lb. pecans in the shell, shelled, halved and toasted (½ cup)

In small bowl, whisk together oil, salad dressing, lemon juice, rind, salt and pepper; set aside. In large salad bowl, combine spinach, strawberries and onion. Just before serving, toss with dressing and garnish with pecans. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

ROASTED VEGETABLE SALAD

24 small new potatoes
¼ cup olive oil
12 cloves garlic, peeled and slivered
1 large eggplant
2 medium gold zucchini
2 medium green zucchini
2 sweet red peppers
2 sweet yellow or orange peppers
2 medium red onions
4 or 5 large tomatoes
½ cup chopped fresh basil

Scrub potatoes; slice thinly and arrange over bottom of large shallow baking dish. Drizzle lightly with about 2 tbsp. of the oil, about 2 of the garlic cloves and a generous sprinkle of salt and pepper. Cut eggplant crosswise into ½ inch slices; cut slices in half. Cut gold and green zucchini into ½ inch slices, red and yellow peppers into ½ inch rings, onions into ¼ inch slices and tomatoes into ½ inch slices.

Layer each vegetable over potatoes, sprinkling each layer in turn with an equal amount of oil, garlic, salt and pepper. Cover tightly with foil; bake at 375 F. for about 1¾ hours. Uncover, baste with pan juices and sprinkle with basil. Return to oven for about 30 min. longer or until all vegetables are tender and mixture still has some juices. Let stand about 10 min. and serve warm or at room temperature. Makes about 10 servings.

THE AFIKOMAN IS SET ASIDE

After the blessing is made over the wine, after participants have washed their hands and after the carpas is eaten, the leader of the seder removes the middle of the three matzot to set aside the portion of the afikoman. [From Celebration, Naomi Black, Editor, E.P. Dutton, New York]

Thanks to Israeli researchers, teetotalers may soon be able to enjoy the same health dividends available to those who down large quantities of red wine.

The medicinal benefits of red wine were discovered by scientists after they decided to investigate the "French paradox," namely the fact that Frenchmen are able to combine a high fat diet with a low incidence of heart disease. After long and detailed studies, those researchers – including Dr. Yosef Kanner of Israel's Volcani Centre – concluded that the quantities of red wine drunk by the residents of Gaul enables them to escape the consequences of their eating habits.

More specifically, the scientists identified a number of anti-oxidants in the wine, one of which, resveratrol, is primarily responsible for its beneficial effects.

Independently of the "French paradox" studies, some seven years ago, London-born Prof. Ruth Ben-Arie and her colleagues at the Volcani Centre were looking for a way to help grapevines and their fruit fight off a fungus that routinely attacks both. They discovered that a compound found naturally in grapes and grapevines – that self-same resveratrol – helps them to survive fungal assaults.

But resveratrol on its own isn't enough, and farmers have been forced to apply sulphur dioxide to the grapes after they are picked. It is effective, though far from ideal, because sulphur dioxide can cause allergic reactions in some of the people who subsequently consume the grapes, and if applied in excess, it can damage the fruit.

In their search for a substitute, Ben-Arie and her fellow plant pathologists found that when ozone was used to gas the fruit, it not only attacked the fungus, but also increased the amount of resveratrol in the grapes, thus improving their own defences against disease.

That is not only exciting news for farmers with vineyards, it is also of potential importance to the rest of mankind if resveratrol can be extracted from grapes and given in tablet form to reduce the incidence of heart attacks (and, recent laboratory experiments would indicate, of cancer as well).

A first step in that direction has been made by one of Ben-Arie's colleagues at Volcani, Dr. Avi Perl. He is employing gene transfer techniques to develop vines with a higher than average concentration of resveratrol.

Studies are also being conducted at Volcani about the possibility of using the tools of biotechnology to manufacture resveratol in test tubes.

Recipes help cooks cope with rest of the holiday

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

About the fourth or fifth day of Pesach I have this fantasy. There is a member of my family standing on a really big hill ready to throw boxes of matzah up in the air. I'm down in the valley and have a really big canon. At some point I yell "Pull!" at the top of my lungs and as the boxes are in mid flight, I blow them up. You see, for me, after about three days of eating matzah, it's no longer a religious experience.

Right after I start cleaning up from the seders, I start preparing recipes (for breakfast, lunch and dinner) that don't use matzahs, matzah meal, matzah cake meal or even farfel. Some people embrace this stuff like manna, using it at every opportunity and every meal. I run screaming in the other direction.

Several weeks before Pesach (you know I have so much time while I'm cleaning my entire house from top to bottom and cooking for two seders of 30), I start pulling out all the recipes I clipped during the past year that I haven't had a chance to try yet. I keep these recipes for those times during chol hamo'ed when leftovers have lost their appeal and the only thing I (or my children) really want is something like a pizza or macaroni and cheese. (Ok, I lied, there may be a little matzah meal or farfel, but I promise it's the exception, not the rule).

BREAKFAST SMOOTHIE

1/2 cup orange juice
1 banana
6-7 frozen strawberries
4-5 slices frozen peaches
5-6 frozen blueberries
6-7 ice cubes
fresh mint (optional)
dash of nutmeg (optional)

Place all the ingredients except ice cubes in a blender. Puree until smooth. Add ice and puree again. Pour into a glass and sprinkle nutmeg on top and garnish with some fresh mint. Serves 2 or 3.

CONFETTI POTATOES

12 to 14 small unpeeled red potatoes, boiled and thick sliced
12 radishes, sliced
2 bunches green onions, sliced
12 baby carrots, sliced
2 stalks celery, sliced
2 tbsp. fresh parsley, chopped coarsely
2 jalapeno peppers, minced (optional)
2 tbsp. Passover mayonnaise
2 tbsp. Passover Italian salad dressing sugar or sweetener to taste
Pepper and salt to taste

In a medium bowl, after the potatoes are cooked, and while they are still warm, toss the slices in the Italian dressing. Let stand while mixing all the remaining vegetables together in another bowl. Add the potatoes and dressing to the vegetables. After they are mixed, add the mayonnaise, sugar and seasonings and toss to mix well. Serve warm or cold. Serves 4 to 6.

TUNA POTATO CHOWDER

2 1/2 cup potatoes, diced
2 cups pareve chicken broth
1/2 cup onions, chopped
1/4 tsp. sage
1/4 tsp. paprika
1/8 tsp. pepper
1/2 cup carrots, sliced
1/2 cup celery, sliced
1/2 cup green pepper, chopped
3 cup skim milk
6 oz. tuna in water, drained and flaked

In a large saucepan, combine 1 cup potatoes, pareve chicken broth, and onions. Bring the mixture to a boil. Reduce heat and cover. Simmer for 10 minutes or until the potatoes are tender. Add sage, paprika and pepper. When the potatoes are soft, mash potatoes. Add the remaining potatoes, carrots, green pepper, celery, and milk to mashed potatoes and broth. Bring just to a boil. Then reduce heat and simmer for 15 minutes or until vegetables are tender. Add tuna. Simmer 5 minutes more and serve. Serves 6 to 8.

LEMON PUDDING FOR PASSOVER

4 eggs
5 1/2 cups sugar
3 tbsp. potato starch
6 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 cups water

In a 1 1/2 quart saucepan or the top of a double boiler, beat the eggs well. In a small bowl combine the sugar and potato starch and gradually whisk them into the beaten eggs. Stir in the lemon juice and water. Then over low heat or over simmering water in the bottom of the double boiler, cook pudding mixture slowly, stirring constantly until the mixture is thickened and bubbles begin to appear. Remove from heat.

Pour or spoon into a dessert cup or Pesach pie shell. Set the pudding aside to cool slightly before serving or refrigerate until ready to serve.

PASSOVER ICE CREAM TORTE WITH STRAWBERRY SAUCE

1/2 gallon kosher for Passover vanilla ice cream
1 pt. heavy cream
1/2 cup orange juice
1 10 oz. can of macaroons
1 cup sliced fresh strawberries
1/2 cup slivered almonds
Sauce
2 1/2 cups fresh strawberries chopped
1 tbsp. sugar or honey
8 tsp. orange juice

Soften the ice cream. Whip the heavy cream in a mixing bowl until it forms firm peaks. In a small bowl crumble the macaroons. Mix the ice cream, cream and macaroons together with the orange juice and 1 cup fresh strawberries. Pour the mixture into a 10 inch springform pan. Smooth the top evenly. Sprinkle with almonds. PASSOVER SALMON QUICHE

15 ounces canned salmon
3 eggs
1 cup sour cream
¼ cup Passover mayonnaise
1½ oz. shredded cheddar cheese
1 tbsp. grated onions
¼ tsp. dill
¼ cup almond slivers
¼ cup shredded cheddar cheese
2 tbsp. Passover mayonnaise

Preheat oven to 325. Prepare a quiche or pie pan with oil or baking spray. Drain the salmon and save the liquid in a measuring cup. Add water to the liquid to make ½ cup. Flake the salmon and remove skin and bones. Mix together the eggs, sour cream, mayonnaise and salmon liquid. Stir in salmon, ½ cup cheese, onion, and dill. Transfer to baking pan. Sprinkle with ¼ cup cheese and almonds. Bake for 45 minutes, or until quiche is firm in center. Serves 6-8.

Women's seder set for Victoria

By SUZANNE KORT
Pacific Correspondent

Out of the Sea of Reeds, the Victoria women's seder emerges onto new ground.

The seventh annual women's seder will be held April 15 at 5:30 p.m. at the Jewish Community Centre of Victoria (JCCV), 3636 Shelbourne Ave.

The popular event has all the ingredients of a traditional seder with a few added twists. For example, Elijah's cup of wine is accompanied by Miriam's cup of water. And an onion, the symbol of women's many-layered collective history, appears on the seder plate along with the parsley and horseradish.

Seder participants explore Pesach themes from a woman's perspective, with new ideas added each year to enhance participation. In past years, topics have included righteous women (both the famous and the ones next door), agunot (women whose husbands deny them a religious divorce) and a Kabbalistic version of the counting of the Omer (the days between Passover and Shavuot).

The theme this year is life transitions. Tables will be marked by transitional moments in areas such as work, relationships, spirit or relocation. Participants will be asked to seat themselves according to where they are emerging, as the ancient Israelites emerged from their own Sea of Reeds.

The Women's Seder Hagaddah, originally compiled in Victoria seven years ago, will be revised for the occasion.

Tickets, available at Congregation Emanu-El Synagogue or the JCCV, are $7 and should be purchased in advance to determine what vegetarian dish to bring to the potluck meal. Call 250-388-6840 for more information.

Luscious sorbets offer a refreshing treat

After the heavy Pesach meals, a light dessert hits the spot. Metropolitan Ice Cream, whose fruit sorbets and ice creams are Kosher for Pesach under the supervision of the Kashruth Council, sends along these luscious and elegant sorbet recipes. They are great as desserts or palette cleansers.

BUMBLEBERRY SORBET

Puree – 875g each of strawberries, blueberries, blackberries and raspberries. Strain.

Syrup – 1300g sugar, 1.5 litres water

Bring water to a boil and add sugar. Bring the mixture back to a boil. Cool and let sit overnight. Mix puree with syrup and add the juices of 1 lemon and 1 orange. Follow manufacturer's instructions for use of ice cream maker. Makes approximately a 5-lire batch.

BLOOD ORANGE SORBET

Puree – 3 litres blood oranges.

Squeeze and strain fruit. Add sugar to obtain desired sweetness

Put the above mixture in and follow manufacturer's instructions for use of ice cream maker.

If a commercial ice cream maker is not available, try the following old-fashioned method of creating the above flavors.

Stir the mixture by hand in a suitable container, then put the open container into your freezer. Check mixture and when a little bit frozen, bring out and restir again. Place open container back in the freezer. Repeat this process (approximately four times), until the entire batch is frozen, this should give you a smooth fruit sorbet, and will avoid creating an icy batch. Makes approximately a 3-litre batch.

A MEDIEVAL GERMAN SEDER

The scene depicted in this lavishly illustrated page from a medieval German Haggadah is paradoxical. On the one hand, we see the a festive table and a family dressed in holiday clothing. On the other hand, however, we see a family that appears not to be at ease. The expressions on the faces of the subjects in the painting are unsmiling, almost worried. Participants appear to be casting a sideward glance, expectant perhaps of sad or unpleasant tidings. [From In The Jewish Tradition, J. B. Fellner, Jonathan David Publishers, Inc. 1995]

ONE OF THE MOST POIGNANT OF ALL HOLIDAY MOMENTS

Imre Szigets's pencil drawing captures one of the most poignant of all holiday moments, namely, the time when the woman or women of the household usher in the arrival of the holiday with the lighting of the candles. It is an ancient, widely accepted custom to cover the eyes while reciting the blessing. Many women also cover their heads for the ceremony. [From Jewish Liturgy, R. Posner, U. Kaploun, S. Low fat Pesach foods easy to prepare

By JANICE ROTMAN
Special to The CJN

Low fat Passover food can be easy to prepare, delicious to eat and lovely in its presentation. All you need to create a beautiful low fat Pesach is a little imagination coupled with the knowledge of some simple low fat rules.

This was the message conveyed by Noreen Gilletz, cookbook writer extraordinaire, at a cooking demonstration held recently at the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue, sponsored by the Netivot Hatorah Jewish Day School Parents' Association.

"There are no such things as bad foods. There are only good foods ...although some foods are more good while others aren't quite as good," Gilletz said.

The trick for Passover, as for the rest of the year, she added, is to moderate eating, to cut down but not to eliminate some of the foods that are less good for us. This is not about depriving ourselves at all! It's about eating tasty, filling food that helps us to live a healthier life.

Traditional Pesach cooking has tended to emphasize many eggs and lots of oil, both high in undesirable fats, but if recipes are modified to concentrate on healthy eating, you will get equal taste with fewer fat calories.

A recipe calling for two eggs can be modified to include one egg plus two egg whites without changing the taste of the food. Where a really good, non-stick fry pan is not available, one tablespoon of oil can always replace the two traditionally found in the cookbook and still do an equally good job of frying or sauteing. A baking recipe asking for 1/4 cup of oil to complete a crisp, for example, might be modified to include only two tablespoons of oil and two tablespoons of apple juice or water. Instead of oiling them, cooking and baking pans can be coated with one of the cooking sprays that are currently being sold for Pesach.

Placing emphasis on eating fruits, vegetables

As is the case for the rest of the year, one should place an emphasis on eating more fruits and vegetables and cutting down on the size of portions of meat and fish (to approximately the size of the palm of an adult hand). In order to help us reduce salt intake and to add new and interesting tastes to our live, nutritionists and doctors suggest using a multitude of herbs and spices available year round both in fresh and dried versions. Besides being tasty, a number of these, garlic chief among them, are said to have additional health benefits. We are also encouraged to seriously increase our intake of cold water to 6 to 8 glasses per day.

The essential thing is to strive for balance and variety and to eat what pleases you. "Don't eat what you don't like" Gilletz cautioned. Remember, too, that your health at Passover and year round depends on more than what you cook and what you eat; it extends to how you live and what you do with your non-eating time.

Gilletz will be appearing again on April 6 at 7:30 p.m. at the City Playhouse in Thornhill, under the auspices of Jewish Women International. For more information, call 631-6321.

ITALIAN CHICKEN

(Adapted from Second Helpings Please*)*

2 onions, sliced
2 medium green peppers, sliced
3 lb. broiler, cut in eighths
1 clove garlic, minced
1/4 tsp. oregano
1 1/2 c. tomato juice
2 bay leaves

Put the vegetables in the bottom of a roasting pan. Rub the garlic and the oregano under the skin of the chicken pieces (the skin will help keep the meat moist while adding very little fat) and add to the roaster. Pour the juice over the chicken. Add the bay leaves, cover and bake at 350 for 1 1/2 hours. Remove the skin before serving.

SPRING CARROTS WITH THYME HONEY

(Adapted from Globe and Mail Gusto magazine)

2 lbs. small carrots with tops
2 tbsp. honey
1 tsp. chopped fresh thyme.

Peel carrots and trim edges of tops, leaving 1/2 inch long green portion on the end. Combine honey and thyme. Place carrots in cold salted water and cook until just tender; remove carrots from water and combine with honey, tossing until coated.

PASSOVER VEGETARIAN KISHKE

(From The Lowfat Jewish Cookbook by Debra Wasserman)

4 stalks celery, chopped
2 carrots, grated
2 onions, peeled and minced
2 cups water
1 tsp. salt
4 cups matzah meal
1 tbsp. paprika
2 tsp. garlic powder
1/4 tsp. pepper
1/4 cup oil

Preheat oven to 350. Mix all the ingredients together in a large bowl. Spoon 1/4 of mixture onto a large piece of aluminum foil. Roll mixture into an 8-inch cylinder. Do the same with the remaining mixture to form four 8-in. cylinders. Place cylinders on cookie sheet and bake at 350 for 45 minutes. Turn cylinders over and bake 45 minutes longer. Remove foil and serve kishke sliced and warm.

Passover Foods

Healthy fare offered in Gilletz's new cookbook

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Noreen Gilletz has done it again. The writer of Second Helpings, Please, The Pleasures of Your Food Processor, and Microways, all staples of the Jewish kitchen, has just produced her latest effort, MealLeaniYumm, (Gourmania, Inc., 4001 Bayview Ave., # 414, Toronto, M2M 3Z7, 1998).

And it's every bit as terrific as her earlier books – healthy, too.

As always, her recipes use readily available ingredients in innovative ways, and described with humor. "Dracula Chicken," for instance, is made spicy with coarse steak spices, paprika, basil and onions (although not, as one might expect, garlic); vegetables are roasted with balsamic vinegar, meringue shells are livened up with mango frozen low-fat yogurt.

Most recipes come with extensive variations, not just the obvious, such as substituting strawberry gelatin for lemon in Blima Posluns' Lemon Mousse, but, for instance, adding cranberry juice to cabbage soup.

Each recipe lists nutritional information. Especially helpful at this time of year, Gilletz suggests ways to adapt for Pesach rules. You can make New-Fashioned Cabbage Rolls in Cranberry Sauce with white sugar instead of brown [if you can't find Pesach brown sugar]; matzah meal instead of bread crumbs; farfel instead of rice.

There is an extensive selection of vegetarian offerings, salads and pastas.

Although Gilletz has a holiday section, including Pesach recipes, here are a few examples of regular recipes that can be used during the holiday.

COUNTRY VEGETABLE SOUP

1 large onion, chopped
1 stalk celery, chopped
1 large leek, thinly sliced
1 tbsp. oil, opt.
1 tbsp. water
2 medium potatoes, peeled and chopped
2 large carrots, peeled and chopped
1 medium zucchini, chopped
1 cup broccoli or cauliflower, cut up
28 oz. can tomatoes (low-sodium)
4 cups hot water
2 tsp. salt
freshly ground pepper, to taste
½ tsp. dried thyme
½ tsp. dried basil
2 tbsp. fresh parsley, minced

Heat 1 tbsp. oil in a large soup pot. Add onion, celery and leeks. Saute for 7 to 8 minutes, until golden. Add water as needed to prevent sticking. Add remaining ingredients except parsley. Bring to a boil and simmer covered until veggies are tender, about 35 to 40 minutes. Adjust seasonings to taste. Garnish with parsley. Serves 7 to 8.

ARLENE'S CHICKEN LATKES

2 cloves garlic
1 medium onion, cut into chunks
2 carrots, cut into chunks
1 medium potato, peeled and cut into chunks
½ cup matzah meal
1 egg, or 2 egg whites
1 lb. lean ground chicken
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
½ tsp. dried basil

Preheat oven to 425. Drop garlic through feed tube of processor while machine is running. Process until minced. Add onion, carrots and potato; process until finely minced. Empty into a large mixing bowl. Add matzah meal. Add remaining ingredients and mix gently to blend. Mixture will be quite soft.

Wet your hands and form mixture into 8 large patties. Arrange in a single layer on a lightly sprayed non-stick baking sheet. Bake at 425 about 15 minutes, until browned on the bottom. Turn patties over and bake 10 minutes more, until nicely browned on both sides. Do not overbake.

These reheat and/or freeze well. Serve hot or at room temperature. Great with salsa. Makes 8 latkes.

AN OPPENHEIM SEDER NIGHT

The children in this drawing by Moritz Oppenheim entitled Seder Night are already a little sleepy. The master of the house is dressed in his High Holy Day kitel, a widespread custom among some communities, in order to add to the festive air of the occasion. One of the participants is opening the door. This likely means the family has reached either the part of seder at which Elijah the Prophet is invited to enter the home, or perhaps merely the end of the seder. [From Jewish Liturgy, R. Posner, U. Kaploun, S. Cohen Editors, L. Amiel Publisher, Keter Publishing House, 1975]

Simkin aims to keep NCJW relevant to women

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

VANCOUVER — Hinda Simkin has a first-hand understanding of the time crunch facing volunteers today. The national president of National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) is married with three grown daughters and two small grandsons, and works full time as executive director of the Volunteer Grandparents Society of B.C.

"As far as I can see [NCJW] is still very relevant, but the way we do things may have to change. The lives of women have certainly changed," said Simkin, 60, who succeeded Sharon Wolchock of Winnipeg as president in September.

Hinda Simkin

Speaking by phone to The CJN in Toronto, she said the organization needs to allow women to "move in and out, and have support so they can use their skills. Our jobs may be shared, and of shorter duration."

When Simkin joined Council 35 years ago in Edmonton, she was the mother of twin babies and anxious for adult conversation.

A project within an emergency shelter for children was her first NCJW taste of community service.

During her childhood in McBride, B.C. (a logging town between Jasper and Prince George), Simkin learned what it meant to be community minded.

"My parents were very active in the community," she recalled. She remembers her father, Sam Arbour, risking his own safety to bring food to the community when floods washed out the railway.

"My parents taught us that if good people were good people, it didn't matter what their religious affiliations were. We learned to respect everybody."

Simkin's parents kept her Jewish connection alive with the help of annual visits to her grandparents in Winnipeg. Prince George, where the family moved when Simkin was in high school, had a small but functioning Jewish community.

After high school, Simkin studied economics and sociology at the University of British Columbia, where she graduated in 1960.

For Simkin, NCJW has met some of her need for community involvement and a Jewish connection.

Her other community activities have included service as a Brownie leader, as a youth council adviser at Vancouver's Jewish Community Centre and as vice-president of Jewish Family Service Agency. She has also been involved with, among other organizations, the United Way, Leadership Vancouver (a program sponsored by Volunteer Vancouver and the Vancouver Board of Trade) and the Vancouver Art Gallery.

At NCJW, there are two areas of priority right now, Simkin said. It was decided at the organization's biennal convention last fall that NCJW would focus on child poverty (advocacy and social action) and women's issues such as health concerns and prevention of family violence.

In Vancouver, for example, Council is co-sponsoring bone marrow testing , Simkin said. She mentioned a string of initiatives across the country, ranging from a kosher shelter in Montreal to upcoming Tay-Sachs testing clinics in Winnipeg and Vancouver.

As national president, Simkin sees her role as "finding the right people and helping provide the glue to keep everyone on track. It's very exciting. I think we have a wonderful team, and we very much work as a team."

They stay in touch "with great difficulty," she laughed. Increasingly, executive members are relying on e-mail.

Simkin wants people to know about Council's involvement in the general community. "I think you need to give whatever you can in terms of time and effort. It's not just money. I think you really need to have some passion for your community. I think it pays off."

In wartime, NCJW gave the Canadian Red Cross nine mobile blood clinics, Simkin noted. The group also pioneered the concept of golden age clubs in Canada, she added.

As president, Simkin is a representative of the Canadian Commission of UNESCO, sub-commission on the Status of Women. Recently she visited Ottawa in that capacity.

In addition to the day-to-day business of NCJW, Simkin wants to make a point of involving younger women and new retirees in the organization. Her three daughters are all members.

Through her national work, she has found that Jewish women "have the same concerns across the country. We really do share a great deal."

אין זיין לעבן איז זאָלצבערג געווען אַן עדות פון טראַגישן, אומ-גליבלעכן חורבן, וואָס האָט אויסגעשאָכטן אַ דריטל פון אונדזער פֿאָלק – דעם סאַמע פרודוקטיוון סטיל. ער איז אירך געווען אַן עדות פון ווידער-אויפבלי פון יידישע האָפענונגען אין דער באַנייטער מדינת-ישראל, וואָס ער האָט געהאָלטן נאָענט און טייער.

י. ב. זאָלצבערג האָט זיך געחברט מיט אַלע שיכטן פון פֿאָלק, מיט גבירים און מיט קבצנים, מיט הויבגעשטויגענע גדולים און מיט עמך, מיט תּלמידי-חכמים און מיט עמי-הארצים, מיט פריַיע און מיט פרומע. דאָס איז געווען אַ טייל פון זיין גליבן אין עם-אחד, אין יידישן אחדות.

זאָלצבערגן איז געגעבן געוואָרן די זכיה פון אָריכת-ימים. ער האָט דערגרייכט אַ הויכן עלטער, אַ מצווה וואָס איז געגעבן געוואָרן זייער וויניקע מענטשן. אָבער ער האָט פשר אויסגעגעבן אט-דעם גשאַנק לטובת זיינע מיטמענטשן אויפן בעסטן און נוצלעכסטן אופן.

כבוד זיין אָנדענק!

Debate over academic freedom raised in CJC

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A dispute involving questions of academic freedom has erupted within Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) over the prudence of CJC denouncing the Federal Justice Department War Crimes Unit's chief historian for appearing in the same book as a harsh critic of Israel.

At a recent meeting of CJC's national executive committee, Bernie Farber, executive director of CJC's Ontario region, defended Congress' denunciation of Ruth Bettina Birn, a respected German-born Canadian scholar of Nazi war crimes.

Birn has come under attack by Congress for allowing an article of hers to appear in the same book – A Nation on Trial: The Goldhagen Thesis and Historical Truth – that includes an article by Hunter College political scientist Norman Finkelstein.

Finkelstein, whose parents are Holocaust survivors, has equated the Israeli treatment of Palestinians with the Nazi persecution of Jews, although no such comparisons are made in A Nation on Trial.

Finkelstein has also accused American Jews of creating a "Holocaust Studies Industry" to justify Israel's "repressive policies."

But an academic and member of CJC's national executive who does not share Finkelstein's Nazi analogy – Thomas Kuttner – is taking issue with CJC's handling of the controversy, maintaining that CJC's intervention is not serving the interests of the Jewish community and that principles of academic freedom are being put at risk.

A Nation on Trial... is slated for imminent release in Canada and takes a critical look at the controversial thesis of Harvard professor Daniel Goldhagen in his book, Hitler's Willing Executioners, that "ordinary Germans" were as responsible for the Holocaust as the Nazis were.

But Congress is not taking issue with the contents of the book. What is disturbing Congress is that a senior government official is appearing in the same book as Finkelstein. CJC president Goldie Hershon made that abundantly clear in January when, in a publicly issued release, she stated:

"We find it quite extraordinary that a senior public servant would publicly engage in this debate and in such a disreputable association.

"We draw the line at those (like Finkelstein) who obscenely compare Israel to the Nazis and we question Ms. Birn's judgment in associating herself with him at a time when her unit is very much under scrutiny for the job it has done. Anti-Semites and Holocaust deniers are already jumping on her bandwagon."

Since then, however, the war crimes unit has so far refused to intervene on the issue of Birn sharing the pages of the book with Finkelstein.

And now CJC's own position is being questioned from within.

In several missives between Kuttner and Farber after CJC put out its release, Kuttner wrote that, "this entire affair shames me as a Jew and academic."

Kuttner, also a member of CJC's national community relations committee, worried as far back as last October that any attempt by Congress to raise the issue of Birn publishing with Finkelstein would risk stifling "freedom of inquiry and expression that are central to scholarly debate and civil discourse."

Farber was quoted as criticizing Birn for showing a lack of "understanding" and "sensitivity" to Jewish community concerns, which Birn has said "hurt and offended" her. Kuttner pointed out that Birn, who has worked in the war crimes unit since 1991, has spent "her entire professional life...in the pursuit of Nazi war criminals both in the United States and Canada."

Farber, in a January letter to Kuttner released at the meeting, described Finkelstein as an anti-Zionist polemicist who has gone over the top consistently comparing Israel to the Nazi regime and the Israeli armed forces to the Gestapo.

"Ms. Birn's decision to associate herself with such an individual... is simply unacceptable and we have to take a stand."

Farber goes on to say that "many civil servants" he spoke to "have indicated shock and surprise over what Ms. Birn has done," and argues that it was in the context of CJC's mandate to "protect the interests of the Jewish community" that it intervened.

At the executive meeting, the debate spilled out into the open.

Kuttner said that CJC's actions have not served the interests of the Jewish community.

Birn is "not anti-Zionist and not some sort of Anti-Semite," he said, and appearing to "taint" her that way through her association with Finkelstein smacks of "McCarthyism."

"This will work in our disinterest," Kuttner said.

Farber contended that it was CJC's duty, "to draw the line at comparing Israel with the Nazi state, the IDF with Gestapo agents."

Swiss settlement bid raises many questions

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

An agreement by Switzerland's three biggest banks to negotiate a global settlement of Holocaust-era claims marks a partial breakthrough, but it leaves many thorny issues unresolved.

Commentary

The settlement, to be worked out in coming months, would involve a compensation fund for Holocaust survivors to cover all victims' assets that ended up in Swiss banks, and possibly other assets as well.

But in the days since a possible settlement was announced last week, it has become clear that the devil will be in the details of the agreement to be reached – and there are indications that Switzerland and Jewish groups are poised for a major conflict.

The agreement to negotiate a settlement was reached after months of intensive bargaining involving the World Jewish Congress (WJC), lawyers who have filed a multi-billion-dollar class-action lawsuit on behalf of Holocaust victims and their heirs, and representatives of Credit Suisse, Swiss Bank Corp. and Union Bank of Switzerland. The bargaining was conducted under the aegis of Stuart Eizenstat, U.S. undersecretary of state for economic affairs.

At issue are claims for dormant bank accounts, Nazi-looted gold that was purchased by the Swiss central bank, Swiss companies that benefitted from slave labor during World War II and stolen artworks that wound up in Switzerland.

But it remains unclear whether the Swiss banks will negotiate regarding anything except the dormant accounts.

An agreement to seek a settlement finally came in a dramatic turnabout March 26, just minutes before U.S. public finance officials meeting in New York were set to recommend a boycott of Swiss banks after the March 31 expiration of a moratorium on such punitive measures.

A first round of talks regarding a settlement is scheduled to take place April 24.

New York City Comptroller Alan Hevesi, who is leading the panel of U.S. public finance officials, said a final deal could be worked out within 90 days of that session.

But in the wake of last week's accord, confusion abounds as to what exactly has been agreed to, and how things will progress from here.

In a letter to WJC Secretary-General Israel Singer, the chief executives of the three banks said the talks aim for "an honorable and moral conclusion through a global resolution of Holocaust-era issues directly related to our banks."

But WJC officials see last week's accord as an agreement in principle with the Swiss to negotiate a settlement to all Holocaust-era claims – not just an agreement with the banks on settling bank-related matters.

"There is a whole array of Holocaust-related claims that we want satisfied," said Elan Steinberg, the WJC's executive director. "How the Swiss choose to deal with that internally is for them to decide."

But the banks insisted following last week's meeting that only claims against banks themselves will be on the table.

Last week's agreement provides a framework "to go ahead and discuss details of the bank-related issues. It is not a global settlement in the common sense of the word," a spokesperson in Switzerland for Credit Suisse was quoted as saying.

The agreement does not involve the Swiss National Bank – Switzerland's central bank – or the Swiss government, which informed the banks last week that they are on their own in seeking a global settlement of Holocaust survivors' claims.

Indeed, Swiss politicians have been at pains to state that a settlement would not involve Swiss taxpayers' moneys or the reserves of the Swiss National Bank.

Jewish officials in Switzerland, however, are expecting their government to offer compensation on one issue – the treatment of Jewish refugees during the war. Switzerland expelled more than 30,000 Jews during the war, most of whom died.

At the same time, however, Switzerland provided haven to some 25,000 Jewish refugees, who survived the war together with Switzerland's 20,000 Jewish citizens.

But those refugees were accepted on condition that Jewish groups pay in advance for their support – a sum that is estimated at some $40 million.

This policy did not extend to the 300,000 non-Jewish refugees who flocked to Switzerland and whose needs were paid for by the wartime Swiss government.

"We are expecting some compensation" from the government regarding the refugee issue, said Thomas Lyssy, vice president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Switzerland. In the global settlement negotiations, the Swiss government's involvement is likely to be key in arriving at a final settlement of claims that remain beyond the purview of the banks.

But a spokesperson for the Swiss Embassy in Washington said the Swiss government is "not involved and does not intend to be involved" in the settlement talks.

For now, this would appear to leave the banks negotiating with Jewish representatives on a settlement to only one component of the larger series of claims stemming from Switzerland's wartime activities.

"If they only agree to a partial settlement, they have partial closure," Steinberg said.

Other Jewish officials had a sober reaction to last week's developments.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles, characterized the agreement as a "small step" forward.

In Israel, Avraham Burg, chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel, said the agreement would not satisfy Holocaust survivors.

"The principles in the agreement may be acceptable to the U.S. government, but they are contrary to the interests of the survivors," Burg said in a statement.

As for the amount of any settlement, the banks, WJC officials and lawyers representing Holocaust survivors in a $20 billion class-action lawsuit filed in New York have not reached a consensus, though some sources have said it could range between $1 billion and $3 billion.

Ne'eman optimistic on unity

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The conversion crisis in Israel is well on its way to being resolved.

This was the assessment offered this week by the Israeli minister who heads a government-appointed committee that spent seven months seeking a compromise that would be acceptable to the three main streams of Judaism.

But according to non-Orthodox leaders, Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman is being overly optimistic – and it is unclear exactly how he intends to have his committee's recommendations implemented.

In late January, the Ne'eman Committee presented to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu a proposal intended to give the non-Orthodox streams – who are seeking to break the Orthodox monopoly over conversions performed in Israel – a role in performing conversions that would be officially recognized by the Jewish state.

According to the proposal, an interdenominational conversion institute would be established under the auspices of the Jewish Agency for Israel, while leaving the actual conversion process under the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate's control.

Speaking with reporters Monday in New York, Ne'eman said a team had been created to implement the committee's recommendations. He added that a budget was now being created for the team, which would work with the Jewish Agency to establish the conversion institute, and with the Chief Rabbinate to establish additional conversion courts.

The committee's proposal has been endorsed by the Knesset.

But the rabbinate's stance has been far less clear.

The Chief Rabbinate Council, in a unanimous decision issued last month, pledged to set up more religious courts to handle conversions.

But the council declined to address the crucial part of the proposal – the creation of the joint institute to prepare candidates for conversion.

Ne'eman reiterated Monday that the Chief Rabbinate had not been asked to vote on the institute.

And this presumably meant that implementation of the Ne'eman Committee's proposal could proceed without any hindrance.

Indeed, Ne'eman's carefully chosen comments were those of a person seeking to prevent anyone from rocking the boat.

"Anyone who challenges [the Ne'eman Committee's recommendations] will be challenging the unity of the Jewish nation," the minister said, seeking to put an end to months of controversy.

But non-Orthodox leaders are crying foul.

They are still irked by a Chief Rabbinate statement issued last month, which, without referring to the non-Orthodox movements explicitly, blasted "those who are trying to shake the foundations of the Jewish religion, causing rifts among the people and causing them to stray from the generations-old heritage.

"The sages of Israel have barred any cooperation with them and their methods, and no one should consider establishing joint institutions with them," the statement added.

To the non-Orthodox streams, this was a straightforward condemnation of the conversion institute – and they therefore wonder how the Ne'eman Committee's proposal can be implemented.

"It is an utter absurdity," Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Reform movement's Union of American Hebrew Congregations, said in an interview. "The Chief Rabbinate rejected the proposal at length. The notion that you can go ahead and implement the plan in the absence of the rabbinate makes no sense."

A similar viewpoint was offered by Conservative Rabbi Reuven Hammer, who served on the Ne'eman Committee.

He accused the committee of playing "let's pretend that the rabbinate did not reject" its proposal.

Meanwhile, Israel's High Court of Justice on Sunday postponed again a hearing on a petition to recognize Conservative conversions of adopted children. The court accepted the state's argument that the Ne'eman Committee should be given time to implement its recommendations. The hearing was postponed until April 20.

In Yoffie's view, the court's postponement reflected the true agenda behind Ne'eman's claim that his committee's proposal would soon be implemented.

"They are using [the claim] in the courts to say, 'Don't rule because we are handling the matter ourselves,'" said Yoffie.

Pullout talks stall on reciprocity

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — U.S. envoy Dennis Ross failed to pin down during talks here the size of the redeployment on the West Bank due to an impasse over the issue of Palestinian reciprocity.

Israel expects the Palestinian Authority (PA) to respond to the pullback from parts of the West Bank with a concomitant implementation of its undertakings on security matters.

David Bar-Illan, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's communications adviser, said the third round of talks with Ross focused on Israel's security requirements and the reciprocity issue.

But he lamented that PA Chairman Yasser Arafat "did not give Ross an answer" to that question.

No further meetings were scheduled with Arafat.

"Without reciprocity, there can be no talk of percentages," Bar-Illan said.

A senior government official denied that a special committee has been set up to demarcate future boundaries between Israel and the PA when the final-status talks are conducted. "The idea was discussed, but there was no decision," the official said.

At the weekly cabinet meeting, Netanyahu reported on his first two meetings with Ross, stressing that a percentage was not discussed at either session.

Instead, he said, the talks focused on the requisite conditions for continuing the peace process. The overriding issue was reciprocity.

He said Israel insists on fulfillment of the Palestinians' obligations in accordance with the "Letter for the Record" appended to the Hebron Agreement.

"We demand a clear linkage between the phases of withdrawal and the implementation of the Palestinians' commitments," he said.

He said Israel is holding to the view that it has the sole prerogative to determine the extent of the IDF's projected redeployment in terms of its security requirements.

National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon warned the cabinet that a pullback of more than 9 percent would cause grave damage to Israel's security.

He added that a withdrawal from 6 percent of the territory was really the limit beyond which security would be impaired. However, he went on, since a 9 percent pullback has already been discussed in Washington it could be implemented, "in view of the bind the government has gotten itself into. Anything beyond that would do grave harm to security."

He proposed that reciprocity be implemented in conjunction with the proposals for phased withdrawal, that is, for each sector evacuated by the IDF, the Palestinians perform a specific deed, such as reducing the numbers of their police force and ultimately abrogating the Palestinian Covenant.

Interfaith contacts continue despite Vatican document

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The Vatican's recent document on the Holocaust and a series of meetings it hosted last week with Jewish leaders show how far relations between the two faiths have come in recent years – but also how far they have to go.

Opinion

In an audience last week with Pope John Paul II, and in discussions with senior Vatican officials, an international group of Jewish leaders bluntly conveyed their disappointment with We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah, saying the document assessing the Roman Catholic Church's behavior during World War II "did not go far enough."

But the same meetings underscored the unflagging momentum in Jewish-Catholic contacts and raised the possibility for the first time that the Vatican archives from the Holocaust period may eventually be opened to study, as Jews have long demanded.

"There was such honesty and frankness in our meetings that it augurs well for Jewish-Catholic dialogue," Rabbi Marc Schneier, a participant in the talks, said in an interview.

"It's come a long way since 1965," Rabbi Schneier added, referring to the year when the Vatican issued its landmark Nostra Aetate declaration, which repudiated the concept of Jewish guilt for Jesus' death and called for mutual respect and dialogue between Catholics and Jews.

The meetings last week of the International Catholic-Jewish Liaison Committee – the first session of the joint group in four years – had been scheduled long before the Vatican issued its document on the Holocaust March 16. But its release may have been timed to enable the document to become the centrepiece of the high-level formal discussions.

The sessions were described as "intense but not contentious" by B'nai Brith's international president, Tommy Baer, who also participated in the talks.

Another who took part in the talks, Rabbi A. James Rudin, pointed to the joint communique issued after the discussion as evidence of significant progress on the part of the church. According to Rudin, who is interreligious affairs director of the American Jewish Committee, the statement calls for:

• the formation of a joint team of Catholic and Jewish scholars to "review the relevant material" in an 11-volume study of the church's behavior during the Holocaust produced by a Jesuit team of scholars between 1965 and 1981;

• the establishment of a working group to continue dialogue and to work toward implementing interfaith education around the world; and

• the transfer of a 23-foot-high cross at the site of the Auschwitz death camp to another location.

Religious symbols at Auschwitz have exacerbated tensions in Catholic-Jewish relations for more than a decade. The cross, which is the final religious symbol standing at the concentration camp, made news last week when Cardinal Jozef Glemp of Poland declared in a provocative March 22 sermon that the cross "has stood and will stand" at Auschwitz, despite commitments by the Polish government and other church officials that it would be removed.

"Many have not liked the Eiffel Tower, but it is not the reason to move it or tinker with it," said Cardinal Glemp, whose hard-line statements on symbols at Auschwitz have often outraged Jewish leaders.

Bishop Stanislaw Gadecki, chair of Poland's Catholic Church council for dialogue with Jews, who attended the Vatican talks last week, made it clear that Poland's Bishops Conference does not support Cardinal Glemp's unyielding stand.

The liaison committee's communique said: "We have learned about recent statements concerning the cross at the former Auschwitz convent and wish to express our deep concern and to appeal to all those involved to work together patiently in order to find an acceptable solution for the transfer of the cross to an appropriate alternative site."

"This is a very emotional issue," said Rabbi Rudin. "That a high-level group of Catholics would make this statement is a very important step."

The working group to implement interfaith education around the world will continue a process that began in 1971, when Jews and Catholics began meeting on an official basis.

But perhaps the most significant potential step forward is the formation of the Catholic-Jewish scholars team, to review documents on the Church's conduct during the Holocaust.

Jewish leaders have long called on the Vatican to open its archives so that the Church's wartime role could be studied more thoroughly. This demand has gained momentum since the release of the Vatican document on the Holocaust.

That document praised the wartime pope, Pius XII, for saving hundreds of thousands of Jewish lives "personally or through his representatives." But Jews and some Holocaust historians have long maintained that Pius XII remained silent in the face of Nazi genocide.

While the creation of the team of scholars falls far short of opening the Holocaust archives, the liaison committee held out the possibility that "if questions still remained," the team would "seek further clarification."

Rabbi Schneier called the move "quite a significant step."

So while Jewish leaders remain deeply disappointed by the Vatican document on the Holocaust, those involved in Catholic-Jewish dialogue appear to be taking the longer view, saying it should be seen as just one step by the Church toward reconciliation.

In the past 30-odd years, they say, the Church and this pope have gone a long way from blaming Jews collectively for the death of Jesus.

The Vatican's current tough stance on anti-Semitism is also a development since the 1965 document. That document merely "deplored" anti-Semitism. Current church teaching calls it an "offense against God and the Church."

In 1986, Pope John Paul II prayed in Rome's main synagogue, the first ever recorded visit of a pope to a synagogue.

In 1994, Israel and the Vatican established full diplomatic relations.

"With all of its flaws," said Rabbi Rudin, the document "could never have been issued 20 or 30 years ago."

War crimes unit report slammed

Fradkin said he brought "creativity, enthusiasm, dedication and persistence to all my cases...If being creative, dedicated and enthusiastic in fulfilling the mandate of bringing war criminals to justice is considered "obsessive" or "overzealous" then "I am proud to be described in such a manner." He pointed out those characteristics helped win the Jacob Luitjens deportation case, which, until one month ago, was the unit's only success at trial.

Hobson's criticism of the McCamus report was more direct. "I would say he called me a liar," Hobson said, referring to McCamus' refusal to accept at face value his description of Kremer's statement regarding Fradkin. Hobson said Kremer criticized Fradkin on the 'R' case by saying he was not objective because he was Jewish.

"My bottom line is what Kremer told me, that's what I stick by."

Hobson said he made "contemporaneous written notes" of that conversation but "as luck would have it, [the Justice Department] lost them."

Hobson said he initiated his own civil law suit in February to expose the inner workings of the war crimes unit. "I knew there was a whitewash at the time."

He described McCamus as "a member of the old boy school...who conducted a phone poll of Kremer's friends, Jews and non-Jews, to see if Kremer was the type of person to be anti-Jewish.

"I find the result and the six conclusions at the end [of the report] laughable," he said.

Hobson and Fradkin both criticized McCamus' information-gathering techniques, saying:

• many of his interviews were conducted by telephone;

• he never provided them with copies of statements made by others so they could respond to the statements and point out errors;

• those interviewed were not under oath;

• McCamus saw only those documents selected for him by others;

• he does not name those giving him statements.

"There are inherent limitations to this kind of procedure," said Fradkin, who is a senior counsel and civil litigator for the Justice Department.

Jack Silverstone, general counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the McCamus report "was surprisingly perhaps a little too unequivocal.

"With the greatest respect, there are still unanswered questions."

Silverstone pointed out that during Kremer's tenure as head of the war crimes unit "they closed case after case and opened almost no new ones. We never said anti-Semitism was a motivating factor but we still have serious questions about the dedication of the unit from 1990-95.

"We take Hobson and Fradkin seriously. While we certainly did not allege anti-Semitism for a course of inaction, the record speaks for itself." Following Kremer's departure, 14 cases were launched by the unit, he pointed out.

As far as Hobson is concerned, the controversy has not ended. He will be in court on May 12 to answer the government's motion to dismiss his civil action. "This is not the end of it," he said. "It's the start of a real inquiry."

Oldest synagogue unearthed

By ABRAHAM RABINOVICH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The oldest synagogue yet uncovered, a structure dating to about 75-50 BCE, has been excavated near Jericho.

Unearthed by archeologist Ehud Netzer of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in the Hasmonean winter palace complex near the banks of Wadi Kelt, the synagogue emerges onto the Jericho plain. It predates by more than 30 years the oldest previously known synagogue, at Gamla in the Golan Heights.

Netzer, who had excavated the palace in the decades after the Six Day War, returned to the site in January after an absence of 10 years. He found the synagogue beneath the ruins of a palace built by King Herod late in the first century BCE. The synagogue itself had been destroyed by an earthquake in 31 BCE.

Israel under pressure

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The Olso peace process, frozen for more than a year now, entered a fateful phase last week as U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross arrived in the region in what was described as a final attempt to break the deadlock between Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA).

The main purpose of his mission was to revive the moribund peace process by holding Israel to its pledge of making three further withdrawals from the West Bank during the interim period, in exchange for additional Palestinian efforts to deal with terrorism.

Israel, whose original withdrawal proposal was hotly rejected by the Palestinians last March as insignificant, was under pressure by the Clinton administration to acquiesce to a still unannounced American plan to relinquish a further 13 percent of the West Bank.

Hoping to nip it in the bud, Israel recently dispatched several emissaries to the United States, notably Cabinet secretary Danny Naveh and Trade and Industry Minister Natan Sharansky.

Two weeks ago, the Israeli cabinet rejected the U.S. blueprint as "unacceptable." Last week, after declaring that Israel alone would determine its "security needs" and accept no U.S. dictates, Netanyahu reiterated this position while offering the Palestinians greater territorial contiguity.

As these development unfolded, reports surfaced that Israel had caved in to U.S. pressure and was prepared to cede from 10 percent to 12 percent to the Palestinians. According to one account, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, in a meeting with Ross in Miami on the eve of his latest trip to the Middle East, was reported to have offered 11 percent. Previously, Israel had declared that a double-digit withdrawal would be out of the question.

At present, the PA, whose ultimate goal is a Palestinian state with East Jerusalem as its capital, is in full and partial control of 27 percent of the West Bank. The Palestinians are asking for 90 percent in advance of final status talks, a demand which clashes with Israel's apparent intention to retain from 53 percent to two-thirds of the West Bank.

It falls on Ross, a skillful mediator, to sort out conflicting claims and come up with a solution acceptable to both sides. If he fails, President Bill Clinton, upon his return from Africa, may go public with the U.S. plan and thus put Israel on the spot.

Since January 1997, when Israel redeployed from Hebron, there has been a lamentable absence of progress in implementing the provisions of the land-for-peace Olso accords. Israel and the PA blame each other for the impasse. Last week, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright warned that the peace process was fast petering out.

Israel accuses the Palestinians of not living up to their obligations to contain terrorism, squelch incitement and rewrite their national covenant so that it is free of inflammatory language.

The PA cites a litany of Israeli violations – from the failure to carry out withdrawals and of establishing a safe passage route from the West Bank to the Gaza Strip, to the provocation of expanding settlements and building the Har Choma housing project on land annexed in 1967.

Widely credited with working out the Hebron deal, Ross has tried without success since 1997 to bridge the gap in their respective positions. At the same time, Albright has called for a "timeout" in Israeli settlement activities and for far greater efforts by the PA to curb terrorism.

Much to Washington's growing frustration, the situation remains stalemated. In February and early March, under American auspices, Israeli and Palestinian diplomats focused their energies on four issues left over from the 1995 Oslo agreement: the establishment of a safe passage route, as well as the opening of a Palestinian airport, seaport and industrial park in Gaza.

The negotiators made little headway, and Israel later claimed that the PA had deliberately stonewalled in order to increase U.S. pressure on Israel. This may well yet happen if, as it seems, Ross goes home empty-handed once again.

Student wins silver

CAPETOWN, South Africa — Yahav Nussbaum, a Grade 12 student at Canadian Hadassah-WIZO Nahalal Youth Village, won the silver medal at this year's Computer Olympics held here.

Participants included 220 contestants from 65 countries. This is the first time that Israel has taken part.

Nussbaum is studying physics and computers at the Youth Village school, and is also taking courses at the Open University.

After winning a computer science competition in Israel recently, he was chosen to join three others to represent the State of Israel at the Computer Olympics.

The Canadian Hadassah-WIZO Nahalal Youth Village was founded in 1923 to teach young women immigrants the rudiments of agriculture. Today, it is a day and boarding school from grades 7 to 12, with a student body of close to 1,000. It is the Ministry of Education's Centre for Secondary Science Education in northern Israel.

Yahav Nussbaum

The school offers full matriculation in academic and technological streams. All pupils also receive full training in agriculture at the school's farm.

Jewish elder boom shape of things to come

TORONTO – What will Canada's health care system be like in the year 2020? Some experts believe we can get a preview just by looking at what's happening in urban Jewish communities across the country.

"Studies show that in some Canadian cities like Toronto, the elderly Jewish population has grown at nearly double the rate of the general elderly population," says Margaret MacAdam, a gerontologist and the senior vice-president of North York's Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"The health problems they face and the demands they place on our health care system are the shape of things to come for the rest of the country, which is expected to reach a similar situation around the year 2020."

The health care needs of Jewish seniors are no different than those of non-Jews, MacAdam explains.

But the much higher proportion of elderly women and men means the Jewish community is coping with a higher rate of age-related chronic and degenerative diseases – for example, Alzheimer's disease and other dementias, stroke, heart disease, cancer, arthritis, osteoporosis, and sensory impairments like hearing loss and blindness.

The current elder boom in the Jewish community is a direct result of post-war immigration to Canada, MacAdam explains. Young and middle-aged Jews who fled to Canada to escape Nazi persecution are now in their 80s and 90s.

Data drawn from the 1991 Canadian census shows that 7.4 percent of Jews living in the Greater Toronto Area are 75 or over, compared to just 3.9 percent of the non-Jewish population.

Other Jewish communities such as Montreal and Winnipeg have similarly high proportions of elderly people, according to an analysis of the data done by the McGill Consortium for Ethnicity and Strategic Social Planning.

The situation is already beginning to strain health care organizations including hospitals, nursing homes, and home care, plus the informal system of family caregivers, says Moshe Greengarten, Baycrest's vice-president, Public and Community Affairs.

"The Jewish community is experiencing a tremendous increase in demand for every type of service to the elderly," he says. "Health planners should take note so they can prepare for the national elder boom expected to hit the country in about 20 years."

What situations will communities face as the elderly population of Canada swells? Baycrest health planners have already noted certain trends and designed programs to meet the growing needs of Toronto's elderly Jewish community.

For example, many adult children live at some distance from their elderly parents. This makes it difficult for families to provide support to an elderly person during illness or stress.

But even if adult children and elderly parents live in the same community, says MacAdam, the children often find themselves squeezed between aging parents and the demands of their own careers and families.

Another trend is the aging of family caregivers. Many of the so-called 'old elderly' – those in their 90s and older – find they can no longer rely on their adult children who are themselves in their late 60s, 70s and even 80s, and experiencing their own health problems.

As parents and grandparents age, families often prefer to seek out ethnoculturally sensitive care.

"When you have faced active discrimination in your life, you want your elderly parents to be protected in older age," says MacAdam. "Many elderly Jews have strong memories of persecution, and are comforted by the knowledge that they are being cared for in a Jewish environment, including kosher food, access to religious service, and respect for traditions and holidays."

The demand for such care has been the driving force behind many organizations like Baycrest, which serves a largely Jewish community, and similar groups in Toronto's Italian, Greek and Chinese communities.

All these pressures have combined in the Jewish community, says Greengarten, resulting in a dramatic increase in demand for every type of geriatric health service.

There is also an ongoing need for institutional and supportive care, including longterm care beds and respite care.

New surgical procedure performed at JGH

MONTREAL — A new surgical procedure, known as endovascular repair of an aortic aneurysm has been performed successfully on three patients at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH).

This is the first time such a procedure has been carried out within the McGill University network of hospitals, and it has been done on only a few patients across Canada.

An abdominal aortic aneurysm refers to the ballooning of the main blood vessel in the abdomen. When it reaches a certain size (at least five centimetres in diameter) a surgical intervention is usually advised in order to prevent the potentially fatal risk of rupture.

The standard surgical procedure involves an incision on the abdomen, and possibly one incision on each side of the groin. It usually requires a two-day stay in the surgical intensive care unit (SICU), a three-to five-day period of fasting, and a seven-to 10-day recuperation period in the hospital.

In addition, a convalescence of at least six weeks is necessary before the patient is able to resume normal activities. Patients with serious medical problems may be excluded from this procedure because of the associated risks.

Dr. Normand Miller, chief of vascular surgery, says that with the new procedure, the surgeon makes one small incision on each side of the groin. In collaboration with a vascular radiologist, the aneurysm is excluded from the main circulation with a graft, using a technique involving X-ray and a TV monitor.

The advantages of this new procedure are that patients will feel less discomfort as there is no abdominal incision. They may commence eating a few hours after the operation; they may return home as early as the day following surgery; a stay in the Surgical Intensive Care Unit (SICU) is not required; and normal activities may be resumed within 10 days after surgery.

Patients with other serious medical problems are less likely to be excluded from this procedure.

Eligibility for endovascular repair of an aortic aneurysm (approximately 20 percent of patients) depends upon certain criteria which include the extent of the aneurysm as well as the size of the arteries above and below the aneurysm.

"While the cost to the system is $10,000 per graft, there are still substantial savings since the patient is discharged early from hospital, and the need for a stay in the SICU and a convalescent home is avoided," Miller said.

Chelm story a real delight

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Looking for something to do on chol hamoed, the middle days of Pesach? How about watching a wonderful new cartoon video, Aaron & The Book of Wonders (Alliance Video).

Aaron is a little boy who goes to live with his uncle, aunt and three cousins in Chelm, a city of fools. (The video shows that when G-d created the world, He sent angels to sprinkle qualities like wisdom over the people. The angel who was supposed to drop stupidity, made a mistake and dropped most of the supply of stupidity over the town of Chelm.)

And they were stupid. When Aaron's uncle, the beadle of the shul (a combination janitor and shammas) asks for a raise, since he has the extra mouth to feed (Aaron), the rabbi of the town tells him to marry off his daughters in order to have more money for the rest of the family. Of course, he doesn't mention where the poor uncle is supposed to find dowries for the three girls.

(You may know that in earlier times, a father had to give the man who married his daughter a sum of money, or farm animals, or something like that. That was called a dowry.)

The only thing of value in the town was The Book of Wonders, which had in it, among other things, instructions for bringing a golem, a creature made out of earth and water, to life.

When a wicked sorcerer steals the book, it is up to Aaron to get it back and save the town from being destroyed.

The story is told with very funny parts, beautiful music and really cute characters. You will especially enjoy Aaron's pet goat, Zlata, who wears granny glasses, and the horse that wears payos, the sidelocks worn by some very Orthodox Jews.

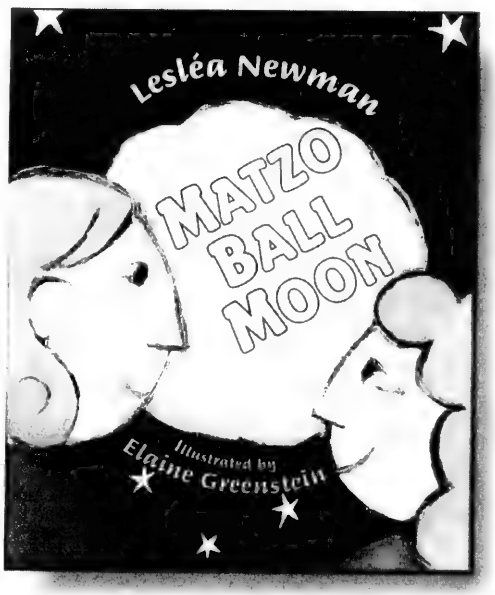
Book illustrates family holiday togetherness

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



One of the best parts of Pesach for kids is spending time with their family, taking part in the preparations, talking about what Pesach was like when they were little, and sharing the excitement of the holiday.

Leslea Newman has written a wonderful book, about a little girl who loves to help her grandmother, and who finds out that Pesach really is a time of marvels. You will enjoy Matzo Ball Moon (Clarion Books, 1998, with illustrations by Elaine Greenstein.)

Eleanor loved to help her grandmother make matzah balls for the seder. She helped her mix the ingredients, and form the dough into matzah balls. She even got to be the first person to taste them.

They were so good, that everyone in the family snuck "just one" to taste. And then "just one" to keep them going until the meal. Just guess what happened to the batch of matzah balls when it was finally time to eat them!

Eleanor was surprised to find, as you will be, just where the last matzah ball ended up.

One of the best parts of the book is that it shows how a family enjoys being with each other at holiday time.

Matzo Ball Moon is intended for children from five to eight, but younger ones will enjoy having the story read to them, and looking at the beautiful pictures.

Best friends put heads together, launch own Web design company

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Of course kids are great at computers. Better than their parents even. But you already knew that.

But are you as good as Jason Landau, Jeff Strauss and Jamie Abrams? The "three J's" are Jewish teens in Thornhill who are so techno-talented, they've launched their own company, one that builds custom-designed Internet Web sites.

Anyone familiar with the Internet knows that a Web site – basically a location on which companies and people can post pictures, words, music…anything they want – can be cool or a dud. It's the task of Jason, Jeff and Jamie to make sure that a site is not only cool, but informative as well.

With help from their parents, they've launched Web Visions, a legally registered company that will help spruce up existing sites, or create new ones. They charge up to $400 to build a basic site from scratch.

Their first job, for a service provider called Internet Online, paid $100. Since then, they designed an eye-popping Web page for the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

The guys are equal partners in the company. And it helps that they're best friends. They're all in Grade 9. Jason and Jamie attend Westmount Collegiate Institute, while Jeff goes to Thornhill Secondary School. They're all members of Temple Kol Ami.

All three grew up with computers and are completely comfortable with them, as many teens are.

It's no secret that young people can leave adults in the dust when it comes to computers. Carey Miller, a Toronto software development consultant, banks on it. He has a computer company on the side named Call a Ten-Year-Old.

The job requires "a lot of creativity and imagination," says Jason, and a vast knowledge of computer languages like HTML, Java and a new one called Shockwave.

What makes a Web site stand out? The boys say it's graphics, colors, moving words, links to other sites…anything that makes you say "Wow!"

Apart from running their company, the three J's are making important contacts with other Web page designers, and learning a lot.

"Sometimes people are surprised at our age," says Jamie, "but then we just show them what we can do."

Web Vision's own site is at www.geocities.com/Eureka/Plaza/4602.

A tactful exploration of chassidism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Renee Zellweger and Christopher Eccleston in A Price Above Rubies.

A Price Above Rubies is a film apart, like the chassidic community it portrays.

Boaz Yakin's beautifully-crafted movie, which turns on a rebellious Orthodox Jewish woman who liberates herself sexually and emotionally, is inextricably linked to an Eastern European fable about a Jew who's doomed to wander the earth for the rest of her days.

Now playing at Famous Players theatres, A Price Above Rubies is anything but conventional. It's a rarity by virtue of the fact that it deals with a world unto itself – the self-contained, highly structured and traditional universe of chassidic Jews.

By my reckoning, it's the first such mainstream Hollywood movie since Sydney Lumet's A Stranger Among Us, released in 1992 and starring Melanie Griffith.

Like A Stranger Among Us, which was basically a police procedural, it revolves in part around the buying and selling of precious jewels, a chassidic business. But finally, A Price Above Rubies is something much more, a sympathetic if not somewhat subversive portrayal of an intelligent, headstrong person who pays an excruciating price for her search for personal satisfaction and freedom.

The central character in Yakin's bracing film is a young mother named Sonia Horowitz (the luminous Renee Zellweger). Married to Mendel (Glenn Fitzgerald), a kind, distracted, other-worldly rabbinical scholar, she seems content with her domesticated life in Borough Park, a chassidic enclave in Brooklyn.

In reality, however, Sonia is profoundly troubled, being at odds with her community's customs (particularly circumcision), being skeptical about the existence of a just God after the Holocaust, and being profoundly unhappy with Mendel's utter lack of sexual fervor and imagination.

Enter Sonia's manipulative brother-in-law, Sender (Christopher Eccleston). He offers Sonia, a gemologist by training, a job and therefore a measure of independence as an assistant in one of his jewelry shops.

But Sender, a charlatan and predator at heart, is really animated by lust, and the extramarital affair into which he initiates Sonia has the makings of a grand family tragedy.

As a result of the tumult, and Sonia's relationship with an uncommonly talented Puerto Rican artist-cum jeweler which is mistaken for a romantic liaison, she is ostracized and cut off from the community of believers.

Worse still, she must endure the inconsolable pain of being separated from her infant son, who's snatched away by Sonia's moralistic and overbearing sister-in-law, Rachel (Julianne Margulies).

Given its thematic premise, its sexual explicitness and its fleeting foray into nudity, Yakin's film may well offend some. The majority of viewers, though, will probably appreciate its searing honesty and its authenticity.

A Price Above Rubies, whose title is taken from a passage in the Bible concerning the role of women in Jewish society, treats the chassidic lifestyle with a mixture of respect and skepticism, and evokes it with a great measure of visual and vocal verisimilitude.

The film is distinguished by first-rate performances. Zellweger, Fitzgerald and Eccleston are in top form, and Allen Payne and John Randolph acquit themselves honorably as the Puerto Rican jeweler and the esteemed rebbe. Tim Jerome stands out as a friendly psychologist/rabbi who, in vain, tries to settle Sonia's marital problems.

A Price Above Rubies explores virtually uncharted terrain and does so with sensitivity, tact and understanding.

Oratorio based on poet's peace ballad

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — An oratorio based on the poem, A Ballad of Peace, by writer/lyricist, Donia Blumenfeld Clenman, will be performed by the University of Toronto Symphony Orchestra and choirs, with conductor Doreen Rao, at the MacMillan Theatre on April 4 at 8 p.m.

Clenman says the 25-minute oratorio for soloist, choir and string ensemble is based on a selection from her book, Older and In Love: An Israel Odyssey. It was inspired by Micah's vision: "And they shall sit, every man under his vine and under his fig tree. And none shall make them afraid." Micah: IV-4.

"I feel that I am a link or medium between Micah and a modern oratorio which bridges my heritage, history and music," she says.

Clenman, who won the Israel Poetry Peace Prize and was honored with a doctorate of literature from the World Academy of Arts and Culture has participated in a series of Israel at 50 presentations.

A number of Clenman's poems have been set to music by prominent Canadian composers. Her most recent collaboration with Srul Irving Glick, a eulogy to Yitzhak Rabin titled In Memory of Yitzhak Rabin: We Miss You, Shalom, was premiered by four massed choirs in Akron, Ohio in 1997. The composition was recently published by Warner/Chappel Music Ltd. for international distribution.

Clenman says that the day after Rabin's assassination, Glick called her to ask if she would write a poem in Rabin's memory. "I told him that I was in shock and I couldn't and would he give me time?"

She could not sleep that night, she says. "In the morning when I went to the window, I found that my Canadian cactuses had abundant blossoms overflowing my window sill."

Donia Blumenfeld Clenman

The word sabra comes from the Hebrew tzaber, which is cactus. Clenman explains. "When I looked at the blossoms, I felt as if my Canadian sabras were sending their blossoms to the Israeli sabra, Rabin. The poem just wrote itself."

Glick's composition is for mixed choir and piano.

Woody Allen to play Menachem Begin?

WOODY ALLEN TO FILM BEGIN'S LIFE STORY?

Incredible as it sounds, American movie director Woody Allen is reportedly preparing to make an epic historical film based on the life of the late Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, and "wants to do for Begin what Sir Richard Attenborough did for Mahatma Gandhi."

A report in the London-based Jewish Chronicle, which appeared well before Purim, asserted that Allen is serious about the project, even though he has never set foot in Israel and has never been known as an ally of Zionist causes. He has reportedly hired his uncle, Mordecai Koenigsberg, a former professor of modern history at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, as an adviser.

"Woody feels that there was a whole other Begin whom the world never got to know," said Esther Goldstein, who works for Allen's production company and is a confidante of the 62-year-old filmmaker.

"He feels that there was this really funny guy underneath trying to get out, and the script will reflect the dichotomy between a gravely serious public persona and a man with a really sharp sense of humor who regularly had his close friends in stitches."

Allen has apparently cast himself in the lead role. According to the Chronicle, Julia Roberts will play Begin's wife Aliza, Morgan Freeman will play Anwar Sadat, and Michael Caine is being considered for the part of Yitzhak Rabin.

Goldstein would neither confirm nor deny rumors that Danny de Vito will play David Ben-Gurion and Brad Pitt will play the younger Begin.

Most of the film will supposedly be shot in New York, with certain scenes shot in the Arizona desert. While some War of Independence sequences will be filmed on location in Israel, Allen is apparently not planning to travel there.

Still, he intends to show nothing but the deepest respect for his subject, according to Goldstein.

"Woody has been learning Hebrew for a couple of years now in preparation for this. He has even installed sunlamps in his apartment so that he will look more Israeli. His preparation is so thorough that all he ever eats these days is hummus."

If this report can be believed, the film should be ready for release in the next year or two.

Composer's career spans 60 years

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — As he approaches his 80th birthday on April 6, Louis Applebaum looks back on a musical career that has spanned six decades and reached from Toronto to New York to Hollywood to England.

"I've been lucky," says the Toronto-based composer, noting that he was intensely involved in the developing stages of a lot of cultural institutions, including the National Film Board, the Stratford Festival, the National Arts Centre and the Ontario Arts Council, "and every one of them was a major challenge."

Applebaum has scored more than 200 films, more than 200 television productions and more than 75 dramatic productions at Stratford. In 1945, as a 27-year-old "whippersnapper," he received an Academy Award nomination for the soundtrack to The Story of G.I. Joe, starring Robert Mitchum and Burgess Meredith.

Applebaum recalls composing the music for G.I. Joe in a rented studio while the young Leonard Bernstein composed On The Town in an adjacent studio. "We kept the windows open blasting away at each other," he says.

As the musical director at Stratford, he originated the Stratford tradition of playing a fanfare with trumpets to summon theatre patrons back to their seats after intermission.

Becoming a musical consultant to the National Arts Center in Ottawa in the 1960s, he established a midsized orchestra for the NAC to complete with the large symphonies in Toronto and Montreal. He won a Centennial Medal in 1967, and became a companion to both the Order of Canada and the Order of Ontario. The Juno Awards gave him a Special Achievement Award in 1995. He is the current president of SOCAN.

Louis Applebaum

On April 6, 8 p.m., Soundstreams Canada presents a star-studded gala evening at the Jane Mallet Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre, Toronto, in celebration of Applebaum's 80th birthday. The evening will feature performances of numerous Applebaum compositions and appearances by actor Benedict Campbell, the Elmer Iseler Singers, the Canadian brass, soprano Monica Whicher, harpist Erica Goodman, flautist Robert Cram and the Encounters Chamber Ensemble.

The program includes about 10 works by Applebaum, including Life's Journey, a Hebrew- and-English cantata for double chorus, cantor and orchestra that he wrote for Temple Sinai.

According to Lawrence Cherney, artistic director of Soundstreams Canada, Applebaum is a magician. "Lou can literally do anything with a score. You hand him a list of any instrumentation – two piccolos, three tubas and a vacuum cleaner – and Lou can make music. I've never seen him come up dry."

Tickets to the Louis Applebaum 80th Birthday Celebration are $30 and include a post- concert reception. For reservations, call the box office, 416-366-7723.

Sacred Illusions

Sacred Illusions, an exhibition of new works by Toronto artists Howi Ross and Jennifer Linton is showing until April 9.

In his new series of oil paintings, Howi Ross explores the world of wonder through the imagery of magic. His works are inspired by the mystery of magic like this Rabbit Mystery pictured right.

Ross who graduated from the Ontario College of Art in 1984 has had many exhibitions around Toronto and one in Italy.

Jennifer Linton's art examines the concept of transformation, specifically the process of spiritual transformation as manifested through the body. Linton holds a degree in art from the University of Toronto.

The exhibition runs Tuesday through Saturday 12-6 p.m. at the Propeller Centre for the Visual Arts, 96 Spadina Ave. Ste. 303. 416-504-7142.

Jewish cultural life once flourished in Odessa

By MATTHEW WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

ODESSA — There is a posting on the Internet for train travellers entering Ukraine from Poland. It cautions that thieves spray ethyl chloride into the sleeping compartments and rob anesthetized passengers.

There is a long delay at the Ukranian border. Customs officials tell you not to worry about non-returned forms and documents. The wheel mechanism is changed to accommodate the wider train track of the former Soviet Union, a security measure that was a major obstacle for the German Army during WWII.

This flat terrain has been used as an invasion route for centuries. From the Polish border to the Black Sea the rich, rolling farmland is dotted with mountain ash and poplar trees and onion-shape domed Russian Orthodox churches. I help tape the air vents shut before retiring.

Industrialized Galicia, sombre and polluted, gives way to Southern Ukraine, where the ionized Black Sea air energizes the soul. On the outskirts of Odessa, trees in postage stamp size family plots groan with peaches, plums and cherries.

Odessa Opera & Ballet House built in 1884. [Andrew Gregorovich]

Hell's Angels on horseback

Set behind acacia tree-lined boulevards, pale blue, yellow and claret colored buildings flaunt classical Italian and French architecture. Grape vines entwine the wrought-iron grillwork of their entrances. Women wearing babushkas peddle sunflower heads and bundles of leeks, carrots and potatoes.

Tomatoes and apples are arranged in china bowls and offered for sale. Vendors hawk pickled vegetables, braids of garlic and onions and kostechkeh — roasted, salted, apricot kernels. Prices are calculated with a schoti — an abacus-like wood and wire instrument. It's waterproof, shockproof and doesn't need batteries. After borscht and black bread, there is tea from a samovar with kazinacki — a sunflower seed and honey dessert.

Fleeing the pogroms and destitution of Poland and the Pale of Settlement and barred from residence in Moscow or St. Petersburg, Jews flocked to Odessa. By the turn of the century they comprised more than one third of the city's population of 400,000 and dominated most of the city's economy.

Together with commercial opportunity. Odessa was a centre of the Enlightenment. Jewish cultural and literary life flourished. Mendele Mocher Sefarim lived in Odessa for 35 years. Shalom Aleichem played the stock exchange. Chaim Nachman Bialik joined his mentor Ahad Ha-Am. Leon Trotsky went to school in Odessa and spent the first year of his career as a revolutionary in her prison. Ze'ev Jabotinsky represented the city as a delegate at the Sixth Zionist Congress in Switzerland in 1902.

But perhaps Odessa Jewish intelligentsia's most significant contribution was made by 20th century Russia's greatest word wizard Issac Babel.

Born in 1894, he was the son of a local farm equipment salesman. Home tutored in Hebrew and Jewish studies, he entered the Odessa Commercial school at 11. Whenever possible, he stole away to the beaches and docks or roamed the mean streets of the Moldovonka — the city's Jewish ghetto. The moxie and savvy of the ghetto underworld later animated his fiction.

Hooligans, whores and holy men "bubble like cheap red wine" in Odessa Tales, (1927), the short story collection that confirmed him as a master stylist. One hero, the gangster Benya Krik, is the dapper don of the Moldovanka mob — a Russian Jewish Corleone struggling for respectability.

With the University of Odessa closed to him because of the Jewish quota, Babel completed his formal education at the Kiev Business Institute and then lived illegally in St. Petersburg where he began publishing in his patron Maxim Gorky's magazine.

When Poland attacked Russia in 1920, Babel enlisted as a war correspondent in the First Cavalry Army, a 16,000 strong Cossack horseman killing machine. Babel's admission into their ranks could only have happened during the honeymoon that followed the Russian Revolution.

The Pale of Settlement was abolished, all anti-Semitic laws were repealed and the Cossacks, long-time enforcers of anti-Jewish persecution under the Czars, were converted into defenders of Communism.

Hell's Angels on horseback, they rode eight abreast according to one eyewitness. With sabres slung from their waists and rifles hanging across their backs, they raised columns of dust visible for miles and terrorized their way to the gates of Warsaw, wreaking havoc upon a war zone that was full of Jewish towns and villages.

An awkward city-boy, mocked, he wrote "for the spectacles on his nose and the autumn in his heart," Babel was awed by the elegance and daring of his Cossack comrades-in-arms and sickened by their cruelty. He was an intellectual Jew among illiterate pogromists, an assimilated Soviet revolutionary among provincial, Orthodox shtetl Yidden and a gentle soul among wild men.

Babel's protectors among the old guard Bolsheviks were all murdered by Josef Stalin during the Great Terror of the late 1930s. He continued writing but withheld most of his work from publication, choosing, he said "to practice the genre of silence." He was arrested in 1939 and his manuscripts were confiscated. He was tortured, given a sham trial and shot. His papers were incinerated.

Almost nothing of Babel's Odessa survives. A state security building stands on the Moldovanka street named for him. The city changed hands 20 times during the Russian Civil War and was occupied by the German and Romanian Armies during World War II. Between Oct. 23 to 25, 1941, 26,000 Jews were massacred. Odessa was declared Judenrein (Jew free) on Feb.23, 1942. Jews rebuilt a community after the war, but most have left for Israel and the West since 1989.

Odessa's most famous landmark — the Potemkin Steps — is a 10-section flight of stairs which leads down from the city's main promenade to the central port facility. Completed in 1841, it is twice as wide at the bottom as at the top, giving the illusion of having parallel sides.

Designed so that only the landings can be seen from above and only the steps from below, it is sacred ground to Jews as the gateway to Zion and the West. Named for the Russian Navy cruiser whose crew mutinied during the 1905 uprising in Odessa that foreshadowed the Russian Revolution, the steps were immortalized in the classic 1925 Sergei Eisenstein film Battleship Potemkin.

Isaac Babel's spectacles and fountain pen are on display at the nearby Museum of Literature. His stories, adapted for the stage, have played to sold-out audiences at the Gesher Theater in Jaffa.

Business Profile

Weis Advertising focuses on image-building strategies

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Oscar Weis, president and creative director of Weis Advertising, compares himself to a chef in a fine restaurant.

"[We have assembled the plate, but I still have to] sprinkle the parsley. Nothing leaves the kitchen until attention has been paid to every last detail."

Weis, 45, in 1979 started the business, a wholly Canadian-owned creative design and advertising agency that specializes in creating and implementing image-building strategies for clients in domestic and foreign markets.

He controls every account, he says, from concept to the final product. "I must make sure everything is perfect – I have a vision in my head and I don't stop until I like what I see. Of course, a perfectionist can never be perfectly happy with his work, but I do like to be proud of it."

Weis is a native of Argentina and later spent seven years living in Israel. A teacher, he immigrated to Canada to teach in a Winnipeg Hebrew school and while there took courses in marketing and economics at the University of Winnipeg.

After three years, he took what was supposed to be a one-year sabbatical to work for an advertising agency in Toronto. He has been here since.

He opened his own agency, he said, against all odds. "I wanted to make a difference. I was determined that my campaigns have emotion without the preaching. I was going to be honest in an emotional way."

He credits his wife, Noemi, the agency's media buyer, with supporting his goal. "We started with one account – Pix Camera Shops – with the two of us and an art director in an office on Eglinton Avenue. We grew in calibre and slowly built up clientele."

The office, now located on Front Street East in downtown Toronto, has eight staff members, as well as some freelancers, and boasts such accounts as El Al, Bell Canada, National Tourist Office of Spain, Israel Government Tourist Office and, most recently, the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

"Anything that has to do with Israel is close to my heart. I feel comfortable in Canada and Argentina as well, but I feel Israel in my heart. I am a bridge between my client and the people my client wants to reach."

For the past several years, Weis Advertising has been selling Canada around the world, and as a result of its efforts was the only advertising agency invited to participate in Team Canada's recent mission to Latin America.

"Four years ago, we decided to jump on the bandwagon and export our know-how about Canadian industry. We started exporting the idea of bringing people here to shoot commercials – it's cheaper, more efficient and, as a bonus, we speak six languages at the agency.

"The first client that came was from Israel, and we produced a commercial that will be seen on Channel 2 there. Toronto talent and Toronto models can now be seen on Israeli television."

He understands the market for which the commercial is being made, says Weis. "If the client wants us to recreate an apartment building in Tel Aviv, it comes naturally to us. Tel Aviv in the morning, is different than Tel Aviv in the afternoon, and we know how to recreate that difference. When Mexicans want Mexican children in their commercials we know what they look like. We make a product believable even though the commercial is being shot maybe 10,000 miles away from its market. We understand their mentality, and that is a unique selling point – on top of which it costs 40 percent less to shoot a commercial here."

One of the results of the trade mission, he says, was a meeting with Carlos Rocha, who operates 186 theatres in Brazil. Commercials are shown before each movie but they are too expensive to make in Brazil. After meeting Weis, he agreed to buy commercials produced in Toronto.

"It costs about $200,000 to make a quality commercial and every time we do we hire about 100 people [for about a week]," says Weis. "We need actors, editors, musicians, sound people, production crews, caterers and so on. These are jobs that would otherwise not be created."

People in the countries they visited on the mission were impressed, says Weis. "The fact that we had the prime minister and the premiers with us gave us credibility. We were able to make a lot of alliances. I am proud to have been on the trip and to have represented Canada."

The agency, which has been promoting Israel since 1984, has handled the account against many odds, says Weis. It started a campaign the same night Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated.

"A strategic decision was made between us and the tourist office and we decided to keep the campaign. This was the worst time for Israel and we did not want negative public feelings. We told Israelis and all Jews to follow their hearts – leave all politics aside, support Israel and follow your heart there.

"We understand that there are constant problems in Israel, but we do not want to remind people of that. Life has to go on and we tell the consumer to celebrate life, especially now, in Israel's 50th anniversary year, when so many activities are going on there."

When El Al wanted to reach Israelis in Canada, says Weis, he created a Hebrew slogan that when translated said "it's good to come home. The focus was on Israelis and we decided to reach them in their own language. This was the first time anything like that was done."

The success of his agency, says Weis, is due largely to the fact "that we are true to what we believe. In 20 years, our outlook has not changed. We still feel exhilarated and we still celebrate every new client with a glass of champagne.

"To be successful as a Canadian agency, it takes some discipline. We could sell, but we would lose our individuality, independent thinking and analytical mind. I like to keep the agency small because I have complete control. I can be totally responsible to the needs of my clients and I am always there for them.

"We have no voice mail, there are no partitions and there are no doors on our offices. We have a truly open concept and we are always available. What our clients see, is what our clients get."

Sonny Goldstein, CLU,CH.F.C.

Simon in familiar spot — leading his team in scoring

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If it's late in the winter and you want to find out how Todd Simon is doing, go right to the top of the scoring leaders column.

Chances are, that's where you'll find him.

Ever since he was a junior playing for the Niagara Falls Thunder of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), Simon has been blessed with that rare ability to score points by the bushel.

This year is no exception. As the International Hockey League (IHL or the "I") season winds down, Simon, a centre with the Cincinnati Cyclones, can again be found among the league's top scorers. After 73 games, Simon was second in scoring with 99 points (31 goals and 68 assists), behind only Patrice Lefebvre of Las Vegas, who had 103. With time running out, the league scoring derby had turned into a race between the two, with Brian Wiseman of Houston holding down third spot with 88 points.

Last year, while with Detroit, Simon and teammate Peter Ciavaglia tied for the Vipers' scoring lead with 72 points, as the duo led the Vipers to the Turner Cup championship. Simon was third in league playoff scoring.

Two years ago, Simon finished fifth in league scoring with 109 points and was named to the first all-star team. Prior to this season, the Toronto native had totalled 176 points in 161 IHL games.

There's more. Back as a rookie junior, Simon finished third in OHL scoring (125 points) the year Eric Lindros led the league. In his sophomore year, with Lindros out of the league, Simon won the scoring title with 146 points.

Drafted by the Buffalo Sabres, Simon played three years with the Sabres' AHL affiliate, the Rochester Americans. He scored 268 points in 192 AHL games.

So with a host of accomplishments to his credit, why is Simon still unsatisfied with the course his career has taken?

The answer is not too hard to discern. Like any red-blooded Canadian boy, Simon, 24, still dreams of playing in the NHL. Despite becoming an established star in the I, Simon hasn't given up hope of making it in the big league.

While playing in the Buffalo system, Simon got up to "the show" for only 15 regular season games and five in the playoffs.

"I don't think I got a fair shot in Buffalo," he said in a telephone interview from Cincinnati. "I was only up 15 games and I didn't get to play much."

A "go-to guy" throughout his career, Simon said, "I need lots of ice time to show what I can do. When you play only a couple of shifts, it's hard."

Although his career with Buffalo and Rochester was disappointing, he still counts a game he played with the Sabres as his all-time hockey memory. Simon had been called up from the Amerks for an early round playoff game against New Jersey. At the end of the first period of a typically tight defensive struggle, then-coach John Muckler tapped him on the shoulder and put him in at the tail end of a Buffalo power play. "He told me to go to the net," Simon recalled.

That simple strategy worked, as Simon knocked in the puck from close in to beat goaltender Martin Brodeur and notch the game-winner in a 2-0 Sabres victory.

Despite his heroics and his respectable scoring statistics in Rochester, Buffalo did not renew Simon's contract.

With no other NHL teams calling, Simon decided to leave the AHL behind and give the IHL a shot. He signed with the Las Vegas Thunder.

"The pay is better in the IHL and there are a lot of good players in the league," Simon explained.

The AHL is a league of young players who are trying to impress coaches and scouts. "The intensity is higher and the physical game is tougher," Simon said.

Although "the AHL is a tougher grind," Simon believes the talent level is higher in the I.

From Las Vegas he moved to Detroit and from there, he was traded to Cincinnati on Sept. 9 for right winger Scott Thomas.

Playing on a line with former Hab Gilbert Dionne (86 points) and Todd Hawkins (33 points), the trio has developed a chemistry that has made them the Cyclones' top line and the league's best power play unit.

"I'm kind of a playmaker," Simon said. "I try to set up guys and try to get a few goals as well. I just try to work hard.

"Coach Ron Smith expects a lot out of me and I expect a lot out of myself."

Back when the Cyclones obtained Simon, Smith told the media, "We knew we had to give up quality to obtain one of the finest centres in the league. Todd is a dangerous player who can create scoring chances as well as anyone in the IHL."

Despite the accolades, Simon has his eye on the next NHL expansions which will see the league grow by four teams. "My dream still isn't over," he said.

Though he signed a three-year contract with Detroit last year, it contains an escape clause. If he signs with an NHL club, he's outa there.

The Inside Back

Incitement and free speech

The life and death issues facing Israel often create a tendency to see issues in a purely local context. A recent judgment regarding freedom of speech and incitement, however, while typical of the problems the Israeli courts must handle, raises many of the issues that a mature system like Canada's has had to deal with, too.

Benjamin Kahane, son of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, distributed a flyer in 1992, calling for the bombing of the Arab town of Umm El Faham. This was in response to a terrorist bombing in Israel. Kahane was tried and convicted of incitement, which is defined in section 136 of the Israeli Criminal code as, among other things, "awakening strife and hatred among different parts of the population." On March 2, his appeal to the Supreme Court was accepted and his conviction overturned by a 2:1 majority.

This is not the first time the courts have come down on the side of freedom of speech, and that right is well grounded in Israeli jurisprudence, even in the absence of a written constitution. In the early years of the state, the Supreme Court established that the government could only use its powers to shut down newspapers where it could show a "close certainty" that the incitement they contained would endanger the state.

In the Kahane case, the majority ruled that the crime of incitement is designed to protect democracy and the stability of the regime, but that it also places restrictions on freedom of speech. Therefore, the two values must be balanced. Justice Eliezer Goldberg argued that Israeli democracy has struck roots and grown stronger since the law was passed. Therefore, the state needs less protection and the courts should place more emphasis on freedom of speech. In his opinion, people should only be convicted of incitement when there is a definite likelihood that the publication will actually incite. Goldberg wrote that Kahane's flyer was an infantile publication that posed no danger of actually inciting anybody.

Justice Eliyahu Matza dissented from the majority, and pointed out that most racist arguments are infantile. In Matza's opinion, while Israeli democracy has certainly been strengthened over the years, there have been instances, such as the massacre in Hebron and the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, which demonstrate the need to protect it from violent fringes, even at the expense of limitations on freedom of speech.

The issue of restricting freedom of speech in order to prevent racist incitement is not unique to Israel. In Canada, the courts have had to consider the matter carefully (i.e. the cases of Ernst Zundel and Jim Keegstra). There is a consensus among many that racism is an especially insidious form of incitement which justifies taking more severe measures.

Part of the problem is that limiting freedom of speech in order to protect democracy can backfire if courts interpret the ban liberally. One of the arguments used commonly in Israel since the Rabin assassination has been that one's opponent is using inflammatory and inciting language. Clearly not all strong language is illegal.

Furthermore, allowing the judges too much latitude creates a situation where a small group of people are deciding what the rest of society is allowed to say and publish. Thus, a measure originally taken to protect democracy can boomerang. While the extremes are easy – complete freedom of speech or absolute police discretion – any attempt to balance different values will be messy and unsatisfying. Judges have no choice but to create tests to guide the police and prosecutors in an attempt to find the balance that will serve society best.

Although the Kahane case ended in an acquittal and was clothed in the language of permitting speech, it actually could be construed as more limiting than previous precedents. If future courts choose to interpret Goldberg's "definite likelihood" test as less strict than a "close certainty," it could actually lead to more arrests and charges. It may sound as though the judges are playing with semantics, but they are trying to give expression to a reality that is not clear cut.

At the same time, an advantage of such attempts to balance competing values is that they are fluid and can change with the needs of society. Therefore, the only thing one can say with certainty is that the Kahane case will not be the final word on the subject.

Put farfel in a colander and pour hot water over it.

Beat yolks, salt, sugar and margarine. Mix in large bowl with electric mixer. Mix in farfel.

Add pineapple, (raisins if desired), applesauce and cinnamon. Fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour into 9x13" ungreased pan. Sprinkle sugar and cinnamon over kugel. Bake at 350°F for 40-45 minutes.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Passover is here again and with it comes my yearly dilemma – my mother-in-law's gefilte fish. We are a fairly big group and therefore everyone makes something to bring to the seder. My mother-in-law has been making the gefilte fish for years now. Let me tell you that it tastes only slightly worse than it smells.

No one eats it. They all cover it with lots of horseradish and cut it up so it looks eaten and then the whole thing goes into the trash. It's a shame and a sin to waste food like this, but I don't know how to let her down without her being completely insulted. It also bothers me that it has become the Pesach joke around here and I really feel it's time to put an end to it. But how? I'll take any tips you may have.

No Fishing Please

Dear No Fishing Please,

Obviously you've come to realize this ritual cannot go on. I'm sure your mother-in-law is good at cooking something other than gefilte fish. This year have someone else take charge of the fish and let her know that the fish has already been made; however, you really need her to prepare the brisket or tzimmes or anything else you think would be enjoyed at the seder. I'm sure you really do need her help if you have a large group of people coming, so why not use her talents for something you could appreciate. She will feel useful and at the same time you will get the help you need and the peace of mind of knowing you've done the best you can to solve this uncomfortable problem.

Your mother-in-law might be taken aback at first when you tell her someone else has already made the fish, but if you make a fuss about how much you need her to make something else, she will soon come to terms with the new arrangement. It would be especially nice if you made a bit of a fuss over the new dish she prepares on seder night.

It's a fine line between not hurting her feelings and not throwing away food. This is one problem that needs to be handled with lots of understanding, and it sounds as if you're already aware of that.

Chag Kasher V'Samayach.

El Al faces predicament in Canadian market

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a downtown office building in a tony Toronto shopping district, El Al's Canadian manager struggles to find the right words. He's clearly trying to avoid sounding like he's giving ultimatums, while at the same time he's attempting to impress upon the Jewish community the financially difficult situation the Israeli national airline is in vis-a-vis its Canadian route.

"I want to make this as positive as possible," said Moshe Shamai. "There is a continuous relationship here between the Jewish community and El Al.

"In an environment where no other Canadian carrier wanted to take this route," El Al did. Even for the Israeli airline, "the traffic was not so great as to justify a purely Canadian route and we had to support it by including it in our North American route," he said.

Moshe Shamai

Exclusive

Shamai's remarks were by way of introduction to a sensitive topic, one which he addressed only indirectly. Although he did not come right out and say so, Shamai suggested that El Al's Canadian operation is suffering from an absence of brand loyalty the Israeli airline believes it has the right to expect.

In the days when El Al was the only carrier flying directly from Canada to Israel, American passengers were shuttled in to fill the Israel-bound flights departing from Montreal, even though that added considerable cost to the enterprise, he said.

"It was not a money-making situation, but it was a commitment we made to the community."

At times, El Al ferried only 30 to 40 passengers to and from Israel, but it maintained the flights as part of its ongoing efforts "to maintain the route all year."

El Al went the extra step in other ways, he said. Unlike other airlines, El Al stocked kosher meals at Montreal's Dorval airport to accommodate Jewish passengers experiencing a flight delay.

To satisfy community demand during peak periods such as Passover, Chanukah and the Maccabiah Games, El Al always cooperated with large groups en route to Israel where other airlines provide special arrangements only during their slow season, he said.

"We never raised the question of profitability with the Canadian market. We knew that sometimes you gain, sometimes you lose.

"We are still committed to Canada," he said. "I want to put it positively. We are looking for ways

Pesach's power

No one should underestimate the power of Pesach both as event and as holiday.

The event, which we embody in the name Passover (Pesach), was a watershed for western civilization. It implanted forever, into the soil of human development, the deeply-rooting, life-sustaining idea of freedom and justice.

Editorial

Wherever one people has enslaved another, wherever parents have had only the bread of affliction to serve to their children, wherever oppression and suffering have caused anyone to cast low his gaze in shame and despair, the story of the exodus of Israel from Egypt has been a source of hope, a nourishment for the soul, a bright star in a darkened sky lifting one's spirit and one's gaze. It changed, literally, the course of human history.

That is why the holiday, our annual retelling of the exodus during the Pesach seder, is itself an act of immense power.

Each year at the same time, at the mid-point of the first month of the Hebrew calendar, we sit together, family, friends, guests and people in need, placing ourselves alongside our ancestors who knew at that most amazing and wonderful moment, that they were standing in the enfolding shelter of God's outstretched hand.

With our children at our side, and for some of us, our parents only in our hearts, we reiterate, we commemorate, we celebrate that singular, epoch-making moment more than 3,000 years ago, when history was transformed by the ethereal yet prosaic notion that all human beings are precious.

Happy Passover.

EARLY DEADLINE

The Passover holiday brings about the following advertising deadline for the April 23 issue: all display advertising, April 15 at noon; classified and organization ads, April 14 at noon.

The CJN wishes everyone a healthy and happy Passover.

TORONTO — Marcel Wieder, a Canadian political consultant, edged out hundreds of American applicants in the American Association of Political Consultants' annual Pollie Awards.

Wieder, owner of Arrow Communications, won first place for a direct mail persuasion brochure in a regional public policy issue category. His piece, created on behalf of generic drug manufacturers, called on the federal government to review legislation that would increase the cost of drug care, especially for seniors.

Coalition Concerned

MONTREAL — The Coalition of the National Congress of Italian Canadians (Quebec), Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Quebec region, and the Hellenic Congress of Quebec has expressed concern over a statement that Société Saint-Jean Baptiste de Montréal president Guy Bouthillier made at a National Assembly hearing on the provincial referendum law.

Bouthillier implied that the right to vote should be restricted to those who have a knowledge of the French language.

CJC Quebec region chair Reisa Teitelbaum said that "the refusal of Parti Quebecois MNA Jean-Claude St-André to reject these proposals out of hand condones such pernicious ideas, which fortunately are not shared by the majority of Quebecers."

Bethlehem Mayor Dies

BETHLEHEM — Elias Freij, 80, mayor of this West Bank city for 23 years, was buried last week.

Freij was a political moderate who had developed good relations with both Jordanian and Israeli officials, as well as with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat. He held the tourism portfolio in the PA until last year.

Nelson Sentenced

NEW YORK — Lemrick Nelson, was recently sentenced to 19½ years in a federal prison.

Nelson was convicted one year ago on federal charges related to the fatal stabbing of rabbinical student Yankel Rosenbaum during the 1991 riots in the Crown Heights section of Brooklyn.

The judge in the case, concerned that Nelson will continue to be a menace after he is released, added an extra five years of probation after the sentence is completed.

Sweden to Disburse Cash

ZURICH — Handelbanken, a Swedish bank, has announced plans to begin disbursing money from dormant World War II-era bank accounts within the next few months.

A bank official said that about 15 of 75 account holders, the majority of whom are Norwegian businesspeople who had accounts in Sweden during the war, would receive the payments.

Visitors' Centre Planned

WARSAW — A Polish developer has won approval for a visitors' centre near the former Auschwitz death camp.

The developer had dropped earlier plans for a mini-mall across from the camp, after Jewish officials and Holocaust survivors said it would desecrate the memory of the 1.5 million people who died at Auschwitz.

The centre will house fast-food restaurants, a post office, a bank and a bookstore devoted to the history of Auschwitz.

Russians Polled

MOSCOW — According to a recent poll sponsored by the Russian Jewish Congress, 73 percent of Russians have a positive attitude toward Jews. Some 18 percent, the poll said, believe that Jews have too much influence over Russian society.

Synagogue Returned

OSWIECIM — Poland officially turned over a synagogue near the Auschwitz concentration camp to the local Jewish community. The synagogue is the first Jewish communal property returned under a law passed last year.

Abzug Dies

NEW YORK — Bella Abzug, the first Jewish woman ever elected to the U.S. Congress, died recently of complications following heart surgery. She was 77.

A feminist who fought for civil rights and against the war in Viet Nam, Abzug was also a defender of Zionist causes.

"It is the passing of an era," said Ira Foreman, executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council, on hearing of her death.

Correction

A CJN brief last week overstated the amount of money Germany has transferred to the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Israel as an initial payment to help locate Nazi war criminals who are still receiving pensions from Bonn.

The actual amount is about $100,000 (US).

New compensation plan launched in Germany

Insurance firm seeking Holocaust victims, heirs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of Germany's largest insurance companies is offering compensation to Holocaust victims and their heirs for life insurance policies issued before World War II.

Allianz AG is devoting a tremendous amount of time and effort to track down possible claims by the heirs of insured parties who were killed during the Holocaust, said Herbert Hansmeyer, a member of the company's board of management. The company has opened an international telephone hotline (1-800-411-0118) to answer questions concerning possible claims.

Speaking to about 30 people in a downtown office boardroom, Hansmeyer said Allianz's efforts stem from a class action law suit filed in New York against 16 European insurers, including four Allianz subsidiaries. The suit claims compensation for people who had policies with the company but who, for a variety of reasons related to the Nazis' anti-Semitic policies, were unable to collect in full. While Allianz does not believe it has a legal liability in the case, it feels a moral responsibility to investigate the matter and compensate former policy holders, Hansmeyer said.

Hansmeyer said the company international hotline has fielded about 900 calls "from people inquiring from Allianz if there was a policy for their relatives. We have multiple requests from the various requesters."

After checking the company's central file index, investigators found 200 possible "hits." When these were investigated further, 50 actual files were found. In other cases, the policies may have been destroyed or never issued, he explained.

Of the 50 files, two-thirds were determined to be made out to Jewish policyholders before 1939. Hansmeyer said of the 50, seven policies were found in which it was impossible to determine whether Allianz ever made payment or whether the German government made restitution after the war (German restitution payments took into account unclaimed insurance policies.)

Allianz made offers to settle the seven cases and six were accepted, he said.

The task of determining possible payouts is monumental, he continued. From 1922-48, the company opened 1.3 million files. In a sample survey of 32,000 files, investigators attempted to determine whether some of the policy holders were Jewish. They did that by considering the name, whether the Nazis intervened in the policy and whether the policy holder changed address.

About 1,800 Jewish policies have been found in the sample. "We found that of the Jewish policies, 60 percent had been paid out before 1939," he said.

Hansmeyer, whose speaking engagement was sponsored by the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation, said the company has no legal liability to pay because in the wake of the war, all German insurance companies were in effect bankrupt and the companies survived because the German government guaranteed two-thirds of their liabilities. "There is no money left from this period that we should have paid out." Furthermore, German government restitution after the war, which amounted to 100 billion Deutsche Marks (DM) paid to Jewish victims of the Holocaust and to Israel, took into account lost insurance policies, he said.

"For Allianz, the whole legal issue for the Holocaust is finished. It is not a legal issue, it is a moral issue."

Hansmeyer said that in many cases, pre-war insurance policies were for very modest amounts as low as 5,000 Reichs Marks (these were converted to DMs after the war at a rate of 10-1). The company has spent more than 10 million DM to deal with the issue and paid out $30,000 (US) to the seven claimants, he said.

Hansmeyer said the company is seeking the cooperation of Jewish groups to help bring the issue to a conclusion. "Most important is that we find some terms of reference and that we agree with Jewish organizations on how to deal with this issue," he said.

Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC) in New York, said the organization has had "very intensive discussions with the important European insurance companies and particularly fruitful ones with Allianz."

The talks have been "constructive" with the goal of finding a

Israel's negative image

It's an old story. And most of the readers of The CJN are all too familiar with it. Israel gets bad press.

It hasn't always been that way. The first 19 years of its existence, Israel's image abroad was a sympathetic one. But after 1967, the picture changed, literally.

The predominant images that have been beamed around the world from Israel by the western media since then, and especially since the intifadah began in 1987, have been negative ones, decidedly unsympathetic.

This is not the occasion nor the space in which to explore the reasons for this dramatic shift in the representation of Israel. Nor is it my purpose.

Suffice to say, the images of Israel that now reach across oceans cover virtually every field of Israeli life: foreign diplomacy, the peace process, security issues and domestic politics. And it is almost always negative. Last week's news coverage was typical in this regard.

On the diplomatic front, for example, we saw headlines that read: "PM doubts Ross can wrap up a deal before heading home," or, "Washington and Jerusalem differ." Of course these headlines related to stories concerning the efforts by U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross to get the talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) back on the rails.

On the peace front, debate raged around the extent of the next redeployment by the IDF from the West Bank. The PA wants 30 percent; the United States wants 13.1 percent and Israel is offering just more than eight percent.

On the issue of security, the country was once again thrown into a renewed state of apprehension owing to the threats of revenge issued by Hamas over the death, now apparent slaying, of their "second engineer" Mohiedeen Sharif.

The fact that Israel has denied all connection with the death of Sharif, and even sent the head of the General Security Service to Gaza to meet personally with Yasser Arafat to tell him so, has failed to move Hamas from vowing to resort, yet again, to terrorism, mayhem and violence.

Even one of the leaders of Hamas, Abdul Aziz Rantisi, told the Jerusalem Post that the PA had tortured and executed Sharif. Nevertheless, there has been no reprieve from the Hamas sentence to impose more murder upon Israel.

Frequently, though not always, the images sent by the many competing video camera crews focus on violence between Israelis and Palestinians. This should not be surprising to us, because it is the violence, the conflict, the clash, the tension, that is, after all, the story in the eyes of the editors and reporters who receive and transmit the reports.

Unfortunately, however, violence tends often to erupt "spontaneously" whenever the camera crews appear. This phenomenon itself should also form part of the news, but does not.

The scenes of violence between Israelis and Palestinians that are sent around the world, are generally of rifle-toting, flak-jacketed soldiers standing off against groups of youngsters, or women, or both.

The disparity and the imbalance between the opposing "forces" is quite obvious and quite deliberate: the oppressor versus the oppressed, the strong versus the weak; Goliath versus David.

Last week, the television networks and every major daily newspaper carried photos of clashes between Israeli soldiers and Palestinians who were marking Land Day, a day set aside by the PA to protest the "confiscation" of lands. There were also a number of photographs of mourners for Sharif and of the subsequent displays of anger by the supporters of Hamas who had poured out onto the streets.

The fact that the demonstrators were calling for the spilling of more Jewish blood was generally omitted from the cutline underneath the photos. "We want to hear explosions in Tel Aviv, Blow them up; blow them up," and "In response to his assassination, thousands of Israelis must go down," were some of the calmer, less frenzied slogans shouted by the demonstrators.

As was mentioned earlier, last week's photo transmissions were quite typical of the overall coverage of Israel by the western media for almost 30 years.

And of course, as we see all around us, after 30 years of essentially negative imagery, there has been a cumulative impact upon the way in which Israel is perceived.

In my view, however, the most worrisome aspect of this negative image is its effect on the generations of Jews who have grown up during the past 30 years. They have never known as Abba Eban has described it, the "poignancy of not having an Israel."

At this time of year, on the eve of Passover, and at this time in Israel's young life, on the eve of its 50th anniversary, it is important that we, the older generation, understand the potential for harm to our children and for Israel in the cumulative inversion of truths and justice.

Last Shabbat, we read in the prophet Malachi a reinforcement, of sorts, of this message. "And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, And the heart of the children to the fathers."

Next week, I shall suggest various approaches that we might attempt to help redirect the hearts of our children towards one of the things most precious in our hearts: Israel.

Interfaith couples sought for Canadian's PhD thesis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Danita Mushkat

TORONTO — Doctoral candidate Danita Mushkat is seeking Canadian-born intermarried couples with children 18 or older, and has also begun interviewing couples in which both partners are Jewish for her PhD thesis in sociology at the University of Toronto.

The study will explore definitions and expression of Jewish identity through a questionnaire and in-depth interviews.

Although similar studies have been done in the United States, Canadian research on intermarriage among Jews has been based on census data and vital statistics, said Robert Brym, professor of sociology at the University of Toronto.

And American results don't necessarily apply here, he noted. A study like Mushkat's "should be useful for policy-makers and religious leaders in the [Jewish] community."

Mushkat, 27, is interested in discovering "under what conditions Jewish identity is retained, transformed or weakened."

Her own background is eclectic. Born in Ottawa to Israeli parents, Mushkat grew up in England, New Zealand and Hong Kong, where she spent 11 years before moving back to Canada to attend Trent University. She has spent many summers in Israel visiting extended family.

Between her research and responsibilities as a teaching assistant, academia has become her main focus. A graduate of Trent and Queen's University, where she received her MA, Mushkat has garnered numerous scholarships and awards.

"I've always been interested in people who are marginalized," she said in a kitchen table interview. Her previous research includes a study on Jewish lesbians.

Mushkat attributes her academic interests in large part to her "tikkun olam upbringing" and the "social justice mind-set" of her mother, a professor of International Law at the University of Hong Kong.

She finds her background an advantage in her research, giving her the perspective of both an insider (as a Jew) and an outsider, having spent many of her formative years in the Orient.

In its own way, her parents' union has been an intermarriage, she mused. Her sabra mother is the granddaughter of a rabbi; her father, who left Poland as a child, was raised in a secular, albeit proudly Jewish, family.

Mushkat, who is not married, has a Jewish boyfriend, but it was more common in past years for her to date non-Jews. She's been involved in the Jewish community on a volunteer basis for many years. Her parents would like her to marry someone Jewish, even though she grew up in predominantly non-Jewish environments, she said.

For her thesis, Mushkat is questioning whether accepted criteria for Jewish identity, such as number of Jewish friends and observance of various rituals, actually capture what it means for people to be Jewish.

She has no predictions about the impact of intermarriage on Jewish identity. "To make predictions, you have to have a larger sample. My objective is to raise insights and question taken-for-granted techniques of doing things."

Sociologists are divided on the issue, she noted. "Traditionalists measure identity in terms of adherence to ritual. They come out with gloomy forecasts that the Jewish community is shrinking.

"The other camp recognizes that Jewish identity has been transformed... We've lost certain things, but they're being replaced by alternative [forms] of Jewish cohesion."

She tends to the latter view. "There's been a redefinition of what constitutes Jewishness," she believes.

She hopes to talk to intermarried Jews who have retained their Jewish identity as well as those who feel uncomfortable with their Jewishness "so I can see what causes some to fall by the wayside."

Anyone interested in participating in the study, or just talking to Mushkat about it, can contact her at 416-481-6120, or by e-mail, [dmushkat@epas.utoronto.ca].

mechanism to handle Holocaust insurance claims and reimburse claimants. As for heirless Jews, "Jewish assets belong to the Jewish people through the World Jewish Restitution Organization," which includes WJC, the Claims Conference, the Jewish Agency and the State of Israel, Steinberg said.

So far, Steinberg said, Allianz seems to have learned the lessons of the Swiss bank controversy and is "doing the right thing."

For Allianz, that wasn't always the case. According to a June 3, 1997, report in Insurance Media Watch, Allianz has admitted it insured barracks and other facilities at the Auschwitz death camp. Quoting the German magazine, Der Spiegel, Media Watch reported that Allianz and other companies sold fire, liability and accident insurance to Nazi SS units that operated Auschwitz and other concentration camps, covering supply depots, motor pools and barracks. Allianz inspectors also examined SS factories where inmates worked.

Interfaith 'pre-seder' draws eclectic crowd

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

RICHMOND HILL — An interfaith pre-Passover seder here attracted 63 people, most of them non-Jewish who had never attended a seder before. The Christians, Jews and one Muslim attending included people from Canada, the United States, France, Germany, Italy, Poland and Scotland.

The seder was sponsored by the L'Arche Daybreak community here for the developmentally disabled, with the help of others including members of Kehillah Ahavat Hesed, a small egalitarian Conservative synagogue in Toronto.

A head table with two seder plates had 20 guests while five other tables also had their own seder plate. Both vegetarian and meat meals were available and Beth Porter, Daybreak interfaith committee, said kosher for Passover foods were used.

Porter, a practising Roman Catholic, has a membership in the Kehillah as well.

The seder was led by Harold Weinstein, father of Daybreak member Ellen Weinstein, with one or two Jewish participants at each table to answer questions about the seder.

"They [the Jewish representatives] gave us the confidence to sing with tremendous joy and enthusiasm," said Porter. "The room resounded with song and burst into lively clapping with the Dayeinu."

Christian Gerstner, a young Roman Catholic from Germany, said that despite his father being involved in multifaith dialogue there, he had never met Jewish people or attended a seder before.

A Haggadah especially prepared for interfaith groups by the Anti-Defamation League was used, while several people read portions of the Haggadah and supplementary literature.

Carmen Ellis, a French Canadian Daybreak assistant, noted for her ability to pull together large dinners at short notice, said she was on a "steep learning curve" when it came to kosher laws and Passover dietary rules.

"Our reasons to hold the seder are to be in solidarity with our Jewish members, Ellen, Mel and Roy, at this special time of year and to deepen our appreciation for Judaism, in which Christianity is rooted," said Porter.

North York approves Jewish retirement home

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — North York's community council has approved an application from a Jewish retirement home to make the home, in effect, legal.

Relatives of residents in the home breathed a sigh of relief as council last week voted to approve the application from the Ahavath Achim retirement home, at 31 and 33 Wilmington Ave., for changes to local zoning and planning laws to allow for permitted use.

The approval, which requires further ratification from Toronto council, means the home can continue functioning.

"I'm very relieved and happy," said owner Joseph Sahar, who has operated the home since it opened in 1992. "We are now legal."

Municipal officials had said that technically, the home was functioning against local bylaws, since the two adjoining buildings were zoned as single-family dwellings, and were operating as a business. [CJN, Feb. 19]

The residence is home to 25 Jewish seniors. It advertises 24-hour personalized care, three kosher meals a day, and a small synagogue in the basement of 33 Wilmington.

Surrounding neighbors had feared increased noise, congestion, parking problems and even odors coming from the home.

They also said the home is out of place in a residential area, and questioned why it was allowed to keep functioning.

Lawyer Murray Chusid, representing the home, told council that Sahar spent over $100,000 to correct fire code violations in the residence, and that he even purchased an adjoining home whose owner had complained.

Chusid cited a study showing the retirement home had little impact on the residential character of the neighborhood.

Lawyers representing ratepayers on Codsell Avenue said their clients want assurances that noise and parking would not be a problem, and that the residence would not expand.

Speaker after speaker praised the home for the high quality care it gives the residents, and said the seniors would have nowhere else to go should it be shut down.

Local councillor Howard Moscoe voted for the application, but reluctantly.

He said the home "worked its way into the community," and "broke every rule in the book to become established."

The residence had "put lives at risk" by violating fire codes.

But now, "it seems to be very well operated," Moscoe added.

Councillor Mike Feldman, who voted to approve the home's application, said seniors should not be warehoused and should be allowed to live in areas they know.

Expedient, well-timed

Last week, we caught a glimpse of Premier Lucien Bouchard formulating the Parti Québécois' (PQ) new referendum policy on the run, as it were, trying to hold his ground against the strong winds and the shifting ground wrought by the still fresh entry of Jean Charest into Quebec's provincial politics. What we saw was a backward-stepping premier demonstrating his attachment to a skewed notion of democracy that regards the population's often expressed preference against separation as merely a temporary inconvenience, while viewing any future vote in favor of separation, of any size or majority, as unassailably irreversible.

Last Tuesday, in Ottawa, as reported in the Globe and Mail, he told reporters that the next "referendum will have to be launched in the next mandate. I don't know exactly when...But it will have to be launched when we have winning conditions." Three days later in Quebec, having had time to collect his thoughts, the premier clarified his earlier statement. "There will be a referendum if the conditions are united so that we will win. And one of the conditions, of course, is that people must want a referendum..."

More than two out of every three people in Quebec do not want a referendum. Among these numbers, it is true, are people who voted Yes in the last referendum. But we can safely conclude both from these figures and from the past two referenda, that more than half of all Quebecers do not want to separate from Canada. What then, does it say about the man and his party that they continue to brandish, over the people's heads, the threat of one referendum after another until the "right" result is registered? It says, among other things, that their loyalty is to their ideology before it is to their people. The referendum is less an expression of democracy than it is an expedient, well-timed act.

Bloody Shame

The federal and provincial governments announced last month that they would offer compensation only to those people who contracted hepatitis C through blood transfusions between Jan. 1, 1986 and July 1, 1990. A test for screening out hepatitis C tainted blood was available during this period, but was not used by the health care system. The test was not available for use in Canada before 1986. The governments' reasoning rests on the notion of negligence: the system was negligent toward the victims between 1986 and 1990; but not so before 1986.

The reasoning may be sound from a legal standpoint and prudent from a financial standpoint. But it falls far short of the moral example we need from our governments if the best values of our society are to be found other than simply at the bottom of a ledger.

We do not dismiss the importance of fiscal responsibility, nor do we belittle the possible dimensions of the financial risk. We do not gainsay the importance of legal precedent. Nor do we advocate a comprehensive system of no fault insurance for all medical contingencies. However, the situation at hand is extraordinary, analogous to a natural disaster that intrudes upon unsuspecting, defenceless innocent people. The pre-'86 victims, of whom there may be as many as 40,000, became victims through no blameworthy act of their own. They relied on the "system." The system was subsequently proven to be unreliable. But there was no alternative for them. And they ultimately became its tragic victims.

A number of approaches might be incorporated into a solution for the pre-'86 victims. For example, compensation could be less than that for the '86-'90 victims, and accompanied by and contingent upon a clear statement denying any legal responsibility while acknowledging that the extraordinary nature of the circumstances warrant extraordinary measures.

We urge the governments to retract their refusal to compensate the pre-'86 victims. In this rare and difficult case, it is more important they do the "right" thing rather than the "legal" thing. The people of Canada understand the difference and will be grateful for it.

Pope Pius XII spoke Hebrew to Jews at Vatican

In view of the news items about the lack of concern by the Catholic church for the fate of the Jews during the Nazi regime, I offer herewith a wartime anecdote that involved Pope Pius XII.

Immediately after the break-out at Monte Cassino, our crew's wireless-radar operator, a devout Catholic, decided he wanted to be one of the first into the Vatican to see the pope. And he asked me to come with him because he was unilingual Cockney English and I was the squadron linguist. We quickly got passes and off we went.

At the Vatican we found a very large crowd ahead of us in St. Peter's Square, all with the same idea of being the first into the Vatican.

A man said to us in English, "Please follow me." Which we did, right through a side door into a very high-ceilinged, very large, and very ornate room. Two other fellows were there ahead of us. Soon a pair of high and richly carved doors across the hall opened slowly and in came four husky Zouaves carrying the pope on a throne-like chair which they carefully lowered to the floor. The pope stepped off. When Dennis (my crew mate) dropped to his knees, His Holiness went to him first and Dennis kissed the ring on the pope's hand. Then the pope shook hands with me. He spoke to us in hesitant English, asked Dennis a few questions about London and Southall and asked me a few questions about Montreal and Canada.

Then he moved on to the other two fellows. Both had Palestine shoulder patches on their shirts, which meant they were Jewish Brigade. The pope spoke to them in Hebrew. Obviously his Hebrew was a lot better than his English because he spoke to the other two at much greater length. After that, he turned to Dennis (again on his knees) and blessed him in Latin. Then he got back on his throne and was carried out.

It occurred to me that in what might have been the pope's first conversation with any Allied troops, three out of the four present were Jews.

Better a teacher than a terrorist

Israel Labor party leader Ehud Barak still has not apologized for saying that if he was a young Palestinian he would probably join a terrorist organization. The retraction is necessary, since Barak's remark unintentionally conveys a legitimacy on terrorist organizations.

Barak subsequently has rhetorically asked, "Should I have said a third grade teacher?" Why not? Yes, a third grade teacher with a strong participation in the Palestinian national movement, or more particularly that part of the Palestinian national movement which peacefully struggles for a just peace incorporating a Palestinian state throughout almost all of the West Bank and Gaza strip, and which recognizes that such a solution will bring to an acceptable end the national struggle between Israel and the Palestinians.

Yes, Barak could have said something like that, thereby indicated an empathy for the Palestinian experience and setting himself apart from Bibi Netanyahu who can do no better than to try, as part of his end-run around the Oslo peace process, to lower Palestinian expectations of what they can expect to achieve in a final status agreement. Israelis and Palestinians alike deserve a clearer alternative from Barak.

Claims statistics on continuity not valid

In the March 12 issue of The CJN, statistics were presented in an advertisement by Am Echad. In this ad, a large, statistically based diagram is used to back up the arguments offered in the text. That argument, if I may quote, was: "The lesson of the chart is clear. The greater our commitment to our mutual 3,000-year-old Jewish religious heritage, the greater our chance of surviving as Jews."

The chart showed that in the fourth generation, Orthodox progeny would number around 911, starting from 100 in the present generation, and the rest of the North American religious movements would number between five and 24. The chart, as it is presented in the article, is misleading and demonstrates an ignorance of statistics. Am Echad would have you believe that this is a clear indication that Orthodoxy is the only way to propagate Jewish identity, when in fact, the chart primarily shows the effects of the larger average size of an Orthodox family when compared to those of other movements.

Suppose we start off in our current generation with 100 people comprised of 50 couples. Just for argument's sake, we will assume that the assimilation rate is zero and and that the average family size is one. This means that each couple produces one child. By the fourth generation, the total number will be reduced to 13.

I have written a larger piece on this subject but this covers my main point.

Our soldiers' seder, Germany 1945

By ELLIOTT GLUCK

Every seder I have attended has illustrated the continuity of Jewish life and the family orientation so central to this celebration of freedom. In 1945, however, I celebrated a seder with four significant differences from all others – it was held in the afternoon, it took place in a badly damaged school gymnasium, the "family" were all servicemen unknown to me, and it presaged the end of the Nazi tyranny and the Final Solution from which we would shortly be redeemed.

This story is personal, as I saw it as a participant; I also present the view of Chaplain Sam Cass, as he reported it to the Chaplain-General of the 1st Canadian Army, and that of two Canadian war correspondents who reported this public celebration on German soil. The excerpts from Rabbi Cass and the correspondents are based on material from the Cass Collection, at the National Archives of Canada in Ottawa.

I do not recall the date itself, but that mid-morning I had a surprise visit from an army chaplain. My Yes to questions about my name and religion resulted in his bundling me into a jeep, telling the driver to take me to a location unfamiliar to me. We drove off at once, and my mystification increased as we proceeded east (as I later learned). After passing a number of tanks under camouflage nets on both sides of the road, we entered a small town, obviously the recent target of some heavy artillery barrages and enemy engagement.

Our destination proved to be a bombed-out building, which contained a considerable crowd of army and air force personnel from a hodge-podge of units and services, as was evident from their flashes and insignia. We entered a large hall with the roof blown off, the walls pock-marked with bullet holes. We sat on whatever we could find, at a number of fold-up tables. A dais had been set up, and on the table, covered with what appeared to be a sheet, a set of candelabra graced the scene.

The head table was soon occupied by a number of servicemen and the candelabra lit. I described the services in a letter to Rabbi Oscar Z. Freeman, then the rabbi of the United Synagogue of Ottawa. It was printed in part in the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin dated 8 June 1945:

"I think you will find that the boys who came back from overseas will for the most part feel a greater need for religion in the deepest sense of the word. If I can generalize from my own experience and thoughts, we all want a philosophy of life to build on, and that philosophy can best be built on religious principles. I felt this most strongly at a seder service I attended in Germany. We had almost 200 there. It was in a ruined building in a wrecked German town (Cleve). And yet it was all the more precious to us, because in spirit it took us from filth, destruction, poverty and hate back to our homes at this happy time of year. It made us all realize how important our Jewish way of life is to us all.

"It was not a very impressive ceremony, from a realistic standpoint. Our meal was only faintly removed from traditional army food, but the spirit was there. The candles in front of Chaplain Cass were in a cross current of air, but they burned right through the ceremony. It seemed to symbolize the strength and endurance of our ties with home, and all the things which are precious to us!"

From The Rabbi's Daily Logs

(These brief excerpts from the Rabbi's daily records and monthly reports are quoted directly. I assume all responsibility for the choice of material.)

20 Jan. 45 – Passover is not too far away. In fact, I have been working on it already for some weeks. By the events taking place now, it might well be that Passover will be a real season of liberation. [The Battle of the Bulge had recently ended in Allied victory.]

22 Jan. 45 – This morning I presided at a conference of Jewish chaplains serving within the 1st Canadian Army on Passover preparations...a meagre bill if we could get it...tinned salmon and vegetables...some matzah meal pancakes...enough fresh eggs to have at least a quarter for each...none of us know where we [will] hold the seders.

Chaplain's Bulletin Dated 11 Feb. 45

Pesach, Zeman Cherusenu, the Season of our Liberation...will be observed from sundown, Wednesday, March 28 to sundown, Thursday, April 5...I hope that military exigencies will allow everyone to attend at least one seder...While it is impossible for our fellow Jews (the civilian populations) to join us...all of us want to brighten their yom tov ... I suggest that each of us make a gift of tinned fish and other non-leavened food which ... I shall present in your name for distribution on a community basis.

Monthly Report, March 1945

Supplies – The basic religious supplies for Passover...included matzah (unleavened bread), wine, and a kosher tinned meat preparation...tinned vegetables, fruit, tea and sugar...from formation supply points...I obtained paper plates and wine cups in Belgium, as also the green vegetables and bitter herbs required in the seder. Cutlery and dixies were loaned to me by 2 Canadian Corps.

Location of Celebrations – Because of the uncertainties of the operational picture on Passover, it was advisable to postpone definite plans...as late as possible ...Two locations were finally chosen in forward areas – at Cleve, Germany, for 2 Canadian Corps, and at Greve, Holland, for 1 Canadian Corps...

A work gang of German labor was provided at Cleve. [The irony of this is commented on by the war correspondents!] The Provost Corps signed all routes for both locations [to ensure freedom from enemy mines].

Distribution of Matzah – U.K. Jewish Welfare sources permitted approximately two (2) pounds per man... Troops were also able to get it at the celebrations, if supplies did not reach them in time...Troops actively engaged in operations who could not attend services had the unleavened bread with them in the field.

Chaplain Rabbi Sam Cass [CJC Archives]

Notification of Services – Through First Canadian Army routine orders, by signal to Headquarters of all formations and individual circular letters to all affected personnel. [The detail given by Cass under all these headings ensured official recognition of all the formations and the many officers and men who contributed.]

The Celebrations – I conducted four (4) celebrations on the 28th and 29th of March at Cleve, Germany...More than 225 men, Canadian and British, assembled round the tables. There was no doubt at their joy at being able to commemorate the Festival of Freedom on the soil of the enemy of all human freedom. The recitation of the Hagaddah took on new meaning, for in truth, the struggle they were engaged in was the freeing of the whole world from the threat of enslavement and bondage...Many present on the first day were already across the Rhine and in action when we reassembled for the second celebration...The same evening I held celebrations at Grave, in Holland...159 Canadian and British personal, including RAF, attended each evening.

On the afternoon of the 30th of March, I conducted a seder at Nijmagen for the civilian community and about 35 troops. This was the first Passover these surviving remnants of Jewry enjoyed in the past five years. We met in the vestry of the synagogue, formerly the home of the rabbi, who had been deported by the Nazis. The synagogue itself, once a beautiful sanctuary, had been desecrated and stripped by foul vandal hands.

The chairman of the group in addressing them said that the passage of the Hagaddah which reads "This year we are in bondage; next year may we be free" may well be amended for them to read "In the past year, we were in bondage; but this year we are free." This was a dramatic gathering, and its impressions will not be forgotten by all personnel, British and Canadian, who attended." [These words brought tears to my eyes when I first read them – they still do!]

Rabbi Cass expressed his gratitude as follows: "The arrangements outlined in the foregoing paragraph touched on many branches of the Army and Corps headquarters whose splendid cooperation made the celebrations a success and enabled all personnel who could possibly attend to observe the Passover."

The Canadian Media Report

Gerald Clark, of the Montreal Standard, wrote about the seder in these words: "With the Canadians beyond the Rhine, March 31 – When Moses parted the Red Sea, he led his people from the oppression of the Pharaohs. This week descendants of those tribes of Israel are commemorating their deliverance from bondage on the soil of a 20th-century Pharaoh whose fanaticism and terror were far more devastating than that of any ancient. Jewish soldiers from all parts of Canada are across another Red Sea. The Rhine flows swiftly behind them."

Ralph Allen reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail under the heading, "Army Jews Celebrate Ironically In Germany," from Kleve, Germany, on March 29 – "Three hundred Jewish soldiers of the 1st Canadian Army stood in a much-shelled gymnasium here yesterday and humbly brought back the faith of their ancestors to the country that for 11 years had sought its extermination. Grouped around long wooden tables laden with wine and unleavened bread, they celebrated the ancient ceremony of the Feast of the Passover, much as Jewish members of the British, American and French armies, fighting on their right flank, were celebrating it in other parts of Germany. It was their belief that until today the feast had not been observed publicly in Germany since 1939, but in Cleve there was no one who could say for sure. In this entire community, not a single Jew was left to testify when the Allies took the city a month ago.

"Capt. Samuel Cass, a Toronto rabbi, who conducted Wednesday's ceremony, said there used to be a sizeable Jewish community in Kleve. I searched for the site of the synagogue in what is left of the town but could find no trace of it. Nor have they been able to find any trace of a German Jew here. The whole community might have been swallowed up by the earth.

"...Capt. Cass was assisted in the reading of the seder by Pte. Alfred Cohene of Montreal, a 19-year old infantryman of the Black Watch. As the youngest member of the gathering, Cohene read the traditional four questions and the chaplain, as head of the extemporaneous family, responded with the story of the flight from Egypt... The impromptu banquet hall was cleaned by German women before the ceremony. The irony was unintentional."

Elliott Gluck was lieutenant (Platoon Commander) in the 2nd Armored Brigade (#84) Company, Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, at the time of this seder.

Opinions

A Passover reflection

Pope John Paul has issued the Vatican response to the Holocaust, what his Cardinal to the Jews calls an "act of repentance." While the entire document will be read by few, what has been quoted in the media leads one to think that the Pope's reaction to the Church's role in the Holocaust is, at best, spotty.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

What caught my attention was this: "The Shoah was the work of a thoroughly modern, neo-pagan regime. Its anti-Semitism had its roots outside Christianity, and in pursuing its aims, it did not hesitate to oppose the Church and persecute her members also."

This attribution of paganism to Nazi theology is compelling, coming as it does in a year when Passover falls on the same weekend as Easter. Furthermore, Jesus was celebrating Passover with his disciples. Sermons cannot help but make the connection between Jews and the death of Jesus.

In the Middle Ages, those sermons were deadly. Priests whipped up their congregations to a fever pitch; mobs descended on the Jewish quarters to avenge their savior's death. Never mind that their theology was faulty; Jesus had to die for salvation to reach them, but congregants were unlikely to understand the fine points. They understood that the killers of their lord were still above ground and they did their best to correct that error of the Almighty. The Crusades were the worst example of this theological deathtrap, but by no means the last.

That the Pope can sweep away the Church's responsibility for centuries of Jew-hatred as a background cause of the Holocaust is shocking. He may say individuals erred, but it is clear that the Church bears responsibility. No matter how many statements it issues absolving the Jews of complicity in Jesus' execution, the average church-goer at Easter will listen to reading after reading from the Christian Bible that identifies the Jews as the instigators of his conviction. In Christian documents, art and music, the Jews are guilty. In the minds and hearts of Catholics in the 1930's, Jews started with a theological handicap they could not lose. Until the Vatican opens all the documents to all scholars, it cannot simply issue statements of opinion and call them fact.

For instance, a pastoral letter issued by the Polish Catholic Primate in the 1930s urged a boycott of Jewish businesses. It is this kind of institutional cooperation with Nazism that the Church must acknowledge.

In the language of students, the Pope just doesn't get it. Masses of pagans didn't invent anti-Semitism in 1933; it was nurtured by 2,000 years of Jew-hatred. The Church as an institution is responsible for that.

As an institution it must open its archives to all scholars and allow them, not Vatican bureaucrats, to examine the facts. The Church cannot apologize for what individuals did; it must speak for itself as the arbiter of theology.

Individuals, on the other hand, have acted.

Readers know that in British Columbia, a resurgence of neo-Nazi groups has put places like Oliver and Salmon Arm on the map of hate groups in Canada.

As far as I know, few rabbis have spoken from the pulpit on this matter, but I know of one Catholic priest who not only preached to his parishioners about it, but solicited their financial support for legal help for David Lethbridge. The Vatican may not be ready to admit its error as a Church, but individuals are making a difference.

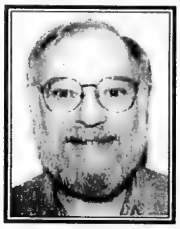
One more example of many. Since 1975, our community has held a major symposium on the Holocaust for public high school students, bringing thousands of teens and hundreds of teachers to hear survivors' stories and learn ways of teaching the Holocaust in school. That symposium was created by a unique committee under the aegis of Canadian Jewish Congress: the committee was composed of a Catholic theologian and several other non-Jews, as well as survivors. All were committed to teaching the truths of the Shoah. Their efforts have given uncounted numbers of teens and their teachers the information and the emotional stamina to withstand Holocaust deniers and to counter racism in any form.

So while I know that Good Friday and Easter sermons will be filled with words that would wound us as Jews, I know too that Christians who understand the origins and the true meaning of their faith will not be learning the lessons of hatred. Until the Vatican can find a way to change its theology, that's the best we can hope for.

Stanley Cup Seder

If the ancient Hebrews took the time to prepare for Pesach the way we do, they never would have made it out of Egypt.

You may not have heard yet, but I was recently appointed Commissar of Pesach Protocol by the Chief Rabbi of Igloolic. (Or is it Oomglic?)



By Shel Krakofsky in London

It is a long overdue responsibility that I welcome and plan to discharge with honor and slanted sincerity. Finally, you are united and directed by a single and enlightened leader.

It would not be prudent to fully enumerate all the regulations, as people are already overwhelmed by their own Pesach lists. So here are just a few of the rules:

- Seniors are not allowed to shop in pairs at any supermarket during the Passover season.
- Seniors who insist on shopping alone must be accompanied by a former cheerleader or a current speed skater.
- Any item marked "kosher for Passover" must be sold at half-price, with double Air Miles.
- All sales of chametz must be reported to Revenue Canada. In Quebec, these sales must be personally delivered to Jacques Parizeau.
- Anyone who leaves home to avoid Pesach preparation and cleaning – especially to Florida, New York or Israel – must, upon their return, perform 100 hours of community service. In my kitchen.

Whatever you do, be sure to make yourself available for further orders.

There have been requests to reproduce the poem, Stanley Cup Seder. Over the years, individuals have contacted me for a copy to read at their seders. I am happy to once again share the poem and recall a time when living and Pesach seemed much easier. And hockey was less complicated to follow.

Stanley Cup Seder
Our seder is longer though the story's the same,
we'll get it all in now,
there is no big game.
Once we skated through it the Answers could wait
the seder was rushed,
"...the game's on at eight!"

Bubbie and Zaida told us to eat slower, read more, but we'd leave our Haggadahs to find out the score and watch on TV
our regular seder guests,
Howe Hull Mahovlich
the Richards at their best.

We knew who escaped the Egyptian plagues and sins but with the Leafs and Canadiens, who'd first get four wins?
So the door was kept closed
Elijah barred from his cup
Zaida could only resume
after Lord Stanley's Cup.

Four cups of wine
this seder's full length, expansion, a longer schedule have cut NHL strength and our passion for hockey baseball's now the game, the Blue Jays and Expos their seders not the same.

Puck finals after Pesach are certainly no treat, now baseball overlaps hockey – like mixing milk with meat.
With Gordie Howe missing
bitter maror we eat, and without Bubbie and Zaida
it's even more incomplete.

We eat the afikomen and make a wish for later:
Next year in Jerusalem,
another Stanley Cup seder.

A Pesach wish

Increasingly I see my name cited in the Israeli press. It is a somewhat dubious honor.

Of course lectures and writers love to have others take up their thoughts and quote them, but not when this is done out of context.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The latest two instances that caused me to write this column appeared in the Jerusalem Post (in English) and in Ha-Tzofeh (in Hebrew). In both cases, they are not editorials but opinion pieces (the Jerusalem Post is a secular newspaper, and Ha-Tzofeh the official organ of the National Religious Party, formerly identified as Mizrachi). Both quote critical remarks I was said to have made about Reform Judaism.

I cannot identify the quotations attributed to me, though I am sure I made them in the context of a serious self-critique of the Reform Movement and they were coupled with "if" and "buts." That is the nature of every self-critique of this kind, and especially so when made in public.

I do believe the Reform Movement exhibits significant weaknesses along with great strength and promise. I have said so in the past and I will continue to say so. I also believe that among the major movements in Judaism, Reform has been and most likely will continue to be the one that consistently examines its successes as well as its failures.

I frequently criticize those Reform Jews who believe that their view of Judaism excuses them from most obligations and that personal autonomy permits them to follow every modern trend. It is the kind of radicalism that I deem to be out of step with the ideals of Reform Judaism as I understand them.

We would all be better off if we would combine our critique of other movements – whether justified or not – with a hefty dose of self-criticism. This is something which I find all too often lacking in those who love to demonize the Reform Movement and label it as sheer heresy or single it out for some other opprobrium.

Quite aside from all else, it is well to remember that every movement, whether religious, social, political or intellectual, has a whole spectrum of putative spokespersons. It so happens that there are radical and conservative supporters of Reform, and the same is true of both Conservatism and Orthodoxy. We all like to cite those opinions that show them in the worst light and ourselves in the best. Doing so may have some political advantages, but it is neither totally honest nor helpful to klal Yisrael.

I respect others for their interpretation of Torah and its demands. The late Rabbi Gedalia Felder, dean of Canadian Orthodoxy, often spoke about this and both he and I accepted each other as friends for who we were – without necessarily embracing each other's point of view. Our community would be immensely strengthened if we began to find our road back to civility, intelligence and true Jewish interaction. That is my Pesach wish for all of us and an act of true self-liberation. Chag Samayach!

The Kirshner File

A writer's quest for family roots

Helen Epstein has written a poignant family memoir of three generations of Jewish women: her mother Frances (Franci), her grandmother Pepi and her great-grandmother Therese. The book, Where She Came From: A Daughter's Search For Her Mother's History (Little, Brown), was published recently.

By Sheldon Kirshner

When she embarked on this literary odyssey, not long after Frances' death in 1989, she sometimes wondered whether the effort would be in vain.

Frances, a dressmaker originally from Prague, left behind a 12-page chronicle and a 144-page oral account of a bygone era shot through with human drama and filled with an interesting cast of characters. But could Epstein verify the facts, or reconstruct the vanished world of Czech Jews before World War II?

A 50-year-old American best known for Children of the Holocaust, which she wrote mainly in Toronto, Epstein spent seven years on Where She Came From. She scoured archives and libraries and interviewed people in what is now the Czech Republic, Austria and Israel.

"It was such an exhausting research project," said Epstein, a resident of Cambridge, Mass., who was in Toronto as a guest of Holocaust Education Week. "But I loved writing this book."

In retrospect, Epstein thinks she succeeded for a number of reasons. Apart from her mother's reminiscences, which served as compass for her inquiries, she had the added advantages of knowing Czech, and of having been a seasoned journalist. A graduate of the Hebrew University in musicology and of Columbia University in journalism, she had worked as a reporter for the Jerusalem Post and had freelanced for the Sunday edition of the New York Times. Then there was the matter of timing. Communism in Czechoslovakia had fallen, and archives were thrown open.

As she delved into her family's past, she learned more about the women who had preceded her. Therese, an innkeeper's daughter who was married off to a peddler against her will, was the epitome of a working-class woman. To Epstein's regret, she never found a photograph of Therese.

Pepi, orphaned at the age of eight, was a dress designer in Vienna who balanced a marriage and a career. She was murdered in Riga by the Nazis.

Frances, who was Pepi's business partner when she was only 15, eluded the crematoriums of Auschwitz by posing as an electrician. Barely surviving Bergen-Belsen, she was liberated by the British. In Prague, she married Kurt Epstein (who passed away in the 1970s). In 1948, the couple left Prague with their only child, Helen, and immigrated to the United States.

Epstein had a passionate and complicated relationship with Frances, who died shortly after she collapsed at her sewing machine. During her life, Frances rarely discussed her youth and talked mainly about her concentration camp experiences. Before Germany's annexation of Czechoslovakia, Frances had been "a flirt, a party girl and a clothes horse." The Holocaust, Epstein said, bleached the frivolity out of her. "She used to say she lost her laugh in the war."

Epstein, whose appreciation of Czech culture was deepened by her quest for family's roots, may well write a sequel to Where She Came From. Its focus would be on Frances, the sole member of her family to survive the Holocaust.

Hollywood player

Several dominant figures have loomed large in the multi-billion dollar Hollywood film industry, and in the 1980s and early 1990s, Michael Ovitz was one of the select few.

Smart and secretive, he was neither a studio mogul nor a producer or a director, but a talent agent who headed the Creative Artists Agency (CAA), which wielded enormous influence.

As Robert Slater tells us in Ovitz (McGraw-Hill Ryerson), his revealing biography, Ovitz revolutionized the business. Before the Ovitz era, an agency acquired a client and then sought a script for the said actor. Ovitz reversed the process, selling the "package" to a film studio, and thereby becoming a formidable deal maker.

Invariably, Ovitz reads like a Horatio Alger novel. It's the story of a fiercely ambitious man, the son of a liquor distributor, who desperately wanted to stretch his wings. Starting as a mail room clerk in the William Morris agency, Ovitz quickly moved from that dead-end job to the position of president's assistant. Impressive in that role, Ovitz was promoted to agent.

Eager to advance, Ovitz and four other agents quit William Morris and in January 1975, formed CAA. The first two years were tough, even with austerity measures in place. But they succeeded, pushing aside adversity.

Eventually, Ovitz bought out all but one of his partners, turning CAA into what Slater claims was "Hollywood's most powerful institution." This sounds like an exercise in hyperbole, but there is no doubt that CAA was a force to be reckoned with. Among its clients were Tom Cruise, Paul Newman, Robin Williams, Steven Spielberg and Sean Connery.

Slater, a seasoned journalist based in Jerusalem, devotes a fair amount of space to Ovitz's unhappy 14-month interlude at the Walt Disney Company. In 1995, having been appointed president of that entertainment conglomerate, Ovitz sold his shares in CAA. Yet life at Disney proved to be bitterly disappointing for Ovitz. Given no formal responsibilities by his boss, Michael Eisner, Ovitz drifted. He left with a $128-million severance package, a testimony to his astuteness.

Slater, who clearly admires his abilities, is confident that Ovitz will be a " player" again. This is a man destined for further greatness.

Bring your seder to life

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

Food being dipped, glasses being filled, the religiously fervent discussion about our side finally achieving victory after having been downtrodden for so long – sounds like it's playoff time.

Or seder time, an exercise in vague discomfort for many Jews who confide that they can't wait to get through the "religious stuff" in the Haggadah to arrive at the real focus of the evening – the meal. But the seder was created to provoke curiosity rather than to become one.

More than a history lesson or a tribute to God's might, the seder is trying to model the art of asking a question. Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik points out that we are trying to inculcate in our children and also in ourselves the spirit of inquiry. Because God, he says, needs to be sought out. Part of what it means to grow Jewishly is to develop the mindset of actively pursuing things rather than passively ingesting them.

So why have many seders become so uninspiring? For one thing, because we have not learned to ask our own questions, to translate the Jewish story of liberation into ideas that will be real for each person at the contemporary table. The Haggadah is attuned to an age when Jews were fully informed of the laws of Judaism and hence the Jewish child would instantly notice the change in the daily religious routine. Because this is often no longer true, the rituals that were designed to incite comment have ceased to be understood.

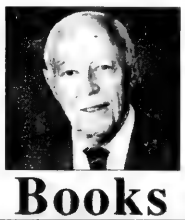
To many people, unfortunately, they seem utterly arbitrary, if not bizarre, as though you could just as well take horseradish and throw it against the wall; kids would ask about that too. Even in religious households the seder can become a static affair, each year bringing many of the same discussions.

Yet the seder should be an exciting event, because it probes one of the fundamental tensions within reality, which is that human beings can be physically free and yet at the same time a slave to something. One can see this tension even in a very small ritual such as Yachatz, which derives from the Hebrew word "half." There are three matzot on the seder plate; in Yachatz, the seder leader takes the middle matzah and breaks it into two unequal pieces.

On the one hand, these pieces can represent slavery, because only somebody poor, destitute, cuts his food in half and saves it for another time. In Survival in Auschwitz, Primo Levi recalls the problem that everyone in the camp had every day – what do we do with our incredibly meagre ration of food when we get it? Do we eat it right away in the morning or do we put a little bit away for the afternoon? This is Yachatz, the calculation of how to stave off hunger, the action that a poor person makes. In this version, the breaking of matzah is equated with slavery.

But another way of understanding Yachatz is as a symbol of liberation. How? Breaking bread is also a sign of sharing. When you divide your food into two, this immediately invites other people to participate in your bounty. It's a kind of invitation. By dividing your food, you're already saying, "I'm not an island unto myself."

Questions abound, especially ones that could be real for children. Why would you break your food in half? What's the last time you shared something with somebody? Was it hard to do? What would you never share no matter how much your friend asked you? What happens to all the food in the world that we don't eat? When we wake up, where do our dreams go?



Books

By Bernard Baskin

A scholarly achievement

The Bible As It Was*, by James L. Kugel (Harvard University Press, $50)

This book is a pathbreaking scholarly achievement. The author, a professor of Hebrew literature and the Bible at Harvard and Israel's Bar-Ilan University, explains and illustrates how biblical interpretation functioned in the years 100 BCE to 300 CE. It makes clear how ancient readers heard and regarded the familiar text.

Kugel draws on the contributions of almost 100 interpreters of scripture, Jewish and non-Jewish, from such varied and unlikely sources as Josephus, Philo of Alexandrea, the Dead Sea Scrolls, the Cairo Genizah, the books of Enoch and Jubilees and the early Fathers of the Christian Church.

The reader is offered a rich tapestry of comments on key biblical stories and personalities (largely from Genesis) from Creation and the Tree of Knowledge, through the Exodus from Egypt and the journey to the Promised Land.

This work involves midrash in its widest sense. It derives from the conviction that the Bible is divinely given or inspired, meaning, that every word has to be scrutinized for its essential meaning, that properly understood it is pertinent for every age, and that narrative gaps can be filled in, vague allusions imaginatively expanded and difficult and problematical passages reconciled or explained away.

Sometimes, even the smallest biblical detail or seeming contradiction can be interpreted to give resonance to vital matters of Jewish law or fuller comprehension of the text.

The author's own comments on the culled selections are helpful and lucid. Some examples from the book follow:

• In the ancient world, Chaldea was famous as a home of astronomy and astrology. Many interpreters therefore assumed that Abraham the Chaldean must have been something of an astronomer. Thus a number of early sources present him as an astronomer and a teacher of occult lore. The book of Jubilees says: "Abraham sat up during the night on the first of the seventh month, so that he might observe the stars from evening until daybreak so that he might see what the nature of the year would be with respect to rain."

• Why did God ask Abraham to sacrifice Isaac? Was God challenged by Satan or by some other angels? In Pseudo Philo, we read: "And He gave Abraham a son in his extreme old age. But all the angels were jealous of him and the heavenly hosts hated him.'" Therefore, God said to Abraham, "Kill the fruit of your womb for Me and bring him forth before Me as a sacrifice."

• The Bible indicates that Miriam and Aaron spoke out against Moses, because of the Ethiopian woman whom he had married. Since the text nowhere else mentions any other wife, some interpreters naturally concluded that Zipporah was, in fact, the "Ethiopian" in question. Writes the Targum Neophyt, "Miriam and Aaron spoke against Moses with regard to the Ethiopian wife that he had taken – but was not this Ethiopian woman Moses' own wife Zipporah? For just as an Ethiopian woman's skin is distinct from that of others, so was Moses' wife Zipporah distinguished, lovely in appearance and beautiful of form, and distinguished in good deed from all the women of that generation."

• The Catholic Vulgate edition of the Bible states that when Moses went down from Mount Sinai, he did not know that his face was horned as a result of speaking with God. The author explains "This translation was apparently based on the apparent connection of the word "beam" with "horn" in Hebrew... The implications of Jerome's translation were not witnessed at once, but starting in the late Middle Ages, Western sculptors and painters frequently represented Moses as having horns."

This large and handsome volume, enhanced by a splendid bibliography and a section on Terms and Sources, will be welcomed by scholars and anyone interested in the realm of biblical study.

Customs surrounding Pesach an expression of love

Pesach is animated by so many customs that it is hard to remember which are customs and which are requirements.

The Torah says to eat matzah and not to eat chametz. Chametz is defined as flour and water that have been left sitting for more than 18 minutes without baking. Once the baking starts, the chametz process is stopped.

Who says that matzah needs to be so thin? Who says that matzah needs to be crisp like a cracker and not soft like pita? Why couldn't it be a little thicker and maybe not cut your gums while you chew it?

Custom. The Rama in the Shulchan Aruch says that we should make the matzah like crackers. Why? If the matzah is made too thick, maybe the inside won't get cooked thoroughly and it will remain chametz. We also bake the matzah at an extremely high temperature in order to avoid the possibility that some part of the matzah may not get baked well enough and will remain chametz.

Why get so nervous about the matzah if the Talmud didn't feel a need to make these requirements? Usually we take our cue from the Talmud – if the rabbis in the Talmud were nervous about a requirement, then it became law. If they weren't worried then why are we? Are we holier than they? Why are we more nervous about the chametz than the rabbis of the Talmud?

It's because the Jew loves the mitzvot. The Torah says not to eat chametz. We love that mitzvah so much that we want to be absolutely sure we do not even come close to eating chametz. We will bake the matzah flat and hot, so that it comes out brittle – it may be brittle but it isn't chametz.

The Torah says to eat matzah. There is a custom to not eat matzah the entire month before Pesach. We want to eat that matzah with love and excitement and anticipation.

The Torah says to tell the story of the Exodus. We will stay up well into the night to do that mitzvah. We will tell the story, sing Dayenu, dip our fingers in the wine for the plagues, and do the mitzvah with love and with passion. After we've finished the Haggadah, we'll stay up even later singing songs, holding on to the mitzvah as long as we can.

All the customs surrounding the seder and the Pesach season are an expression of the love of the Jew for the Torah and for the mitzvot. We want to do the mitzvot in the best possible way.

This year let's smile as we spread the butter on the matzah as it cracks, and as we comment on the burnt corners; let's smile for the passion we feel for the Torah and its mitzvot.

A Pesach smorgasbord

Today for my third and final column on great holiday items on the Internet – a smorgasbord – kosher l'Pesach, of course.

If you haven't finalized your seder menu and are looking for something a bit different, here are some suggestions. Rather than offer isolated recipes, Epicurious suggests two full seder menus [http://www.epicurious.com/b_ba/b02_menus/seder.html]. There's the Modern Passover Feast and the Sophisticated Seder Banquet, in which you dine on Salmon and Smoked Salmon Rolls with Dill Sauce, Fennel, Leek and Spinach Soup, Prime Rib with Roasted Garlic and Horseradish Crust topped off by a Chocolate Sorbet.

You can also find more traditional and non-traditional recipes at Marketnet [http://www.marketnet.com/mktnet/kosher/recipes/passover/index.html] and Holidays on the Net [http://www.holidays.net/passover/recipes.htm]. If all of that is a bit too rich for you, here are some suggestions for a low-fat Passover [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/article.asp?ArticleID=102].

But don't forget one of the great Passover staples, sponge cake. Gil Marks has revealed some of the secrets of baking sponge cakes and also takes a look at some variations including a Chocolate Sponge Cake, Apple-Almond Torte and Lemon-filled cake roll in A Parade of Passover Sponge Cakes [http://www.jcn18.com/newstand/marks/spongecakes.htm].

And finally, a recipe with star quality. You can really impress your family by whipping up Steven Spielberg's Recipe for Matzah Brei [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/article.asp?ArticleID=90].

With just six eggs, two cups of half and half, four whole matzahs and four tablespoons of vegetable oil, it's probably Spielberg's smallest budget production ever.

One of the key pre-Pesach traditions is to sell your chametz to a non-Jew so that you don't own any leavened products during the holiday.

There are several forms on the Internet that you can print out and mail away to a rabbi to act as your agent in this sale [http://www.chabad.org/pesach/chomez.html].

But Montreal's Beth Israel Beth Aaron has gone really high-tech [http: //www.shul.org/chometz.htm]. You can fill out their chametz contract on-line and e-mail it directly to Rabbi Reuben Poupko.

Looking for more on Pesach on the Web? Try these links: Happy Passover.com [http://www.HappyPassover.com/]; Lights in Action [http://www.lia.org /links.html#Passover]; Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx125.htm]; Passover and Kosher Information [http:// members.ocean.com.au/harryc/Passover.htm]; and the Orthodox Union [http://www.ou.org/chagim/pesach/] which publishes an annual guide to Passover and the products under its supervision.

Does your family have a creative Pesach ritual that you'd like to share?

You can strike up a conversation at [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/forum/forum.asp?ForumID=69&TopicID=2] or share just about any thought at the Passover Discussion Board [http://www.melizo.com/holidays/passover/wwwboard/]. For example, Batya is looking for information about the Kos Miriam and the feminist Haggadah issued by Ma'ayan while Steven Cooper wants to enliven his seder by singing Passover lyrics set to show tunes or folk songs.

One of the most famous lines of the seder is the invitation to "whoever is hungry, let him come and eat." So for everyone who has ever endured a seder that included just about every relative, friend, acquaintance and stranger they've met in the past year, I leave you with some of the Ten Ways to Tell You've Invited Too Many People to Your Seder:

Reason No. 9: To recline while drinking the wine, you all have to lean in unison.

Reason No. 3: Even the kids complain that they don't have enough bitter herbs.

And the No. 1 Way to Tell You've Invited Too Many People to Your Seder:

When Elijah finally shows up, you have to give him his wine "to go." [http://Shamash.org/reform/uahc/congs/ky/ky003/seder.html]

Have a kosher and happy Pesach.

Hershon: We must remain vigilant against anti-Semites

By GOLDIE HERSHON

Since my election nearly three years ago, it has been my pleasure to deliver an annual Passover message to members of the Jewish community. This represents the final opportunity for me to do so. My mandate comes to a close at the upcoming 25th National Plenary Assembly of Canadian Jewish Congress May 24 to 26 in Winnipeg.

At the first Passover seder, we retell the story of the Festival of Freedom, the Exodus of Jews from Egypt. Passover also represents an opportunity for family and friends to sit together and discuss current Jewish issues.

As you gather on this occasion, we hope you will think about what kind of role you can play as part of the advocacy arm of Canadian Jewry. The Winnipeg plenary serves as an opportunity to examine, discuss and debate issues of mutual concern. We hope you will consider joining us as a delegate.

There were many seders when we would pray for the release of Jews in the former Soviet Union, Syria and Ethiopia. Thankfully their freedom did come. We must, however, remain vigilant against those who wish to bring hardship upon us. Anti-Semites and Holocaust deniers continue to spread their venom in our country, with the Internet becoming their newest tool.

This Passover we can look back on a successful year of political advocacy on the dossier related to suspected Nazi war criminals resident in Canada. Community programs, rallies, vigils and meetings with elected officials have resulted in significant progress. Since last summer, there has been one deportation while three others were stripped of their citizenship. New cases are also forthcoming.

In Israel, this will be a very special Passover as the Jewish State celebrates its 50th anniversary. Here in the Diaspora, we express our support for the Middle East's only true democracy and pray for peace.

Passover represents an excellent opportunity to look at the agenda before us and see how as a cohesive Jewish community we can work together to ensure continuity for the future.

Goldie Hershon is the outgoing national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Guest Voices

A modest proposal

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

We Jews in the Diaspora often pride ourselves on the way that different elements of our community work together without too much acrimony. When we look at the situation in the State of Israel – at the terrible tensions that exist between religious and secular Jews or at the pitched battles between Orthodox and liberal Jews there – we have reason to feel that the situation here is so much better.

Yet it is good to remind ourselves that the better situation here in the Diaspora is not really because of our moral superiority. The modern State of Israel is perhaps the first time and place in Jewish history where religious and secular Jews have had to work together. To put it simply, we get along with each other here in Canada because we can, almost always, ignore each other. Each Jewish denomination can run its own program of marriages, divorces, conversions or whatever, without really worrying about what any other denomination thinks. In Israel, the structure of the society as a "Jewish state" forces the state to take stands on issues about which the denominations of Judaism do not agree.

Should we then assume that there is nothing we can do here on the sidelines in Canada to further the cause of "one Jewish People"?

I would like to suggest that maybe there is one small step we could take here in the Diaspora to improve the state of the union of the Jewish world.

I have not attended services in Toronto in every Jewish house of worship, but I have been to quite a few and I have heard reports from almost all of the others. I think I can safely say that one sermon theme shows up in almost every Toronto temple and synagogue: criticism of other denominations of Judaism from the pulpit.

My suggestion is a very simple one: let us encourage the rabbis of Toronto, of all denominations, to provide us with the leadership that we need by lowering the level of the rhetoric. Specifically, I would suggest that the captive audiences who have come to pray ought not be subjected to harangues or attacks or other polemics directed against a denomination other than the one present in the synagogue.

Traditionally, rabbis have used sermons as vehicles for criticism of their congregants, challenging the assembled to better themselves and live more Jewish lives. Such criticism, as uncomfortable as it may feel, is to be commended. Criticism of the other denominations or of their leaders is much easier for congregants to listen to, but the ultimate result, from the perspective of klal Yisrael, is to increase the feelings of distrust between Jewish denominations.

I purposely stop short of suggesting that rabbis refrain from all public criticism of other branches of Judaism. Some theoretical case can be made for the need of Orthodox rabbis to explain to their members what they find objectionable in non-Orthodox Judaism and the need for Reform and Conservative rabbis to explain to their congregants what they find objectionable in Orthodox Judaism.

My proposal would not prevent rabbis from doing that, if they felt that it was in Judaism's best interest. My more modest proposal is that congregants ask of their rabbis that, when they gather together specifically to pray, the congregants will not be subjected to sermons whose theme is "the problem with the other denomination(s) of Judaism."

In my dreams, I see the Toronto Board of Rabbis and the Vaad Harabanim of Toronto both adopting this position. What a powerful statement that would be in favor of Jewish unity if our city did that!

Falling short of that goal, perhaps some few rabbis of the various denominations might be willing to declare that their houses of worship offer "factionalism-free prayers," and assure all the potential worshippers that they may hear criticism in the sermons, but they will not hear triumphalist criticism of "those other Jews."

May He who makes peace in the Heavens, make peace for us and for all of Israel.

Community Matters

TIME TO FIGHT FOR ISRAEL'S SOUL

Israel's soul is being tested as never before, according to an Orthodox rabbi with a distinctly open view of Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist Jews.

Rabbi Donniel Hartman, speaking last week to key UJA Federation community leadership, described divisions among Jews in Israel as a "schism which is increasing and growing larger."

He blamed the absence of external dangers and the tendency of Israelis to practice "shul politics" as the main reasons for a deep divide, which he commended the UJA Federation movement for trying to heal. "There isn't a single force for good in Israel that can survive without your support," he said.

Rabbi Donniel Hartman

Unlike a synagogue, Hartman maintained, "the State of Israel is not the particular property of one denomination...a nation is not governed by one idea."

"A synagogue can be as narrow minded as it wants to be. As distinct from a synagogue, we have only one country. The state was founded on the principle that Israel belongs to every single Jew."

The rabbi, who is associate director of the famous Jerusalem-based Shalom Hartman Institute, founded by his father, challenged both those among the Orthodox who dismiss Conservative and Reform religious practices, and the majority of Israelis who have "opted out of the game we call Judaism."

"Israelis," he added, "are living in a country disassociated from religious tradition. For the first 50 years, we fought for the body of our country. The challenge of the next 50 years is to build the soul of Israel."

Hartman warned that religious legislation is not the way to excite secular Israelis about Judaism. His prescription involves education, a pluralistic outlook, helping people practice Judaism at their own comfort level, and a large dose of humility. "I live by the ideology that a Jew is a Jew is a Jew," he said.

Hartman also urged UJA Federation contributors to intensify their battle for tolerance. "Not one institution fighting for pluralism would be in business today," he stressed, "without UJA's support."

The luncheon at which Hartman spoke - sponsored by Edward and Marsha Bronfman, together with Sam and Beverley Cohen – was one of many UJA Federation speaking engagements.

Festival takes Israel to heart of Toronto

Ontario Place, one of Toronto's most exciting and picturesque theme parks, is the setting for next month's Israel at 50 Festival following the UJA Federation Israel 50 Fun Walk, Sunday, May 24.

This year, walk participants celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary, will be stepping together from Toronto City Hall to Ontario Place for the Festival. The Walk begins at 9:15 a.m. Sponsorship kits can be obtained by calling the Fun Walk Hotline at (416) 631-5700 or directly from UJA Federation offices, 4600 Bathurst Street, 5th floor.

"Ontario Place is a great spot for this year's post-Walk party," explains Ray Rubin, who is co-chairing the Israel 50 Festival with Tillie Margolis. "The new downtown Walk route ends at the lake shore so it's a natural location."

The Festival, which starts at noon, or as soon as the first walkers arrive, will include live musical entertainment at the Molson Amphitheatre and three other stages, a "Musical Salute to Israel," sponsored by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, featuring 1100 school children, an outdoor Israeli-style shuk (market) with over 40 vendors, floral displays featuring native Israeli flowers and plants, a giant kosher food tent decorated like a kibbutz dining hall and an eighty foot Time Tunnel, depicting highlights of Israel's 50 years of statehood.

There will even be a live camel available for a photo opportunity at the park's entrance, and a Speaker's Corner where Festival-goers can record video birthday messages to send to Israel.

Admission to Festival attractions, including the Children's Village and all theatres, is free for Walk participants with $25 or more in sponsorships, and costs $10 for all others. Family passes are also available for $40. For more information, please call (416) 635-2883 ext. 321.

Campaign Climbers

A recent UJA Federation's Women's Campaign retreat focused on exercising both body and mind. Thirty participants challenged their problem-solving and team-building skills through activities such as conquering a climbing wall and navigating the high ropes. Volunteer Views Volunteering at Reena's Toby and Henry Battle Centre has opened a whole new world to Miriam Katan.

Although Katan, a mother of three who helps run two family-owned automotive businesses in the city's north end, started volunteering to enrich the lives of others. She says her time at Reena makes her life a little brighter, too.

Each day, more than 100 developmentally challenged adults come to the Battle Centre to take part in a wide range of social, recreational and educational programs.

"I really feel like I'm making a difference when my friends at Reena come up to me with smiles on their faces and their arms outstretched for a hug," explains Katan, who runs evening computer classes for young adults once or twice a week. She also helps to plan social events for the Café Reena program every second Monday.

"I try to be their friend," says Katan, who has brought along her eldest son Gilad to some of the programs. "I wanted to share this wonderful experience with my son and show him how much volunteers are appreciated."

"Miriam is one of the most reliable volunteers we have," says Arlene Margolese, Manager of Reena's volunteer services. "She will roll up her sleeves and do whatever needs to be done."

If you would like to become a Reena volunteer or find out about other volunteer opportunities available within the community, call Shelly Rotman (416) 635-2883 ext. 137.

For the glitterati, Passover means many things

By JOYCE SINGER
Special to The CJN

Why is Passover such a popular holiday for so many of us?

Perhaps it's the deliciously unique culinary delights making their annual appearance (matzah kugel, yummm!). Or the warmth of the family gathered round the seder table to reflect, once again, on the story of Pesach.

Possibly it's the poignant moment when the Four Questions are asked by the youngest.

Then again, it could simply be the sheer exhilaration of being the one to discover the afikoman!

Don Green, co-owner of Roots and father of three children, 15, 13, and 8, says that Passover is full of great memories. "As a kid, I was always in a hurry to get the services over with, so we could get to the fun of finding the afikoman. That was probably the highlight for us kids.

"Since moving here, we try to have my brother's family and my [business] partner's family over, and if there are any 'wandering Jews' out there whom I know of, who are travelling about, then I'm happy to invite them, too.

"I like exposing non-Jewish

friends to it. They love their first experience of a seder."

Yuk Yuk's chief grand poobah, Mark Breslin, says that Passover is "one of the few Jewish holidays with an actual sense of joy to it. It's one of the few Jewish holidays where we don't celebrate our own sense of being miserable.

"I'm not a sentimental guy, as you probably know, but the fondest of my memories are the nice times I had with my family. When I was growing up,we had what I call 'hockey game seders,' where the seder wraps just when the hockey game is about to begin! The timing was incredibly coincidental.

These days I go to my sister's with a date. We have wonderful stuff prepared lovingly by [a caterer]. My sister and brother-in-law spend hours slaving over a hot counter."

Musical entrepreneur Honey Novick says, "Every year Holy Blossom has a third seder, which is an outreach to friends and family of people who are affected by AIDS. I was invited to sing. We do a lot of the traditional Passover music, but we've included a song I wrote the words to…The melody comes from the Ladino Jews of the 16th century. Even Verdi used this music, A Deo Querido, in La Traviata. I simplified the melody and put different words to it.

"My special memories about Passover. It's always springtime, a time when friends and family prepare by cleaning, arranging, cooking. It was a big production number. The difference between Chanukah and Passover for me is that while Chanukah is a triumph of faith and spirit, Passover is about the historical challenges. The significance is different."

Centro's co-proprietor and executive chef Marc Thuet's wife and children are Jewish. What does a top French (Catholic) chef prepare for the family seder, we wondered.

"I'll do a stuffed veal rack,with some dried California cherries, some dried prunes and dried apricots. My wife's aunt will bring the soup over. I'll play around with the desserts and the main course. At the seder, I do everything, too. You know how young kids are. If they don't see daddy doing it, they don't want to do it either.

" For me it's very important that my kids are brought up into the Jewish religion. Everybody should have some spiritual meaning in life. And for both religions, family is very important. My kids are 12, 10, five and three. My littlest one goes to Temple Sinai school. I went to the Temple's Shabbat dinner and my 3-year-old Jules was really a part of it. I was very proud of him."

Can one expect a "Mega-seder" at Mayor Mel Lastman's house this year?

"I don't think so, unless the kids call me Mr. Mega-Mayor instead of Papa. My grandchildren range from 11 to 1 year old."

Will the mayor's wife be slaving over a hot stove this year? "Are you kidding? She's the greatest orderer in the world. She orders for Pesach from a caterer…Our seder consists of our two sons, their families and my wife's brother and niece.

"The grandchildren are wonderful; they know everything and they make sure I do everything properly. One year I had Barney, the purple dinosaur, visit our house for Pesach!

"When I was a kid, my grandfather used to get so mad at me. I'd try to sneak away to listen to the hockey game on the radio or the TV. What bothers me, is that I grew up asking my grandfather the fier kashes. Now it's so strange – I'm the grandfather."

Saudis support peace but...

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO—Saudi Arabia in principle supports the Oslo peace process, but it has no intention of establishing formal relations with Israel until the Palestinians attain statehood and Syria regains the Golan Heights, says Joseph Kostiner, a Tel Aviv University specialist in Saudi history and politics.

The Saudis regard a comprehensive solution to the Arab-Israeli dispute as an antidote to regional tensions and Arab radicalism, explained Kostiner, a senior research fellow at The Moshe Dayan Centre for Middle Eastern and African Studies. "That's their end game."

But the Saudi government has not actively backed the Oslo process because it has yielded insufficient results so far, and therefore, contributed very little to defusing instability in the area, he added in an interview.

"The Saudis fear the process has been too partial," observed Kostiner, currently a visiting political science professor at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C.

Syria has been left out of negotiations, at least since the Likud's return to power in 1996, and the Palestinians still have a long way to go before they can establish an independent state on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, he noted.

In short, the Saudis want Israel to be "more forthcoming" in meeting Arab demands, noted Kostiner, who has written monographs and a major study on Saudi Arabia's historical development.

As well as accepting Syria's overall position on Mideast peace talks, Saudi Arabia agrees with the Syrian view that Qatar and Oman should keep their ties with Israel to a minimum.

Kostiner, who was here under the auspices of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, said that Saudi Arabia has no border disputes with Israel and accepts its existence. However, because it is a strict Islamic state, Saudi Arabia is hardly open to Israel and Jews.

"There's an instinctive, religiously-based estrangement from Jews and Israel."

Turning to a related topic, Kostiner said that Saudi Arabia has still not restored subsidies to the PLO. They were cut off when the PLO adopted a pro-Iraqi policy following Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

"There has been no real fence-mending, even though Yasser Arafat has visited Saudi Arabia several times since the 1991 Gulf War. There's still no financial assistance to the PLO."

Kostiner said he was not surprised when the Saudi leadership, during the recent Iraqi crisis, refused to allow American aircraft to strike Iraq from bases on its soil.

Iraq was not threatening Saudi Arabia, which was the case in 1990. Furthermore, there was a pan-Arab consensus that the crisis over Iraqi compliance with United Nations resolutions should be defused by political means.

Nevertheless, he pointed out, Saudi Arabia theoretically supports the removal of Saddam Hussein, Iraq's president.

Periodic media reports notwithstanding, Saudi Arabia is in no immediate danger of dissolving into political chaos, he said.

"The kingdom has problems. Oil revenue is down, the social welfare system is under siege and there is a restive middle class. But Saudi Arabia is not on the verge of revolution. Not at all. The Saudis can manage their problems."

Saudi Arabic under Crown Prince Abdullah the Second, is likely to solidify ties with Iran, play a bigger role in the Arab political arena, and move toward greater security cooperation with neighboring Arab states, he said.

Grade 6 student shows anti-racism initiative

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Matthew Harris has proved to his schoolmates that one person can make a difference when it comes to fighting racism.

The Grade 6 student at United Synagogue Day School (USDS) took it on himself earlier this year to call the hotline run by the department of Canadian Heritage for the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (March 21) and order anti-racism posters, stickers and teachers' guides. He asked for the name of a speaker and was referred to Karen Mock, director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights.

The result was a March 27 assembly at his school for grades 4 to 6 and another for junior high students. Mock was so impressed by Matthew's initiative that she presented him with the League's Student Human Rights Achievement award in front of his classmates and was to recognize him formally this week at the League's Media Human Rights Awards dinner.

Although it's not uncommon for Mock to hear from students, they are usually part of a committee or have already discussed the matter with a staff member at their school, she said.

"The most wonderful initiatives come from the students themselves. Matthew is a fine young man, and he has a vision of how he wants to see the world," said Barbara Tweyman, general studies vice-principal at USDS' Bayview campus.

Matthew Harris and Karen Mock

Matthew had approached her after he spoke to Mock, and Tweyman gave him the green light to plan the assemblies.

Unbeknownst to Tweyman at the time, it was her own daughter, Justine Tweyman Erez, who had inspired Matthew when she taught his Grade 4 general studies class at the school's Richmond Hill branch.

The class spent a lot of time focusing on human and animal rights, and the students all took to the subject, said Tweyman Erez, who is now studying for a PhD in education at the University of Toronto.

She wasn't surprised to learn that Matthew was the one who'd initiated the project. "He really was one of the initiators. He's an amazing kid...and very serious about this."

Even Matthew's parents didn't know about his phone call, said his mother, Janet. "We're very proud. He's never done anything quite this big, [but] when he believes in something, he goes full force."

A self-described computer freak who has been involved in a variety of extracurricular activities, Matthew thinks he might like to become a lawyer or a psychologist when he grows up. He plans to stay involved in human rights issues on a volunteer basis.

His decision to bring anti-hate material to his school was sparked in part by hearing evidence of racism from other students and around the neighborhood. "I thought I had to do something," he said.

"Jokes are not funny if they hurt," Mock said at the assembly. "Sometimes people argue that [racist] jokes are funny, or that it's okay to tell them about your own people."

It's not, she emphasized. "People start to have self-doubts." She urged students to speak up if they hear any type of verbal abuse.

"It's okay to say, 'I don't think that's very funny, and besides, not all people [from that group] are like that,' or, 'It's not nice of you to call my friend a name because you didn't like what they were wearing.'"

Neither students nor teachers should embarrass anyone publicly, she noted. Rather, they can tell the person privately that what was said was offensive.

"If you're not sure what to say, you can always call us," said Mock. "I don't ever want to hear that someone at USDS called someone a wimp, a tattle-tale or a suck because they went to a teacher to report abuse or racism. In our culture, that's not tattle-taling. It's standing up for someone who's being abused."

Racism starts small, she noted. Stereotyping can lead to prejudice, discrimination and even violence, she said. "You often hear people say, 'It's only words.' The Holocaust started with words."

Many challenges await new head of JIAS Toronto

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sharon Zeiler is taking over the busiest branch of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) when it is at a crossroads.

Jewish immigrants keep coming to Toronto, but at the same time, the federal government is considering a range of proposals whose effect, many fear, would reduce overall immigration.

So Zeiler has her work cut out at JIAS Toronto, where she assumes the executive director's post vacated by Perry Romberg, who moved over to UJA Federation.

Sharon Zeiler

Her appointment was announced recently by Sandra Atlin, chair of the JIAS Toronto regional council.

Zeiler comes to the job from the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, where she was director of wellness and community support services. She was also executive director of Metro Toronto Meals on Wheels, and holds a master of business administration degree from York University.

Fresh from celebrations which marked JIAS' 75th anniversary, the Toronto branch has adopted a new set of priorities to chart its direction for the next five years. These include improving delivery of client services; establishing a corps of volunteers; and expanding the agency's role in the integration of newcomers to Toronto's Jewish community.

In the meantime, Jewish newcomers keep arriving. Zeiler says recent levels in Toronto – between 550 and 600 families, or from 1,200 to 1,600 individuals – will likely be repeated for this fiscal year, which ends June 30.

The bulk of new arrivals are still from the former Soviet Union – mostly from Russia – with a smattering from Iran, eastern Europe, South Africa and South America.

JIAS helps them with housing, language and skills training, job searches, financial help and other settlement services.

Changes denounced

Zeiler jumps into the fray just as JIAS is grappling with sweeping changes proposed to Canada's immigration and refugee systems. Jewish groups and immigration advocates have denounced them as mean-spirited and fear they could lead to a new closed-door policy (CJN, March 12).

The radical changes contained in the federally commissioned report, one of whose authors, Susan Davis, is a former JIAS national director, include abolishing the current Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), with its right of appeal, and giving preference to immigrants who speak English or French and to newcomers with money to invest.

JIAS is lobbying Ottawa to change some of the suggestions.

"Our hope," Zeiler says, "is that [the federal government] will recognize these changes before [the reforms] appear."

Another priority for Zeiler is the "psycho-social" aspect of settlement. She'd like to see more Judaic programming to help immigrants forge links to the Jewish community, and to encourage volunteerism among emigres.

Zeiler is busy planning for JIAS Toronto's annual meeting, to be held June 4.

All in all, "I feel very lucky to be here," she says.

Baycrest seeking summer volunteers

TORONTO — Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care is looking for teens and young adults to volunteer this summer.

The Youth Program, now in its 17th year, attracts about 300 young volunteers from across Metro, who spend a few hours a week during the summer working with elderly people in a variety of programs at Baycrest.

The volunteer experience is open to young people age 13 to 25. As in previous years, the program fills up quickly and anyone interested is encouraged to get an application in as soon as possible.

"It's a unique opportunity for students to work with the elderly and gain practical job skills that they can add to their resume for future jobs," says Sheri Jonas, of Baycrest's Volunteer Services.

In fact, she adds, some alumni volunteers have gone on to become full-time employees of Baycrest after graduating from university and college.

Volunteer positions are available in several Baycrest departments this summer, including social work, therapeutic recreation, creative arts, nursing, computers, food and nutrition services, and clerical. In addition to the practical job training, the students develop leadership skills and gain independence while learning firsthand the challenges facing Canada's frail and elderly population.

Those interested in volunteering are asked for a weekly commitment during July and/or August – as little as two hours a week. Evening and Sunday volunteer opportunities are also available.

No previous experience is necessary. A one-day orientation for 1998 youth volunteers will be held June 25 at Baycrest.

For more information, call Sheri Jonas at Baycrest's Volunteer Services, 416-785-2500, ext. 2575.

DJCS launches Israel Experience incentive program

TORONTO — An Israel Experience incentive program for high school students is being introduced by the Downtown Jewish Community School of Toronto (DJCS), beginning this summer.

Qualified DJCS high school students will be eligible for a one-time grant of $500. Students who have been enrolled for a minimum of three years or have been part of any teen group Israel trip organized under the auspices of Israel Experience or a recognized synagogue, youth or camp group will qualify.

"The commitment of our school to this incentive program suggests a clear recognition of the critical importance of both continuation of Jewish education past bar/bat mitzvah and the power of Israel experiences in the solidification of Jewish identity," said Joan Schoenfeld, principal of the DJCS.

The DJCS high school program for grades 8 to 9 and 10 to 13 is entitled Judaism 101. What is Your Judaism about? Issues of Jewish Identity in the Modern World. It is unique in Toronto. Two rabbis, one Orthodox and one Reconstructionist, share teaching responsibilities. Topics are developed from the individual interests of students and have included such subjects as Jewish Attitudes on Black Magic, Anti-Semitism in Canada, Dating and Marrying Jewish Only – Is It Racist?, and Heaven, Hell and Reincarnation in Judaism. No writing assignments, tests or papers are required. Instructors are chosen for their enthusiasm, leadership and special ability to bring their subject to life for their students.

Classes are held Wednesday evenings at the Bloor JCC. For more information, phone Schoenfeld at 924-6211.

גידי קורן וחברים

יהודי הוליבוד - עדנה מנדלסון:

אין לי ארץ אחרת	לא אשתוק
גם אם אדמתי בוערת	כי ארצי שיננה את פניה
רק מילה בעברית חודרת	לא אוותר לה
אל עורקי אל נשמתי	ואשיר כאן באוזניה
בגוף כואב, בלב רעב	עד שתפקח את עיניה
כאן הוא ביתי.

Hospital bed shortage making home care crucial

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women face a waiting period of two years to be admitted to the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and the waiting period is considerably longer for men, according to Sorele Urman, Baycrest associate director of social work.

It is crucial for home support services to be improved because of the "terrible problem" of a shortage of beds in places like Baycrest, she said.

Urman was speaking in the first of a three-part health series at Leah Posluns Theatre sponsored by Mount Sinai Hospital, the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and the Jewish Women's Federation. TV host Micki Moore was moderator.

Baycrest has a waiting list of 897, Urman said, though not everyone on the list could take a bed immediately if one were available.

The new Baycrest wing under construction will have single rooms only, which, she said, is preferable to the present double rooms.

Some information about the new health rules in Ontario presented at the meeting surprised those attending.

For example, under the new Community Access Centres (there are six in the Toronto area) a co-payment is necessary for people in nursing homes or homes for the aged. A ward rate of $1282 a month can be lowered to $854, depending on income, while the co-payment for a semi-private room is $1,500, and for private room, $1,800.

Sometimes nursing homes and homes for the aged will give people only two days notice that a bed is available, Urman said. This causes a problem that in some cases is solved by payment of the co-payment until the bed can be used.

The majority of acute care patients leave Mount Sinai Hospital to go to their own homes, said social worker Maureen McGillivray.

Only 49 percent of patients over 50 admitted to the hospital eventually go on to long term care, while 16 percent are transferred and 12 percent go to a rehab unit.

McGillivray said some elderly people do not want home support for various reasons, opting for long term care.

An intermediate geriatric care centre at the hospital for those awaiting long term care is proving a boon.

Women make up 75 percent of those designated as care givers, said Prof. Judy Globerman of the University of Toronto.

Employed women give as much of their time to caregiving as do unemployed women, but the reverse is true of men, she said.

URO helping survivors

TORONTO — Applications from Holocaust survivors will be accepted and processed by the United Restitution Organization (URO) in Toronto and Montreal for a fee of $50.

A CJN story (April 2) which gave a New York address will only frustrate applicants because the forms they want filled out are too difficult, said Kurt Herzstein, a caseworker with URO, mistakenly identified as its director in the CJN story.

URO is accepting applications from survivors for both the Article 2 Fund and the Hardship Fund, the latter being a onetime payment restricted to Poles and those from certain parts of Russia.

The Article 2 Fund, Herzstein explained, may qualify applicants for a monthly payment of $395 (based on the current rate of exchange for German marks).

In view of this, he says the fee of $50 charged by URO is reasonable.

The Toronto office is staffed Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, from 9 a.m. to 12 noon 630-2920. The Montreal number is 481-7933.

Ryerson student launches Internet radio show

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Passion is no ordinary word.

Not when it is employed by multimedia maven Aaron Weiss.

For Weiss, passion is his guiding principle in a novel project he launched a little over a year ago – an Internet radio show that explores the personal lives of athletes and entertainers.

Titled Heart and Fire, the program is accessible at a Ryerson Polytechnic University Web site, [www.ryerson.ca/rta/spirit/heart].

The show breaks new ground in combining elements of radio and print and putting them on the Internet for a true multimedia experience. Internet aficionados can listen to recorded interviews through their computer speakers while at the same time reading a full transcript of the discussion on their monitors. Photographs of the interview subjects are provided as well, and the Heart and Fire home page is colorful and attractive.

Technical bells and whistles aside, for Weiss, 24, the show's concept and content are what makes it stand out from the rest of the cyberspace herd. Unlike sites maintained by established radio stations, the material on the Ryerson site was created specifically for the Internet and was designed to incorporate an "interactive experience." Participants are encouraged to comment on interviews and to e-mail suggested topics and questions.

More than that, Weiss said, the program allows him to probe deeper than an interviewer working in the mass media. While the program is outwardly about "athletes and the arts community, it's about who they are and what they have to offer to our community."

Heart and Fire "is real. It deals with real issues that affect people in our industry."

Aaron Weiss

Athletes' statistics, records and salaries take a back seat to a discussion of important events and influences in their lives, he said.

A prime example is the interview with Carlos Rogers, who was then with the Toronto Raptors. Weiss describes it as one of the show's all-time highlights. In the interview, Rogers talked on a very personal level about the tragic death of his sister and what it meant to him. The interview brought tears to the eyes of those at Ryerson handling the technical side of things.

That's the kind of effect Weiss is hoping for – something real, something from the heart that touches listeners on a personal level. "If people can be moved to some degree or another, that's a great accomplishment," he said.

A second year student in Ryerson's radio and television arts program, Weiss is a self-professed idealist who shuns the commercialization that seems to drive many in his field. He's adamant that he'll never accept sponsorship for his show regardless of the business community's interest. That would only lead to dilution of the product and the loss of creative control, he said.

Instead, he hopes to see the show become so popular he'll be able to sell it to the established media. With the proceeds of that sale, Weiss plans to create a scholarship for Ryerson students and give back to the academic institution that helped him.

The show is produced and hosted by Weiss, while Michael Mancuso and Trevor Trinkhouse serve as associate producers. Heart and Fire runs about 48 minutes and it is updated monthly. So far, it has featured interviews with Jose Cruz Jr. and Shannon Stewart of the Toronto Blue Jays, and actors David Arquette and Jessica Beitchman, among others.

For Weiss, Heart and Fire is the latest project in a media career that began when he was a brash bar mitzvah boy. Back then as a "wrasslin" fan of some note, he approached the director of a community access channel on Newton Cable TV and suggested hosting a half-hour phone-in show on the professional sport.

With arena footage, WWF videos and other features, the show proved a success. Weiss moved on to Rogers Cable, and at 15, he produced two shows for the U.S. cable station, Sportschannel America, again on wrestling. Since then, he's produced television programs for City-TV and he's been a finalist for many awards, including best youth program at the Hometown Video Festival in Sacramento, Calif.

Weiss credits his mother Nicole, a Holocaust survivor, for giving him the freedom to pursue his own career path. He plans to earn a masters degree in radio and television arts, become a professor and write books and do documentaries, he said.

LASTMAN HELPS OPEN MULTIFAITH CENTRE

Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman accepts a braid of sweet grass from Catherine Brooks, executive director of the Anduhyaun Women's Shelter, at the recent opening of a Multifaith Centre at Ryerson Polytechnic University. Earlier, Lastman was presented with a kippah and tallit. The centre is a non-denominational prayer room and meditation centre for all Ryerson students, including its roughly 1,200 Jewish pupils.

SECTION B

A MODERN RESCUE: THE STORY OF THE ZABARI FAMILY

The above sketch is a portrait of the last Zabari family in Yemen. They began their aliyah to Israel under cover of secrecy in 1992. Their story is told in a photographic essay throughout the pages of this supplement. Seen here, clockwise from lower left, David Zabari, the patriarch of the family who died in 1991, one year before the family was allowed to leave for Israel; Yaacov Zabari, David's son; Sada, Yaacov's wife; Kadia, David's second wife; Adina, born to Yaacov and Sada in Israel. [All the photos of the Zabari family in these pages were taken by Naftalie Ben David for the Jewish Agency in Israel]

Dream-like poetry

The painting on the cover of this supplement is called Les Amoureux Aux Lys. It is by Marc Chagall. It magically conveys a sense of dream-like poetry in which his subjects, two lovers, are completely enveloped.

"Dream-like poetry" describes perfectly the majority of the submissions we received from our readers to our second annual literary supplement. In response, it seems, to a deeply felt, unresolved, human ache in the hearts of at least two generations of Jews, many, many writers sent us reflections, reminiscences, reveries and remembrances – poems and prose – of the Shoah and of loved ones lost.

"Dream-like poetry" is also the way to describe the modern-day rescue and exodus of the Zabari family from Yemen to Israel.

Jews lived in Yemen from the days of the First Temple. Despite constant persecution over the years, the community preserved its ancestral customs and traditions in remarkably unaltered form. However, after waves of immigration to Israel in 1882, 1948, 1962 and 1992, fewer than 500 Jews remain in Yemen.

A 15-item photographic essay on the rescue of the Zabari family, the last Zabari family to leave Yemen, appears in this supplement alongside a small selection of the original literary works from our readers. The photo essay and these literary works are perfect companions.

We are pleased and proud to publish our second annual literary supplement. We hope it enhances our readers' Pesach holiday.

Wonders

By APRIL SHOUR LAUFER

And G-d brought us out of Mitzrayim with...signs and with wonders. (Devarim 26:8)
The Midrash points out that the deliverance of the Jews out of Egyptian bondage took place in the very last hour. If the people had remained only a short time longer in Egypt, their souls would have been sunk hopelessly under the bondage of slavery.

I never expected to live. I didn't expect a thing, absolutely nothing. There was no waiting for tomorrow. Morning came and I never looked up at the sky. I didn't think what if, or maybe. Each day was like the other – except – sometimes worse.

My life as I had known it no longer existed. I no longer recognized who I was. The person who had been a wife, a mother, a helper in her family's business and then later helping out in her husband's shop; the person who had been happily coddled both as daughter and daughter-in-law, and less envied as the big sister to her seven siblings; the person who was so proud of her family's history as manager of the lands of Count Szilassy, a history that had established the family as successful entrepreneurs; the person who maintained the traditions of her grandparents, but who was still in touch with the modern world; that person was gone, hardly even a memory.

I was as indistinguishable as a rock or a piece of dirt.

It is difficult for me to imagine how I was able to suffer so much. In one way, I am a survivor but in another way I really did not survive at all.

I got up in the morning. I moved from place to place. I took food into my mouth – a black liquid that was called coffee or some hard crust of black bread or some piece of almost food that I found or dug up or rescued. There was never pleasure in the food, there was no sense of nourishment and certainly not satisfaction. But it kept me alive – alive. I know that because I am here today. But then, I hardly thought of myself as being alive.

My life that I had known was gone

I didn't think of myself as me anymore. That I had surrendered – no, not surrendered. The truth was that my life was taken from me.

When they took us to the showers and shaved our bodies and put on our grey dresses – what was that that happened to us? It is not politically correct to say I gave up, to say I didn't care. I am supposed to say how I was brave, how much courage I had to keep on going but when I think about it, in my heart, I think I did not care. I think I didn't know what life meant anymore. My life that I had known was gone and everything and everyone who was dear to me was gone.

I was in Auschwitz, Ravensbrueck, and Malokow, and I walked out of each of these places but the truth is that I died on the day we arrived in Auschwitz.

I died with my dear and beloved mother-in-law who was like a mother to me; I died with my sweet husband who I had been happily, oh so happily, married to for 14 years; I died with my children, my pale, frightened children whose life had meant such joy to my husband and I, my children whose birthdays ended in 1943 because we never celebrated Yuri's 11th birthday or Peter's sixth birthday.

I died on the day we arrived at Auschwitz. The person who was left standing at the gates of Auschwitz was another person. The person who was pushed in line with the other young women, who stood naked while they shaved off her hair and who was given a grey dress to cover her nakedness was someone else, it wasn't me.

It was this other person who survived. It was this other person whose legs and feet were so swollen and so inflamed after the forced march from Auschwitz to Ravensbrueck that she could hardly bear the pain. And still she was forced to keep on going. The barracks deep in the forest had a name given to them — Malokow — but it meant one more place and each one worse than the previous one.

If I say: "Yes, yes I was in places worse than Auschwitz," not many could believe such a thing. Even when I say it I have a hard time believing it.

In Malokow, I couldn't think of anything except the pain in my legs and feet. The pain made me too dizzy to stand. I went to the hospital in the barracks in the forest, in the place that was worse than Auschwitz.

Once I had been afraid that this would mean death but there was nothing left for me to do. How strange to use the word "fear." I had seen so much and experienced so much I do not think I had a sense of fear anymore or maybe because I was almost delirious with the pain the question of fear never entered my mind.

I wonder. I wonder had I known that I would survive, with a weight of only 35 kilograms, and that I would return to my home and walk through the streets that there would be those who would spit on me because I had survived; I wonder if I had known that I alone of my dear family would survive, I would have been afraid.

Consumed by agony

In the end, going to the hospital meant staying alive but at the time I was not thinking about life or death, I was consumed by the agony of my legs. The day I went to the hospital they had opened a second barrack for those who were sick with things other than typhoid.

When I think about it today it seems strange that they allowed anyone to go to hospital. Everyone was dying in this place. There was such starvation, such illness. Maybe because it was close to the end of the war they just didn't want to bother about shooting us? Maybe because we were going to die anyway they decided to let us be? But that was not quite true. Even in those last weeks of the war the Nazis kept order. If someone had a fever she was immediately taken away.

In the hospital, I was able to lie down on a cot without leaning on anyone else, or touching their skin or having to share our lice. The barrack very quickly filled with others. We hardly noticed each other. Each one of us was so sick, so weak, or dying. Each one of us fell into our illness as if it was the end; as if it was our last hour.

Though I lay there in terrible pain I swallowed whatever I was given, the soup, the scraps of food. Even when I got sick with diarrhea I still reached out my arm to take food. And when the girl next to me could not take any more food, I took her soup before someone else took it.

When I look back at all that happened, I wonder why I was not one of those shot, or gassed, or dead from typhoid or starvation. Starving. In Ravensbrueck I remember I found a tin in the garbage and I picked it up and stood in line and stretched out my arm so I could drink the watery soup. By the time I arrived in Malokow I had no energy, no life, but I still survived. I kept going, though I do not know how. I do not think I was trying to live but it seems that something inside of me wouldn't let me die.

I lay in the hospital through the Passover of 1945. I had been in the camps almost one year.

The two nurses who looked after our hospital barrack were incredibly kind and gentle. I did not understand their kindness and certainly would never have expected it. It was a wonder that anyone would bother to look after us at all. We were in such a bad way. Their job was really only to bring us food or to help feed us. There was no water for bathing. Each Sunday we got two potatoes to eat. This was the most we received the whole week. And sometimes, not every week, but sometimes, these women who were caring for me while I rested in the hospital, they put away an extra potato for me. And I would save the potato and eat it in the evening.

When I remember this, I think of how I died in Auschwitz and how this other person survived and maybe that extra potato made the difference between dying and living? We had nothing, no hope, no strength, no human place in our lives and here was this unbelievable kindness. It was simply unimaginable that anyone should care. Maybe that extra potato helped me hold on to some kind of faith or hope? I really do not know but after everything that happened to me, after all these years I still feel such an overwhelming emotion inside me, such a gratitude that I was shown this kindness. What a wondrous thing.

This story is based on the memoirs of Frida Laufer ZL 1903-1997.

Four O'Clock

Four o'clock, and the day falls over the ocean.
Leaves whisper to themselves in the trees where winds blow on white space at the foot of the mountain.

I want to remain true to freefall with its gunshot intelligence, its fearful fishing in anticipatory streams.

God reveals secrets in white waves,
black question marks,
the open pages of falling books.

A Very Happy Passover

Faigie and Rubin Zimmerman

Hide and Seek

By MARSHA LEDERMAN

This fear engulfs me. It squeezes me, pulls me in tight. It surrounds me.

I hear them. Or someone. But probably it is them. I cannot see very well. I hear someone approaching. Closer, closer. They are running. They are close, but still I see nothing. I see fear.

And then I see her. She is alone. Like me. She is large, and beautiful. German shepherd. Like Maddie. Large spot on the left ear. Smaller one on the right hind leg. Just like Maddie's.

In a moment, I understand. It is Maddie. Maddie and me, in a field on a beautiful summer day. The air smells sweet and feels soft against my skin. And Maddie is frolicking in the clean, wild grass. But we are far from home. And I lost Maddie's leash long ago.

The fear is back. I begin to realize what will come out of what, in a sane world, would have been a happy reunion. When Maddie sees me, just smells me, she will rush happily and – worse – loudly toward me. She will envelop me with kisses and panting and playfulness. As if I'd just come back from the market on a cold evening and she hungered for her meal.

Perhaps she won't remember me. It's been close to a year since they took her away. No pets for Jews; especially useful ones. Pets, that is. No such thing as a useful Jew. I remember when they took her away. I wondered who would be next.

"Happy anniversary, my beautiful bride!"

"Beautiful, who are you calling beautiful?" I rush to him with a feather duster in my hand and my cleaning dress on. "Why are you home so early?"

"Well, I wanted to tell you the good news."

"Good news? What good news?" Several possibilities surface: a new apartment, a promotion at work, a motor car, perhaps?

"We're not alone anymore."

"Hmmm?"

"It's not just the two of us in the Goodman family anymore."

My God, was I pregnant? Did the doctor visit David at work and tell him so he could surprise me? Elation. Pure and wonderful. Elation.

"David," I laugh, almost hysterically, "what are you talking about?" I know. I'm sure I know.

"Come outside, Rosie."

Outside? What's outside? A pram?

He comes to me and holds me and looks into my eyes

As soon as the door opens, there is a loud yelp. A dog. A small German shepherd puppy, tied to the gatepost with a brown leather leash. The third Goodman.

A wave of disappointment washes through me. But how could I have been so stupid as to think the doctor would go to David and tell him I was pregnant, especially when it had been two months since my last visit? I suppose hope makes one crazy.

"So?"

"He's great, David," I half-lie.

"She. It's a girl. Because I know how much you want a little girl."

He comes to me and holds me and looks into my eyes. He can see the formed tears, but I no longer feel the urge to cry. So I don't have a child. I have David. I feel like the luckiest woman in the world. I am.

* * *

Today I thank God each day that He did not bless me with a child. A Child in this world? In this hell? A child could not survive. A child could not be a child.

But what business have I thanking God, anyway?

"David, we have to take this dog out for a walk."

"Rosie, we have to stop calling her 'this dog.' Don't you think she needs a name already? It's been four days. Come to think of it, we've now been married one year and four days. Happy anniversary."

"Oh God, please don't start with any more presents, you hear?"

"Yes, master. The dog?"

"Let's name her after someone; a person's name. Not a dog's name."

"Okay. Who?"

"What about your sister?"

"Esther? She'd consider it the ultimate insult. Not only are you using her name while she's still alive, but you're using it for a dog. Something tells me she wouldn't react too well."

"Something tells me you're not thinking. I didn't mean Esther. I meant Madelaine."

"Oh, Maddie."

Madelaine had been born on David's seventh birthday. And died

'It's a great name'

three days later. He had somehow allowed himself to get so attached to her in those three days that he never quite got over it. He always referred to her as the birthday present that was taken away from him.

"Come on, David. It's a great name. And a great way to think of Maddie more often."

"I think of her often enough."

"But in a good way."

Maybe David is tired. Or maybe his desire to give me what I cannot have – life – overtakes his reason. But he agrees. "Rosie, if you want to name her Maddie, that's fine with me. No. It's better than fine. I think it's a great idea. And I think you're a great wife."

"Even if I can't have children?"

"Can't have children? You haven't been trying hard enough. Let's go work on it." He kisses me with the passion of a rainstorm in the spring. And Maddie's walk is forgotten.

* * *

When they took Maddie from us, we'd had her for almost three years. I truly loved her like a child. At least I thought I did. I'd never had a child, so I didn't know what it felt like to love one. But I imagined it felt something like the way I felt about Maddie. My parents thought I was crazy. But then by that time they'd been taken too.

Oh, Mama, where are you?

And then there was this relief. This terrible, sublime relief that it had been someone else and not one of us. So they took Maddie for labor. Better than one of us for death.

We wouldn't have been able to keep her for much longer anyway. Food was getting scarce. Maddie was getting hungry. Soon she would get ferocious. Maybe even turn against us. But probably not.

David and I continued to live on love. Alone.

That morning, we made love, like we always did on weekends. Now every day was a weekend. There was no work for us. Unless you call survival work.

Hanna from the apartment downstairs told me that morning that there might be some bread available, about two miles from where we lived. David wanted to go for it, but he seemed so small, so drained, that I insisted. Besides, I longed for female companionship and a return to some kind of normalcy. Hanna was always good for a laugh. Even then.

PREPARING DINNER
Kadia is seen here preparing for the family meal.

'People are not as blind as they appear to be'

"So what were you and David up to this morning?"

I smiled. "Oh nothing. Just the usual."

"The usual, huh? How do you two find the strength? Especially now?"

"Hanna, what are you talking about?" I was blushing. I felt it. It felt good.

"Rosie, Rosie. When are you going to learn? People are not as blind as they may appear to be. Or as deaf. I hear noises. I know what's going on. I'm just glad somebody's got some happiness in their life. And with David, I bet it's pretty good happiness."

We laughed. Like schoolgirls on their way to an after-school lesson. Only this week it wasn't piano. It was survival.

I returned, triumphant. Seven pieces of bread. Seven! A little old, yes, but seven. I knew David would be proud. I planned to fry them in some fat and have a real feast. Like before.

But the house was quiet. No sign of David. No sign of anything. Except...

Written with haste

unmade bed lay a piece of paper. On it, he had written "Rosie." It was messy; it had been written with haste and trembling. Rosie comma. Simply Rosie comma. What was to follow the comma? Some explanation of where he'd gone, who with, why? Some admission of his deepest feelings, his deepest love for me; for another? A simple goodbye?

I was not to know. I had only that comma. And the blank space beneath it.

For a moment I went crazy. I imagined that Hanna had set it up. That she and David had been having a love affair. That she'd planned the whole bread thing so that he could leave without having to explain anything to me and they could be together. For a moment I believed it. I needed to; to believe in it. Like a religion. But the belief didn't last. Like a religion.

I knew they'd be back for me. We'd already discussed it. There was a movement in France. They could help; it would take just three days to get to the border on foot. And a crossing at night through the dark, quiet trees was possible.

I ran with the unwritten letter. The seven pieces of bread lay on the unmade bed, uneaten. By now they have surely molded over. Like my parents? Like David? The spot on the bed was still damp. Love tears.

Maddie has noticed me. She is running toward me. Galloping with joy! Her old mistress! Oh, Maddie! My child!

But there are no licks or kisses of reunion. There is growling. A hysterical, sickening bark. I remember that bark. I remember its poison aimed at other dogs on our street. At passing strangers. At the men who came to take her away. I cannot remember it being aimed at me.

And now here they come. Twelve, maybe 13. It could be 50. No matter, I have not even strength to fight one.

They have brainwashed more than a nation; they have brainwashed my dog.

Here, Girl. Here.

Family Owl

(For my grandmother, Violette)

When I was little and younger, I imagined her:
the family owl.
She would only leave her gathered birds of nest to swoop imperceptibly back into the kitchen to bring more mothered food.
Eat, my family, her eyes would say.
Do you have everything your mouths need, said her hands.
Her arms breasted like wings and hugged her family's air wide.
Her hair's golden roots pulled back high like a soft feathery crown.
Her mouth became delicate oval.
Her eyes sparkled without wind's blink.
"Who?" she would say, her body flying in and out the kitchen doorway.
It wasn't even really a question most of the time.
"Who?" she would hum with her body until at long last her flight or arc took its place between the family chairs,
her legs still straight,
her arms gently curled for tuck on mysterious lap,
her shoulders, upright, finally, softly resting.

Tropicana PURE PREMIUM®

Holiday in Kovno

By SUSAN KANTROWITZ-AKRISH

They were all dragged from their homes, scholar and laborer alike. Women and children. Neighbors who got along and those who didn't. Unfinished dinners still cooking and left to burn. Clothes sprinkled, ready to be ironed. Baths before dinner interrupted. Wet hair and all, everyone huddled together in the cold street. What good was the warmth of their houses now? Might as well let the goats roam round the scrubbed floors and chew the wooden chairs. Potatoes dug from the fields were thrown aside, left to rot. Food that seemed so precious before now paled before the horror of what was happening. No time to do anything now.

A ray of sunshine fell across the corner of the group. He was cold. He tried to edge his way toward the ray. His toe slid its way toward the beam. Now his foot reached the middle of the glow. It was so warm! He shut out the loud noises, the crying, the barking of the dogs. He concentrated on the warmth. Such a simple thing! He never thought about it before. He spent much of his time outside in the sun. If he hadn't run away from cheder so often, he would have been just as pale as the rest of the boys. But he was tanned from running in the woods, his legs strong from jumping over branches and stones. His arms flexible and built up from countless swims in the lake.

Now, again, he wanted to run. He was caught with everyone else because it was Passover and he had come home on time. The rabble that surrounded them had caught him. He plotted his escape. But if he ran, he would have to leave his mother and father and sisters. Then what would they do without him? He was the one they counted on to be there – to help protect them, to carry on the family name – to say Kaddish for his mother and father when they grew old. He couldn't leave them. They needed him.

His mother was being pushed against his left side. Instead of trying to give him more room she held onto him. She began whispering in his ear. "They are not looking this way. Make a run for it. I hid Sarah behind the bed. She is still sleeping on her blanket under a pile of clothes. No one knows she's there. Grab her and go. Run!" He was stunned. Could it be she really wanted him to take his baby sister away? Where to? To the woods? His woods? "Go on, go on, she prodded him. Hurry up."

He abruptly pulled his foot back

He abruptly pulled his foot back into the group. He slowly sidled his way to the very edge. Then he dashed sideways and was able to hide his small body in the darkness besides one of the houses. He crept along until he came to his house. He went around to the back and jumped inside. The candles were in their silver holders, waiting to be lit. The matzah lay covered on a sideboard. Dishes were laid out ready to be put on the table. The floor had been scrubbed clean and polished. Curtains that were beaten white and starched and ironed hung on the windows.

Days of cleaning and cooking and preparing culminated in everything being just so for this coming night. Candles and fish and soup and a white table cloth brought uncontrollable joy and excitement to even the smallest members of the family. The children had happily skipped home instead of just walking that day. The women had chirped to each other, on their best behavior to get along. Men who were always preoccupied, lightened up and acknowledged each other with a vigorous handshake instead of just a nod and a faint smile. Brothers stopped fighting with each other, and sisters begged each other to take the best clothes for the evening.

He moved towards the matzah in its special tray

He moved toward the matzah in its special tray. He took the cloth off and looked at it. Round and dry and hard. Not his favorite. Stuck in his throat all the time almost gagging him. Maybe when he got to be a man he would be able to eat it better. Now, however, it was difficult. He looked around the room. Carrots were steaming. Cake, a mile high from the addition of all those eggs, held his stare. Soup with knaidlach, gefilte fish orange from all the sweet carrots added to it, chocolates that his father had shlepped for days from Warsaw to their little village, hard boiled eggs, raisins, apples and grapes.

He suddenly remembered Sarah. He looked under the pile of clothes under the bed. She was still sleeping. So small. He lifted her out and wrapped her in some of the clothes. Her eyes blinked once and then closed again.

He heard noises. He kept very, very still. The noise passed.

It was time to leave for the woods.

With Sarah in his arms, he went into the main room and took one last look around. He went over to the sideboard and took out several pieces of matzah. He broke them into small pieces and stuffed them into his coat pocket.

Then he gingerly backed away from the room. His feet were like lead. He was scared. He knew he shouldn't leave home on such an important day. It was Passover and he should be there with his family. But his mother had said no.

He had to will his feet to move away and out. Tears poured down his face as he slowly forced his way out.

Holding Sarah, he swiftly scanned the area, felt the matzah in his pocket and ran with all his might towards the woods.

Command Performance

By JOSEPH PERETZ

The year 1943 drew to a close. This was the second Christmas since my internment in a German labor camp located in the tree-covered mountainous region of the French Ardennes. The entire area was now under the command of an SS major, the very same one who had greeted us upon our arrival with the threat that 10 men would be shot for every escapee.

I was lying on my bunk bed, looking out the window of our wooden barrack, which creaked with every gust of wind. A light snow was swirling, somehow muffling the sound of the music emanating from the Lagerfuhrer's quarters.

The other inmates were sitting around talking, reading, or like me, just daydreaming. Somebody mentioned that Chanukah should be around this time. But who knew when? Days, weeks, months blended into each other. Would this damn war ever end?

The mention of Chanukah brought back memories, long faded memories. I could still smell the aroma of the freshly fried latkes, crisp out of the pan, still sizzling when my mother brought them to the table. With my eyes closed, I could see her face in front of me as she busied herself in the kitchen, wearing her flower-patterned apron. I wondered where she was now.

Recently a gentile neighbor of ours had informed me that my entire family had been picked up in a raid by the Nazis and deported to an unknown destination.

My thoughts were suddenly interrupted when the door of the barrack opened, letting in a blast of cold air. We all sprang to attention as one of our guards entered. He was bareheaded. The snow sparkled on his blond hair and on the shoulders of his uniform. He seemed to be in fine spirits in more ways than one. There was a smile on his lips, a sight denied us since we had set foot in this godforsaken place, 18 months ago.

In a loud voice he announced that Der Majoor wanted to hear the Jews sing for Weinachten (Christmas) and asked for volunteers to accompany him to the Wachtstube (guardhouse).

In my younger days, I had a good singing voice and once auditioned for Jack Kluger, a bandleader in Antwerp before the war. His renowned orchestra played for dances held in the city's biggest hotel. My friend, who was the drummer in his brother's band, had introduced me to him. He liked my voice but expected his vocalist to also play an instrument, which left me out.

Realizing that the request of the Majoor was the equivalent of a summons, I offered to comply. Looking around the barrack, I asked a few of my fellow inmates to join me.

Five of us followed the guard outside. The snow crunched under our feet as we made our way to the guardhouse. The barbed wire surrounding the camp glistened with a thin layer of frozen snow.

We entered the Lagerfuhrer's quarters, where the members of the guard had joined him in a Christmas party.

The room was decorated with streamers, criss-crossing the ceiling. In a corner stood a small Christmas tree adorned with colorful ornaments. A table was covered with the remnants of their Christmas meal. The mashed potatoes, sticking like paste to the plates garnished with green peas, made my mouth water. Compared to our meagre daily ration, their leftovers looked like a feast. Several bottles of liquor were set up on a side table.

They all seemed in a good mood and from the looks on their red faces, it was clear that they had been drinking.

To my surprise, I did not see the Majoor.

Herr Dhoring, the camp commander, was reclining in an armchair. The top button of his uniform was open, his stockinged feet resting on a hassock. His cheeks were flushed and there was a faint trace of perspiration above his bushy eyebrows. The smell of alcohol was overwhelming when he told me in his strong guttural German dialect that the Majoor was in his villa (which was about seven kilometres from our camp).

He picked up the telephone, dialed the number, said "Heil Hitler," and spoke briefly with the major, before handing me the receiver and saying: "Sing."

Still thinking of my mother, I started singing My Yiddishe Mame in Yiddish, while the other singers acted as a background choir and hummed along at the end of every sentence.

The Germans must have understood some of what the song was about. They quietened down and listened, subdued by our singing.

At the conclusion of the song, I handed the receiver back to the Lagerfuhrer who, after a short conversation, returned it back to me, saying that the major wanted to hear another song.

After I conferred with the others, we decided quickly and sang a rousing rendition of Hatikvah, all voices blending and singing as loud as we could.

Thus ended our contribution to the Christmas celebration, exactly one week before the camp was disbanded and its inmates transferred to Auschwitz.

July 15th 1942

By MUGUETTE MYERS

We lived in Paris till July 1942. It was around 9 p.m. on July 15. I was home with Maman. A friend of Maman, was visiting us. There came a knock at the door. It was Maman's sister-in-law, all out of breath. (She was able to hide her Jewishness because she was blond with blue eyes. Talk about chutzpah! Being multilingual, she worked as a translator at German headquarters, which enabled her to know ahead of time of impending raids.)

"You must leave immediately," she told Maman, "because tomorrow the Germans are coming to take away all the Jewish women and children!"

She then left in a hurry because she had other people to warn.

Mme Dumas asked Maman what she planned to do. "What can I do?" she replied. "I have nowhere to go! Tomorrow when they come, I'll take Muguette and go with them".

I was not quite 10 years old. I started to cry. "I don't want to go with you," I told my startled mother. "I won't go, I won't!"

Seeing that I was becoming hysterical, Mme Dumas told Maman to pack a few things and come with her. She would take us to her house to spend the night and then we could decide what to do.

We had yellow stars sewn onto our coats. Mme Dumas and Maman, each with a pair of scissors, removed them. We left our apartment and took the metro to go to Mme Dumas'.

The curfew for the Jews was 8 p.m. and we were only allowed to travel in the metro's last wagon. Maman, Mme Dumas and I entered another wagon. She and Maman sat together in a seat. The seats in the Paris metro, unlike North American seating, face each other. The metro was filled with German soldiers. I took a folding seat flanking the doors.

On the seat facing me was an old gentleman. I noticed that he kept staring at me. He stared at my face and at my coat. I was frightened and intrigued at the same time. He finally caught my eyes and then stared again at my coat. I looked down and saw on the left side of my beige coat the yellow threads delineating the yellow star.

I remember putting my right hand on my left shoulder, and slowly pulling out the threads. I saw the old gentleman smile and he got off at the next stop.

The Lesson

By SHELLEY D. LIPPMAN

The last time I held my grandmother's hand was one week before she died. I remember it well, because we were sitting at her kitchen table talking about my mom, my grandmother's youngest daughter, who died of breast cancer the year before.

Born in 1902, my grandmother – or Nana as we called her – had known a great deal of hardships. But nothing had affected her like my mom's death. She seemed broken. Despite her own grief, though, Nana had really helped me through the crisis by talking with me, loving me and sharing her time and her self.

I remember glancing down at Nana's hand which held mine so gently. It was soft and veiny and it trembled slightly as we talked about mom. We spoke in soft whispers which somehow helped hold back the tears – tears we both knew might never stop once started.

I can see Nana's fingers now, marked by time – one pointed slightly this way, another twisted that way. And if she was angry at you, she'd shake that crooked second finger and you'd tremble where you stood! But now, her fingers were still as they lay lightly on mine – a connection across the generations that momentarily bridged the gap caused by our shared loss. Nobody understood me like my Nana.

As always, Nana was making chicken soup. A piece of Jewish perfection, a cure-all. She kept rising from the kitchen table to stir the steaming broth. She skimmed off some brown froth, tasted the soup, added a pinch of salt, a bunch of fresh dill – mm, I can still smell it – and then she added those few secret ingredients. No recipe, of course. I watched intently, trying to see as much as I could; I made mental notes.

That soup... quieted the screaming emptiness

That soup completely satisfied me. It filled my stomach, and for a moment it quieted the screaming emptiness, the longing for my mom. And for Nana, I believe the act of making it for me helped ease her own pain.

She used her huge aluminum soup pot, all banged up and scratched, etched by years of use. History. Her mother, Minny, had cooked soup in that pot back on the farm in Norwich, Connecticut. Nana used to tell me how they were "the only Jewish farmers for miles." As a child, she'd been a student in the one-room schoolhouse, and had "eavesdropped" on what the older kids were studying.

"I loved the history and the geography," she told me. "I dreamed of going to all those exotic places they were learning about."

Nana became a teacher herself, and forever loved to educate and enlighten others. And she certainly

Yom Kippur Nights

Alive in the memory are Yom Kippur nights in my hometown, in Poland.
The sky there was dark and dreary and a sombre stillness hovered around as if the entire world held its breath in awe before the Day of Judgement.

In studyhouses holy congregations gathered, in reverence before the One who lives eternally and weighs the deeds of all on this day.
The tall yahrzeit candles flickered like the hearts of the assembled men, their tallow dripping into the sandboxes like the warm tears from women's eyes.

In a corner, Father, wrapped in his tallis, was beating his fist into the chest in solemn confession of the Al Het;
and in the women's gallery
Mother poured her heart before the One Above in prayer for her five little doves.

Cherished times

travelled; She boasted of having seen all seven wonders of the world, and had a checklist to prove it!

I cherished these times with Nana. Whenever I planned a visit, I'd make sure to leave the whole morning or afternoon free so that I could relax and enjoy her company and her stories – almost lose myself awhile – before running off.

And she really loved to be with me – which is something I treasure. You know that feeling when someone totally and completely loves you.

I made a difference in her life

When I pulled into her driveway, Nana would be waiting for me, peeking out through a crack in the front door. Her smile told me how happy she was to see me – that I made a difference in her life. She was so excited that she would start talking even before I got out of the car. I could see her lips moving, but I couldn't hear her. I wonder now what she was saying.

And than, once I'd walk into her cozy little vestibule, she would reach up to hug and kiss me and her lips would linger on my cheek – one, two, three seconds at least. I counted once. And I'd smell the chicken soup simmering in the kitchen and I'd feel loved. It was that simple.

That day, I mustered up the courage to ask Nana to teach me how to make her famous chicken soup. I think I was afraid that she would take my request as some sign that she was at the end of her life and I thought she'd better "pass on the treasured Jewish secrets" before it was too late! But I asked, and she was happy to oblige. We set a date for the following Tuesday at noon. Nana told me to just come over; she would order all the ingredients from her grocer. She had her systems. It would be the cooking lesson of my lifetime, and I was ready to learn.

I spoke with Nana the night before the lesson and shared my incredible excitement. She was pretty laid back – calm and flattered, I think. We chatted about the Jay Leno show from the night before and she said she couldn't believe how women were "sleeping all over the place" these days. I guess there had been some actress on the show talking about her love life. Nana was shocked, and slightly intrigued by it all too. I could tell by the way she chuckled when we talked about it, I told her I loved her and said I'd see her the next day. I had no idea that it would be our last conversation.

Nana died in her sleep

Nana died in her sleep that night. When she wouldn't answer her door at noon the following day, I had to get my husband and a locksmith to break into the house. It felt like such an invasion to shatter the glass on her rear door and walk right in like that. I desperately hoped that she would appear, shaking her crooked finger and yelling at us for making such a mess. But instead, we found her lying in her bed, wearing a fresh pink nightgown. Bath water from the night before was still in the tub, and on her feet, her little blue slippers gently cradled her toes. My mom's picture was next to her bed. It was a picture Nana would sometimes hold and cry over. In fact, I still say that Nana died with a broken-heart.

And outside on the front doorstep was a grocery box, delivered that morning and left on the stoop when no one answered. It was brimming with bunches of fresh dill and parsley, carrots, onions, celery, chicken...and a few secret ingredients.

With a deep hole in my heart, I carried the box to my car. I could barely see through the tears that simply wouldn't stop. I also took Nana's big aluminum pot with the scratches and dents. I loaded it into my car and set off for home – I was determined to teach myself how to make Nana's famous chicken soup. A tribute to her. Surely, I could remember, I must remember. Think, think, think! How much water? Do I take the skin off the chicken? Do I put the chicken, or the water in the pot first? How much time do I cook it? And what about those secret ingredients?

I did my best. I felt the powers of my Jewish ancestors and their traditions guiding me. And when I burned the chicken a bit, I actually heard Nana's voice, and her mother's voice, and her mother's voice before her say, "That's okay – you'll learn. You've done really well for your first lesson."

Now, some years later, with a family of my own, I am continually fueled by my memories of Nana and the many lessons she taught me. Lessons about being a Jewish woman and about living well and trying new things. And my chicken soup is actually quite good – Nana would be proud. I like to serve it piping hot, with soft pieces of juicy chicken added to each bowl at the last minute.

I never quite figured out all of Nana's secret ingredients. But that's okay. In fact, dare I say, I have even added some of my own.

Kotel Ha-ma'aravi

How sacrilegious my wish
To give verbal expression
To my first encounter with you.

A thought perches for a fleeting instant
On a corner of my mind
What have I ever done
To deserve to stand near you?

The black characters in the Book of Psalms
Do a wild and grotesque spiritual dance
As they mingle with my tears.

And beneath the diurnal heat of an eternal sun
My heart shivers
In the chilling shadows of all the Jews that ever lived, suffered and died
With the silently screaming prayer
On their parched infants' children's mature and ancient lips
To return to you.

The Four Sons

What says the wise son? What are all these testimonies, statutes and judgments?
Sit him down and instruct him on the laws and customs of the Passover.
Tell him we were all worthy of being saved, irrespective of our religious stripes.
No man was better in Hashem's eyes, we were all redeemed as one people.

What says the wicked son? These customs are irrelevant to me.
Challenge him, do not be afraid to stand before him and criticize him.
He represents the extremes, intolerant to anyone who is different.
Such a person will never be worthy of redemption.

What says the simple son? What is this thing all about?
Explain to him how we were brought out of Egypt with a mighty hand.
Do not ignore him because he is unable to reach your intellectual heights.
Such a person is full of kindness and compassion and deserves our attention.

What about the son who is unable to ask? Open up his mind.
Tell him that the seder is the story of how we came out of Egypt.
Encourage him to participate in all the customs of our festivals.
Only through his actions will he find his place in the House of Israel.

by Michael Eskin

Third Generation

This lullaby is written for those preparing to embark on The March of the Living.

The journey you have chosen,
Presents joys and tears.
Rejoice, sing, dance freely,
While confronting your fears.
The actuality of the Holocaust
Stares you bitterly in the face.
Be strong, act with courage,
Remember God's grace.

Remember the blood, the pain and the sorrow.
Yet open your mind to the needs of tomorrow.

Be honest with yourself,
Let your emotions wind their course.
Look deep into your heart,
Find inspiration from remorse.
Absorb every detail,
Ignite your mind to create.
The memories so personal,
Yours to contemplate.

Remember the blood, the pain and the sorrow.
Yet open your mind to the needs of tomorrow.

Her Friday Savings

By POLLY GRYFE

She awoke slowly, reluctantly gaining conscious, her mind drowsy and sluggishly responding to the ping of the alarm clock and the early morning light. Half asleep she muttered good morning to her husband and then remembered today was Friday. Suddenly she was alert. The new day had purpose and stimulation. All the children were coming tonight – 18 at the table.

She wryly chuckled at her childish excitement at this regular weekly event. Her Wednesday phone calls usually decided the number at the table and seldom did she and her husband usher in the Sabbath alone.

It had begun when the first of her children married, and now after nearly 20 years, with four married children and eight grandchildren, Friday night had become a family tradition.

In a world of the diminishing family unit, they had, without cloying intimacy, established a pattern of sincere dedication to one another. As the day progressed, she cooked and baked, and the familiar house took on the fragrance of a provocative aromatic bouquet.

She was no gourmet cook. The food was wholesome and plentiful. Soup, a melange of leftovers; roast a study in juicy red and brown rivers; applesauce, a trifle lumpy and stewed from slightly bruised, marked down fruit; and finally chocolate chip cookies in various shapes and sizes but piled high in large numbers.

The table soon sparkled with cloth, glass, dish and spoon. Seating was arranged, including the inevitable high chair for the youngest grandchild.

She stood surveying her work and mentally checking everything. Only then did she feel the tiredness creep over her body. Idly and in abstract thought, she mused to herself. Was she a fool to devote so much of her time and energy to the children? In this expanding women's world of new opportunities and widening horizons, was she a slave of habit? Now into her 60s, how much longer could she carry on like this? With truthful perception, she admitted to herself that her old fashioned role was an integral part of her life and she would never change now. Dismissing these thoughts, she sat down near the window to watch for their arrival.

Eager young hands helped place the food on the table

She and her husband had been the first to move onto the street of modest homes, and after 18 years, they had watched their neighbors and families arrive and grow. She smiled, remembering the jovial comments about her Fridays. They needed no calendar to know the day of the week. They just counted the cars parked on the street. They laughingly threatened to surreptitiously include their own children at the table; she would be too busy to notice the increase.

She must have dozed, for suddenly voices were shouting hello, hangers in the hall cupboard were clacking and overshoes were falling with a flopping noise. The front hall was in danger of buckling with the stress and strain of humans large and small.

She and her husband were hugged and kissed, as each child made a dash for the table, clamoring and choosing their favorite place and deciding whose turn it was to sit beside grandpa. The high chair always stood beside her chair.

Seating arrangements completed, a respectful silence pervaded while she made the blessings over the Sabbath candles and her husband intoned the prayers for the wine and bread.

Eager young hands helped place the food on the table and healthy appetites proceeded to enjoy the efforts of her day. The table conversation rose and whirled about like a symphonic crescendo of sound, each vying for attention and trying to outdo one another in the telling of events of their week. The subjects were varied and ran the alphabetical gamut from accountancy, art, books, babies, calisthenics and economics to medicine, politics, surgery, weightlifting, war and weaving.

In a short time, the once laden table was strewn with crumbs and empty dishes, disorganized cutlery and crumpled linen.

Hunger gratified, grandchildren asked for and received permission to scramble off chairs and investigate the TV or the ever growing collection of books and toys that were always found about the house in abundance. The regrouped adults continued their conversation over second cups of tea, and she felt the air of kindred camaraderie and high spirits all around her.

Too soon it was time for them to leave. Once again, the front hall bore the onslaught of children and adults; coats and boots were claimed and donned. This time, the walls rang with goodbye and thank you and she and her husband received dutiful hugs and kisses again as they watched them leave by the open door.

She closed the door and turned, the deafening silence welcome and intimate with meaning after over 40 years of marriage. They arranged the disheveled rooms without speaking a word, knowing with practised and accustomed habit how and where each item belonged.

The task was soon done and the last dish stacked. She sighed. "Another Friday come and gone," she thought. "Another deposit in the bank of family memories."

Landscape of Bogria

On the occasion of the 135th wedding anniversary of Ruchel and Isaac Wegman

If we could lay the past out like a landscape and sketch in silhouettes of ghosts instead of trees and fields and houses we might see, a little to the left where Ruchel was born,
there a little further where she married Isaac,
then in the centre of their lives each child was born, seven daughters, two sons dusky figures floating in an ornament of time,
If the past could stretch before our eyes
Bogria a hundred years ago,
just yesterday,
the wooden walls, the muddy streets verging into forest would we know them any better, those who are named for, whose faces haunt us while we sleep?
We might find them round a table, laughing picking bones out of their herring, eyes and hair dark as a Polish night voices as familiar as rain on the grass.
We could watch them poking raisins into cheesebuns, laying challah in the oven for Shabbos
when Ruchel would wave her sturdy hands above the candles and murmur blessings, her children gazing high into the air unaware that their roots would one day be severed, that their landscape, our past, would curve across an ocean and land in alien soil. How could they know that we would yearn for them across a gulf of years from another continent, hungry for the knowledge of their faces yet strangely satisfied that their eyes follow us when we look in the mirror.

The Winter My Grandfather Died

By MARC MILLER

Der zeyde iz geshtorbn auf mayn geburtstog
On a zay gezunt, on a plan
Itst benk ich noch im vi noch a fargangenem zumer
Dem zisn altn man

My grandfather died on my birthday without saying goodbye, without a plan
Now I long for him like for a long gone summer
For that sweet old man

— by Moyshe Zuchmir

The winter my grandfather died, I was in New York beginning a PhD program in Yiddish literature. I was working on an exhaustive study of the poetry of the little-known Montreal Yiddish poet, Moyshe Zuchmir.

My grandfather had been sick for a few weeks and he was hospitalized at the beginning of November. I had spoken with my mother and she had assured me that he was all right, that this was just a routine procedure. The doctor merely wanted to take some tests. There was no need for me to come home. Since my family has always been prone to hysteria, I assumed that if something was truly wrong, they would not hesitate to scare the life out of me and make sure I was on the next bus, train or plane home.

After my grandfather had been in the hospital for two weeks, my mother told me that the doctor had said my grandfather needed emergency surgery. He had a torn bowel and if it was not repaired, he would die. Moreover, the surgery itself was risky because of my grandfather's age and physical condition, and therefore his chances of survival were one in two. Kind of like betting on red or black in roulette.

As soon as I got off the phone, I made arrangements to come home. My friend Rebecca came with me on the first bus we could catch at Port Authority. It was the overnight and it arrived in Montreal at 6:30 a.m.

I took a cab straight to my grandparents' apartment. I had planned to get my grandfather's car (still truckin' at 86) and drive directly to the hospital where I had hoped to cheer him up. However, when I arrived, my grandmother told me that he was gone. Just like that. "Marc, he's gone."

I am afraid that I cannot describe how I felt at that exact moment. To tell you that my head spun, that my throat filled with tears, that my legs became so numb that I could not stand would not even begin to convey what I felt. Please let me skip over these first few hours of shock and pain and continue my story with the funeral arrangements.

My father and I arrived at the funeral home and were met by one of the three brothers who manage the home.

We were treated with kindness, understanding and patience and we were told that all the arrangements would be taken care of by the funeral home. From the casket to the burial. From the siddurim at the shivah house to the obituary announcement in the newspaper.

The family time alone with the casket, the funeral service in the chapel, the burial at the cemetery, these events are all fused into one incomprehensible blur in my memory. I can remember seeing friends and relatives in the chapel seats from my perspective in the family section off to the side. Also, there were two men whom I did not recognize in the small room reserved for kohanim. Then there were more people in the muddy cemetery, relatives who say nor auf simches (we should come together only at celebrations), but whom I saw nor auf levayes (only at funerals), friends whom I've known my whole life, and limousine drivers chatting and smoking.

The shivah was at my grandparents' apartment. A large group came directly following the funeral and descended upon the brunch spread. Seeing them gorging themselves mystified me. It did not anger me, as it did my father who himself refuses to eat in any shivah house, but rather, it was curious to try and understand how anyone could eat at this particular time. I could envision myself eventually eating, but at this point it was out of the question. A dear man had just been lowered into the ground and covered with mud and dirt. Soon his body would begin to decompose. And these hypocritical cousins, or "bad-time Charlies," as my father calls them, were elbowing each other in the tiny, overheated kitchen, for combination egg salad and tuna party sandwiches.

After three days of prayer services and inane conversations with people trying to feel better about themselves rather than truly wanting to console me, I decided to go back to New York. This environment was suffocating me. I needed to grieve on my own terms, to cry alone.

I boarded the bus back with Rebecca and we settled into our seats, preparing for the nine-hour ride.

"I feel like I could have done something if I had been here," I said.

"You can't blame yourself," she responded. "He was quite sick."

"I suppose you're right," I said, and pulled out the book of Moyshe Zuchmir's poems which I had neglected for a week. I opened it at random and came across the following short poem. It didn't make me feel any better, but at least it distracted me.

Friday before Purim, 1997

a poem for the seven girls who stood looking across the river in the island of peace their gazes falling on the soldier lifting the gun

falling

a poem for the seventy-three boys in the skies flying upwards on a mission falling falling to earth in an explosion of fire

do you remember the teenagers on the street in Jaffa?
wearing masks and makeup?

or maybe it was Bat Yam, something once happened in Bat Yam.

and then the masks were on the ground and all we could hear was the sound of ambulances

in every direction

I saw bloodstains
I saw tears
I saw the expressions on their faces

I can't even remember what year it was anymore

some people think it doesn't matter anymore.

(one tragedy blending into another)

a poem for the people who sat drinking coffee in Apropo
a few hours ago

(I don't know yet how many or who)

I cannot watch TV
this time
I've had enough enough enough

I'm going to light my candles now starting Shabbat again
as the week twirls round and round

like the white dress of the little girl in her costume
Queen Esther in the palace or a ballerina on the stage or a white cloud floating where I can see it from here falling

maneuvering itself between the smoke and the dying ashes

and the cries of angels

Reminiscences of a Medical Practice

By BEN SCOTT

I opened my office for the practice of medicine shortly after the end of World War II. At that time, automobiles were not yet available for purchase and a rare house call was usually made with the then customary streetcar, a very tedious and lengthy but financially affordable procedure. My brother Irving, aware of my dilemma, generously kept saying, "If you have a night call, don't hesitate to call me and I will drive you to your call and home."

Late one night in February the phone rang and I was asked to see a very sick child whose home was located in a distant suburb. It was 3 a.m., the streets were covered with ice and snow and the temperature was at exactly zero. I knew I would never be able to reach this address by streetcar and a taxi would cost more than I could afford – even if I were to be paid for this call. I was in a quandary when I suddenly recalled my brother's invitation.

Gingerly I reached for the phone and after three rings, as I was about to hang up, a sleepy bewildered voice asked, "Who's calling?"

"It's me, Ben. I have a night call to Lachine," I answered.

"Lachine? What's in Lachine? Tell them it's too early, you'll see them tomorrow – it's the middle of the night, he muttered as he hung up.

I was sitting up in bed trying to find a way to get to my patient when he called back. "I'll be right over. Wait for me," he said.

My most memorable night call

He vaguely knew where the suburb was located and carefully drove through the pitch black night until he reached the address. I still marvel at his success.

As we drove up, he took my medical bag and made a dash for the door as I followed.

There were only a young woman and another child in the house. They were puzzled and a bit apprehensive when they saw two men rush into their home, but were soon reassured by our obvious concern for the patient, a handsome 5-year-old, sick and in a high fever. As I was searching for a non-available lubricant for the rectal thermometer, my brother recommended using butter – it worked admirably! The home was very poor, cold and bare.

Medication was urgently needed, but no pharmacy would be open at this late hour. Suddenly, with determination, my brother took the prescription I had written and ran into the night.

He reappeared a short time later with the precious medicine and explained that he had wandered about until he found a pharmacy and awakened the pharmacist who lived above his store. He purchased the medicine and quietly offered it to the young woman as he whispered to me, "This is a poor house; don't ask for any money!"

We rarely spoke of this call though I have often thought of that night. My brother has since passed on, but I know that even this one blessing alone would have been enough to gain entry to heaven.

The following story happened many years ago when I was in general practice in Montreal, when being a GP was looked down on in many hospitals. The GP's request for patient admission was usually referred, and requests for hospital staff appointments denied. This story was much different and reassuring.

I was covering for a friend on holiday when his answering service asked me to see a patient who was very sick. She was a recent immigrant from Italy living with her husband and two children in a very tiny two bedroom apartment. I found her sitting up in bed, with a temperature of 104 degrees, dripping sweat. She pointed to a very red, swollen painful and tender knee which she could not move. A careful examination resulted in a provisional diagnosis of acute rheumatic fever, which required confirmation, hospitalization and management – not available in her present environment.

Carefully and in my meager "Italian," I broached the subject to my patient and to her husband. The answer was not long in coming. He listened carefully and quietly, and then invited me into the next room which served as their kitchen. Slowly and methodically he combed through all the dishes until he picked out a large plate which he balanced on his open hands as he approached me. When he was just a step in front of me he slammed the plate on the floor and shouted angrily, "When my wife is in the hospital, who will take care of my children?"

It took me awhile to recover from the onslaught and I did some quick thinking and then started to laugh.

"Well," I answered, "you're a good husband, but a very bad businessman. You see, if you keep her at home without proper medical care, she may be able to look after your children for a few years, but then could become very seriously ill and you would have to pay lots of money for many years to have someone look after you and your two small children. But if you send her to a hospital where she can get the proper care for a week or two she can come back all well and care for all of you and it would cost you nothing!"

He ruminated on this and finally agreed to the hospitalization. I had succeeded in winning over one party to this plan.

The second part proved more daunting. There was a deep-seated mistaken conviction in that district that there was only one reliable hospital in Montreal and if hospitalization were mandatory that one would be acceptable – otherwise, nothing doing! I called their admitting office and asked for the chief resident in medicine, who turned out to be the admitting officer. I felt that with him, I had it made.

I reviewed the case in great detail indicating that should investigation confirm my diagnosis, this would serve as a great teaching case since a rheumatic fever in an adult was so very rare.

His reply was brief and insulting

His reply was brief and insulting. "Doctor, he said, "about the investigation, we are not here to do your dirty work!"

I was stunned. "What is your name? I asked, and then tried to caution him about the boorishness and hospitality of his reply and the added risk he was exposing himself to. I then proceeded a second time to repeat the entire history as though for the first time.

"My answer is the same," he replied.

Again I explained how seriously he was involving himself. And a third attempt was no more successful.

"We are not here to do your dirty work!" was his final reply.

"Very well," was my answer. "Now I will tell you what I plan to do. I will call the police and have this patient in your emergency room within half an hour and then check to make sure she is admitted. In the morning, I will review this story with the medical director. You will need a good reason for your attitude, but remember I did try to prevent this from happening.

She was admitted to the hospital at 2 a.m. Tests confirmed the diagnosis. I reached the medical director and reviewed the previous day's events and added: "I realize that my status in the medical hierarchy is only the very first step, but I believe it is an important one. I need to know whether the responses I received from your admitting officer represented his views only or those of the administration. Are you closing your doors to us? We carry only a small black bag, we do not have a 10-storey building, fully equipped, to help us on our calls. What change must I make in my practice?"

He answered briefly: "Can I call you back in 30 minutes?"

My response was "I have nothing more important to do. I will wait by the phone."

Exactly 30 minutes later, he called back, "I have the entire night staff with me and I have confirmed your report. I apologize for what happened. What would you like me to do with this doctor?"

"Your decision is your own," I said. "All I ask for is a courteous, reasoned reply to my calls for help in dealing with a seriously ill patient."

"Please," he answered, "don't stop sending us your patients. Your work is vital to both your patient and the hospital."

I was very grateful for this help and was able to call when the need arose in the future.

Barrels of Passover Memories

Years ago, barrels were a favourite means of storing the Passover dishes, pots, glasses and cutlery. Each piece was wrapped carefully in newspaper.

Everybody had barrels. After all, everyone made their own wine and old barrels were plentiful and withstood a year's storage and punishment in basements.

Each Passover, the family would gather to unwrap each barrel's contents and relive the memories of past generations. Treasured pieces brought from Europe were discussed and a link with the past forged.

The Flying Mandlebaum

By PHILIP EINSTOSS

There were five of us who met at the Cafe Europa. There was Saltzman the poet, Cohen the engineer, Steinbok the wine merchant, Lefkowitz the tailor and me, of whom, it is true, not much can be said. Judging by occupations one could perhaps surmise that we had nothing much in common. And that may have been true in a superficial, day to day kind of way. But one should never make the mistake of judging a man's heart by the occupation fate has handed him, because in our hearts, as Lefkowitz would say, we were cut of the same cloth. And that cloth? The absolute certitude each of us possessed, that he was always right and the others always wrong.

Socialism, Zionism, Communism, Mysticism, Spinozaism, Nietscheism, Constructivism, Presentism; every night between seven and nine, except for Shabbat in deference to Cohen's religious sensibilities, the five of us fought and harangued over myriad ideas, philosophies, essays, reviews, poetry, music. Each of us vied to be the first one with a thought or interpretation. Then the other four would seize upon it and attack, or agree, or maniacally shake fingers, or even pull hairs from his own head.

Now, it must be admitted, what is true is what is true and in matters of thinking Steinbok was not what one would call swift in flight. He knew his wine all right, a Bordeaux, a Burgundy, champagne; in matters such as these no one could hold a candle to him, as the expression goes. But one had to admit, that when it came to his brain, Steinbok was not a frequent visitor.

Steinbok knew his wine all right

And Lefkowitz, may he rest in peace for all time to come, the placement of a button, the width of a lapel; his savvy in things sartorial was beyond question, but when it came to some Plato or maybe a little Dostoyevsky, a plague on the anti-Semite, well things became a little thick.

But what they and perhaps even the rest of us lacked in natural intellectual talent we made up for in pride, vision, and the ability to repeat: so that's your opinion; dozens of times in an evening.

And now it is time in my little story to bring up the name Mandlebaum, who worked in lady's undergarments. Mandlebaum was not part of our circle. In fact, he was someone, it is true, to whom not much attention was paid. Nothing bad against him, nothing good either; he went to the same cafe we did, had his coffee or tea or whatever it was he had and mostly kept to himself.

The general consensus was that he was probably smart or probably stupid, nothing in between. He was worth, we figured, no more than ten thousand zlotys, maybe if you stretched it a little, fifteen. And his father, or so it was rumored, died in the arms of a woman who was not his wife. And that was what we knew of Mandlebaum.

One evening, while the five of us were heatedly discussing whether Cubism was good or bad for the Jews, Lefkowitz nudged me and said that he wasn't sure but it looked like Mandlebaum was drinking an awful lot of whisky. I looked over and saw Mandlebaum bringing what appeared to be a glass of whiskey to his lips and swallowing down the liquid inside. I stared a little while longer and I could see by the way Mandlebaum's head was drooping and by the loose movements of his hands that he was drunk.

"Maybe," I said to Lefkowitz, "he's depressed because he got in a load of oversized panties." We were chuckling when we heard Mandlebaum's voice just above us "Excuse me. Excuse me."

We all stopped doing whatever we were doing and beheld Mandlebaum, standing next to our table, swaying back and forth.

'You're trying our patience'

"Nu, Mandlebaum, what is it? We're busy talking about important issues," said Cohen in a matter of fact way.

"I got something to say."

"Mandlebaum, you're trying our patience," responded Cohen while grinning at us.

Mandlebaum slammed his hand down on our table. "I said I got something to say."

"For crying out loud Mandlebaum, what is it?!" demanded Steinbok.

The rest of us were getting ready to subdue Mandlebaum, even though he was much bigger than any of us and even though none of us believed in violence, God forbid, when Mandlebaum said "It's just that...it's just that, I can fly."

Well, naturally we all started laughing, and Lefkowitz laughed so hard that he fell over and landed on his head.

"I'm serious. I can fly. I'll even make a bet. You can come and watch me. I'll go to the top of the cafe and fly away. I'll bet."

I have not as of yet mentioned the other part of our group's raison d'etre, if you will, but what is true

'You have a bet'

is what is true and what is true is that we also met to gamble. Not in a traditional, horse-betting sense, mind you, more in an everyday way, betting on how long it takes to get served a drink, how long before another pogrom begins in Russia, how many times Rabinowitz the horse trader can visit the town prostitute in a given week, that sort of thing, innocent stuff really. So when Mandlebaum said the word bet, he said, as he knew, the magic word.

"Okay, okay," said Steinbok. "I'll bet 2,000. Two thousand zlotys against you being able to fly. And if you can't fly, you pay me 2,000 zlotys."

Mandlebaum didn't even take the time to think about it. "Okay, you have a bet." We all quickly laid bets. I personally wagered 500 zlotys. And before anyone could say a word there was 5,000 zlotys against Mandlebaum.

Now we knew Mandlebaum was reasonably well off, and after all, there was always a need for ladies undergarments, but five thousand zlotys was a lot of money. And since the idea that Mandlebaum could fly was preposterous, one couldn't help but conclude that 'Mandlebum', as the saying goes, had gone off the deep end. But, and there's no denying this, craziness is a very attractive quality, at least from a point of interest perspective. And so we invited Mandlebaum to sit down and have a drink.

"So how long you been flyin'?" asked Steinbok incredulously, but in good humor.

"Oh it's been several years. You know, I've flown around the country a fair bit. Lodz, Krakow, Gdansk. But don't get me wrong, I've been to some exotic places too. You know, Chicago, New York, even London." We tried our best to hold in our laughter especially when Cohen asked Mandlebaum if he had liked England to which he replied, his face twisted in recollection, "Not so much; it rained a lot."

The time passed and we were actually enjoying Mandlebaum's company. Truth be known I had never seen Mandlebaum smile much before, sitting unhappily in the corner of the cafe the way he did. But now he was laughing and telling jokes and we were all having such a good time that I for one, found myself wondering why it was that we had never invited Mandlebum to sit with us in the first place.

Lefkowitz suddenly stood up. "It'll have to be now because I have to get home."

Mandlebaum asked what would have to be now but then he seemed to remember because he became very quiet and pensive looking.

Mandlebaum climbed up The Europa's fire escape to the roof and we stood below watching. Steinbok began to wonder out loud if Mandlebaum really could fly. After all, he reasoned, Mandlebaum was going this far. He probably would have chickened out long ago if he'd been lying.

Maybe he could fly. Cohen, who it must be admitted was smarter than the rest of us in entrepreneurial matters, said that he had many ways to market Mandlebaum. "I could sell rides on Mandlebaum's back, or have him deliver packages and envelopes."

Both Cohen and Steinbok changed their bets and wagered money on Mandlebaum being able to fly. Rosenstein, who owned the cafe had come out to watch, and claimed that he had actually seen Mandlebaum fly. "He was going over me real fast and he even waved."

It was with some disappointment then that we saw Mandlebaum climbing back down the fire escape. "It's all a lie," sighed Lefkowitz. We decided we'd give Mandlebaum until Yom Kippur to pay up. And that was three weeks away.

The Cloth Coat

By ALVIN ABRAM

The outer door opened to a senior citizen recreation centre. Lillian Sax entered with her friend Marilyn Cohen. They followed the corridor to the coat rack and removed their coats. Lillian smiled as she placed a hanger into her sleeves. "I see Sarah Perlstein is here."

"Whose is that?"

Lillian pointed to a small, well worn cloth coat with a torn left pocket and a portion of the inner lining pulled away from the cloth. "That belongs to Mrs. Perlstein. She refuses to buy another one."

"Must live alone," Marilyn said.

"How did you know?"

"I work with seniors at Baycrest. Loneliness makes their answers sharp."

"Maybe. I never got to know her. If you're so sharp, can you pick her out from the ladies at this meeting?"

"That shouldn't be too hard. The coat size tells me she's about five-foot-two and small in build. The torn left pocket could mean she's left-handed and has a nervous condition. She must place her hand in her pocket often to hide her shaking."

Lillian's mouth dropped. "You're right. Her left hand does shake a lot. She's a Holocaust survivor. I can't believe you figured all that out just by looking at her cloth coat."

Marilyn smiled. "Too many mystery novels."

They entered the auditorium and after a few minutes of scrutinizing the small audience, Marilyn pointed to a single woman sitting about half way back from the podium. "Her?"

Lillian looked. "You're right. But you can't see her hands from here. Why her?"

"Size, sitting alone and no smile. What she needs is company. I'm going to sit beside her." Marilyn made her way to where Mrs. Perlstein sat. "Hello," she said, "my name is Marilyn Cohen."

Mrs. Perlstein smiled. "Hello. I'm Sarah Perlstein."

Marilyn offered her services to the senior centre as a volunteer and as the weeks passed, she would see Mrs. Perlstein on occasion and offer her greetings. One day, while Mrs. Perlstein was having lunch, Marilyn sat beside her.

Mrs. Perlstein smiled.

"I understand you are a survivor. From Poland?"

The smile slowly evaporated from Mrs. Perlstein's face. "Yes," she answered.

"I have a a lot of friends who are survivors. Do you find it difficult to talk about what happened?"

Mrs. Perlstein's lips trembled, and after a few minutes she said, "sometimes."

'This is unexpected'

"Maybe some day, you'll tell me about yourself. I think it is important that those of us who were not there understand what it was like."

Mrs. Perlstein nodded.

"Hello, Mrs. Perlstein, it's Marilyn Cohen. I'm in your building doing an errand, would you like company?"

"Why, thank you. It would be very nice. Please come upstairs."

Mrs. Perlstein smiled when she opened the door. "This is unexpected," she said, ushering Marilyn inside and taking her coat. As she stretched to reach the coat bar, Marilyn offered her assistance and placed her coat on a hanger.

Marilyn pointed to the coat that had the torn pocket and shook her head.

"It's in need of some repair, I'm afraid," Mrs. Perlstein said.

"It might be more practical to buy a new one than repair this one. You must have had it a long time."

Mrs. Perlstein's face became solemn. "Yes," she said, gripping her left hand which shook uncontrollably.

"Are you all right, Mrs. Perlstein?"

"Yes. Yes. It will go away. Sometimes when my mind wanders, my hand takes on a life of its own. Anyway, at my age, I don't need a new coat. I'm seventy-two. If I buy a new coat, it will outlive me." She laughed.

Marilyn smiled. "It will keep you warm and it might extend your life."

"To tell you the truth, I have lived long enough. I have seen too much and have much to forget."

"I hope not. Would you share some of your past with me? Sometimes to talk about it, is to help to release the ghosts that haunt your memories."

"What do you know of ghosts?"

"My friends have told me of theirs. Talking can be magic. It exposes the sores and sometimes it lessens the pain. I'm a good listener. Won't you talk to me? I would like to know you better."

"We hardly know each other. Why me?"

"At the risk of sounding typically Jewish, why not?"

Mrs. Perlstein laughed. "My story is no different than others. I come from Lodz. When the airplanes came, my younger brother was away at work. He had left before six in the morning. I was home sleeping. He never returned. Our house was near the factories. As a result, it was bombed. Somehow, I lived. My parents did not."

"You never heard from your brother?"

"Nothing. The walls of the ghetto went up immediately. I was a seamstress. When they liquidated the ghetto, I was sent to a labor camp to make German uniforms. Afterwards, I was sent to Auschwitz. I survived. I saw too much. My left hand didn't start to shake until after the war. It was my left hand that guided the cloth through the machine. I believe I am being punished for surviving." Mrs. Perlstein had tears in her eyes and her hand began to shake.

Marilyn reached out and gently took her hand. She held it until it stopped shaking. "I don't think you are being punished. Its your body reminding you what it had to endure.

Ghosts that haunt

"Mrs. Perlstein smiled. "You have your answer; I have mine."

"Are you feeling well, Mrs. Perlstein?"

"No, but thank you for caring."

"Let me care some more. Let me take you to get a new coat. Let me take you to Spadina Avenue to extend your life. Your old cloth coat has one more purpose – to get you another coat. How am I to know more about you if you freeze before I learn everything?"

Mrs. Perlstein laughed. "You are very stubborn."

"That was what my mother always said."

Mrs. Perlstein grinned. "All right, I could use a new coat."

The car stopped on Spadina Avenue near Phoebe Street. Marilyn got out and quickly moved to the passenger side of the car to open its door. Mrs. Perlstein removed herself and stood by the car looking about. "It's been years since I was here. It don't look Jewish any more."

"No it doesn't. Come, it's this way."

They entered a door on a side street and slowly climbed the narrow steps to the second floor. Marilyn asked for the owner who hurriedly appeared. "We came for a cloth coat for my friend. Do you have her size?"

The owner looked at Mrs. Perlstein and noted her height and slouched posture. "Yes, but it will have to be altered," he said. "Come with me."

Mrs. Perlstein was very cooperative and smiled often when she tried the different coats. The owner nodded his approval and went to get his tailor. When he returned, an elderly man followed behind him, a thin tape measure hung around his neck, his lapels were filled with pins.

"What do you think?" the owner asked.

The tailor puckered his lips and walked around Mrs. Perlstein, his eyes focused on the coat hanging on her bent body. His head bobbed a few times and finally, he grunted, "yes." He immediately stuck a pin into the coat. He pulled on the shoulders, pinched the back where it hung loosely, tightened his grip on the cloth and stuck in another pin. A pin here, a pin there, his hands constantly gliding gently over Mrs. Perlstein's back and slight frame.

The smile had left Mrs. Perlstein. She appeared uncomfortable; her eyes moved in the direction of the tailor's hands and her left hand began to shake uncontrollably.

"Marilyn, please. I would like to leave," she said. "I would like to leave." She removed the new coat and retrieved her own and before it was on, she hurried down the steps to the street."

Marilyn had a startled look on her face. She apologized to the owner and chased after Mrs. Perlstein. On the street, she saw her standing by the curb, tears in her eyes. "Are you all right, Mrs. Perlstein?"

"I'm sorry," she said. "It was foolish of me."

"Are you all right?"

"Yes. Yes. I'm sorry. We'll come back another time."

"What was the matter?"

"I had the strangest feeling when the tailor's hands touched me. It felt like my brother's hands were on me."

"Are you all right now?" Marilyn asked.

"Yes."

They walked to the car and Marilyn opened the passenger door. Mrs. Perlstein didn't enter. "I want to go back," she said. "I want to ask his name."

It was her brother.

Sophy

By JUDY F. SCHATZ

The clouds hung low under the Buffalo sky. It was dark, too dark, for early afternoon. As I looked out of the living room window, hundreds of strange looking birds were congregating on the lawn. These birds were unlike any other I had ever seen. They reminded me of pigeons but were much prettier with their grey and white feathers. In a blink of an eye, they took off and flew away. The branches of the ash tree in front of the house appeared to move rhythmically as if orchestrated by the wind.

I sat down with a cup of tea to look through an old photo album. It was nice to reminisce about my early years. The first picture was of Mutti, (an endearing term in German, for mother) as a young woman. How attractive and sad she looked. The next page was of Mutti and Papa. I knew this was their wedding picture: Papa, so handsome and Mutti, so very elegant. There was a naked baby picture of me with blond ringlets and big eyes and a bit chubby. Then there was a picture of Sophy and me. This brought back many memories as I hadn't thought of her for a very long time. In this picture I was probably two years old.

Many years later I asked Mutti how she met Sophy. "She worked for us as a maid," Mutti said. "It was her first job in Berlin. She had come to us from a small town. Her parents were farmers. She had two brothers and a sister, but seldom spoke of them. They didn't seem close. She was very helpful and especially enjoyed taking care of you.

"When you were little, she always looked forward to taking you out in the carriage. And you were always eager to go out with her.

"When I cooked or baked, she watched you very carefully. She said her mother cooked very simple food, but nothing had ever tasted or looked as good as the food in our home. Sophy said she hoped she would be able to cook and bake like me when she got married."

"It was on the walks with you," Mutti continued, "that she met a young man, Juergen Hoffman, who worked in a tailor shop. She would stop to talk to him. They became friends, started dating and soon planned to marry.

"Since no one in her family was coming to the wedding, I made a lovely dinner for them. The table was set with flowers and candles. The meal was delicious. Papa served the wine."

After her wedding, Sophy would come to visit from time to time. I remember once, when I was five years old, just before my sister was born, I stepped into our hall and knew immediately Sophy was in the house because of the sweet smell of her perfume.

I rushed to meet her.

"Hi Fannychen," she said. "I came to see you, Mutti, and the baby.

"Oh, the baby isn't here yet. But Mutti promised it will be coming very soon."

Then Sophy asked me if I would like to come and stay at her home. She said it was all right with Mutti.

Mutti packed a little suitcase. There was something in it for Sophy as well. I carried my teddy bear.

This is how my weekend at Sophy's started. She always made me feel special and it pleased me. I wondered why she did it. Perhaps because she had had no children of her own.

Sophy's house

Herr Hoffman was home on Sunday and we all ate together. The food tasted just like Mutti's and I told Sophy that. She explained, in fact, that Mutti had taught her how to cook.

We rushed to go to the amusement park where I got a big balloon. Sophy took my hand; Juergen took the other.

"Fanny, " he said, "I want you to call me Uncle Juergen."

When I was old enough to take the subway by myself to Sophy's house, I no longer stayed overnight. I went there less frequently, but it was still very enjoyable. If the weather was nice, we went to the zoo or to the botanical gardens. We also went on picnics.

Sophy would pack a lunch that we ate on blankets on the meadow of the park. I told her about my friends, my activities, and about books which I had read.

In turn, she spoke of her new friends and how busy her husband was. She said he had to hire more tailors and she even helped out in the shop. At times, we listened to the park band and bought ice cream. Once I took my scratch pad and made a drawing of her. She thought it was good enough to frame.

The years went by so swiftly. Then came the election of Hitler.

On that day, my friend Sil and I kept writing the election results down as they came in. We kept adding them constantly, becoming more and more discouraged. Our parents listened to the radio with us. By the end of the night, Hitler had become the Reichs Chancellor of Germany.

The men in their brown shirts with swastika armbands marched along the street, singing Wenn das Judenblut from Messer spritzt. On April 1, 1933, all Jewish stores in Berlin were closed. The Magen David and Jude were smeared on our store windows. Uniformed Nazis patrolled the entrance to our store.

Throughout the turmoil, however, I continued to see Sophy. One morning, she phoned and said "Let's get together, but this time, you tell me where to meet."

I thought for a few moments and suggested we go to an art gallery.

"An art gallery?" she answered. "It never occurred to me to go there. Good let's do it." Art galleries, theatres and movies were still not forbidden for Jews.

Sophy was waiting for me at the entrance. What a stunning looking woman she was. I said, "Sophy, you look absolutely smashing in that beige suit. I'm sure your husband made it for you."

'You don't look like a Jew girl'

[Cont'd. from page B27]

"No you are mistaken. Jeurgen is far too busy now. One of his tailors made it. He is moving again to a bigger place. Fanny, how have you been? You look pretty good yourself."

As I left their home, Sophy said to me "Let's get together again soon."

At that time the Jewish Federation in Berlin suggested to my father to convert the liquor store to a grocery-delicatessen. They wanted to issue vouchers for needy Jewish families to redeem for food in our store. A number of these people who came to our store were embarrassed and felt humiliated to receive charity. They were highly educated professionals and had been proud Germans. My parents now needed help to work in the store. As I waited on our new customers, I could sense how degrading it was for them to hand the ration (scrip) back to me.

When I stacked merchandise on the shelves, I thought back to my school, teachers and friends. My formal education had come to an end, terminated by the government.

Sil had been my good friend since early childhood. We argued often, didn't agree about many things, but in spite of that we were very fond of each other. He probably was the first of my friends to leave Germany.

It soon became a weekly occurrence to see someone off at the train station. Some went as far away as Australia. Others to countries in North and South America. Every time I returned from the train station I felt another void in my life. One day when I returned home, Mutti was hanging up the telephone. She said, "I just spoke with Sophy. She wants you to come for Sunday dinner. Please let her know if you can make it."

I gladly accepted her invitation. She and her husband had moved to Dahlem Dorf, a nice suburb of Berlin. Her apartment was in an elegant new building. I was carrying a bouquet of flowers Mutti and I had selected. I rang the bell. A maid opened the door. Sophy, who was right behind her, exclaimed, "Fanny, I am so glad to see you. This is Helga. Come with me into the living room. Make yourself comfortable while I put these beautiful flowers in a vase." The room was tastefully decorated. I told her that.

"This room is very cozy. You really did a splendid job."

With her arm around my shoulder, she walked me to the balcony where Herr Hoffmann was sitting in an easy chair reading the paper. There were two beer bottles on the small table next to him. "Fanny," he said "you sure have grown up: tall, slender and blond. You certainly don't look like a Jew girl."

We sat down at the table

What a strange thing to say, but I tried to overlook it. I replied "You really have an attractive apartment. I like the way Sophy decorated it."

We sat down at the beautifully set table. Everyone was in a festive mood. Helga served the dinner, wiener schnitzel with mushrooms, my favorite. It was so nice of Sophy to remember how much I loved it.

"I really wanted to invite you for your birthday, but your aunt beat me to it," she said. "So, I have a little gift for you."

She handed me a gift-wrapped box, in it, pure silk stockings. I was stunned.

"This is a big surprise. I'm truly overwhelmed."

I got up and gave her a kiss. To top off the meal, Helga walked in with a decorated cake and everyone sang happy birthday to me. "You are so thoughtful and kind," I said. "I really do appreciate it."

That's when Herr Hoffmann chimed in. Looking directly at me, he said, "You are different from the other Jews. Not at all like those fat Jewish women with rings on their fingers. The Hellners are not loud people. My Sophy is a wonderful cook and housekeeper because your mother taught her. However, our Fuehrer, Adolph Hitler, is right. We have to make Germany Juden rein."

I couldn't believe what I was hearing. Sophy didn't say a thing. Soon afterwards, Herr Hoffman left for a meeting. Sophy and I sat for a while on the balcony and then I went home with my gift. That was the last time Sophy and I spoke. When I came home, Mutti wanted to know how my birthday party was. I said, "They have a beautiful home. Sophy gave me pure silk stockings. Mutti, I will tell you more about it, but I have a terrible headache. I must go to my room."

That night I could hardly sleep. I couldn't understand why Sophy didn't say anything. She should have said something. When Herr Hoffman repeated Hitler's statement of making Germany free of Jews, I thought what was Hitler going to do to us, put us all into camps, send us to a God forsaken island or have us all killed? That was too preposterous.

A short time later, quite unexpectedly, I received a scholarship to study dress design at the Herko Fashion Design School. Mr. Herko was a fine artist and a very good teacher. We had live models. I learned to draw figures in action and hoped one day to design dresses.

A frightened little girl

In December, 1937, a Nazi salesman reported to his group that my father said Hitler was ruining Germany. That was completely absurd. My father would never have said anything like that, especially to a German. The German authorities reacted swiftly to the report. They ordered my father to leave Germany by the end of the month. That was just a few days away. My mother, fearing further retribution, told our relatives and friends not to come and see him off. She was afraid we were being watched and didn't want anyone else to meet the same fate. It was a sad goodbye. Mutti, Ruth and I went with him to the station, not knowing what the future would bring, not knowing when or if we would see each other again.

We were forced to close our store and give up our apartment of eighteen years and move in with another Jewish family. My sister left the following May with the children's transport to the United States. This was arranged by our dear friend who was in charge of a Jewish organization that helped Jews emigrate. She was sent to Detroit where the Jewish Federation placed her with a Jewish family. My mother, my cousin Ernst and I put her on the train. Ruth was fourteen years old. She looked very attractive and confident but I knew underneath she was a frightened little girl. We all put on an act till the train left but we cried all the way home.

After five and a half months of waiting, our passports and visas finally arrived. Now we could join my father in Milano. My mother was packing the suitcases and suddenly stopped "Fanny, she said, let's go to the movies." This was most uncharacteristic of her, but it was probably due to her anxiety about my sister's leaving.

As we left the theatre, we saw our No. 7 streetcar go by. Since the weather was so pleasant, we decided to walk home. There was a flower stand on a corner of the Berliner Strasse. On the spur of the moment, I bought a little bouquet of violets because I knew my mother loved them. The flower lady pinned them on my mother's grey dress. Mutti always liked to wear a small bunch of flowers on her outfit.

We strolled along like we didn't have a care in the world, but there was a great deal disturbing us. We looked at the wares in the shop windows, admired the displays, and when we came to a large clothing store, I saw the name in large letters: JUERGEN HOFFMAN. "Oh look Mutti," I said, "Herr Hoffman's shop."

I looked in and saw Sophy standing there. I immediately recalled the many good times we spent together, how nice she had been to me. I loved her. So, I suggested to Mutti, "Let's stop in and say goodbye." "Absolutely not," she replied. "If you don't want to go in, I will go in by myself," I insisted. "Fanny you shouldn't," she said. "I love her," I said, "and I shall never see her again."

Mutti answered, "She loves you too, but things are different now. Come, let's go home." I was insistent. I told Mutti, "I have to see her."

Very reluctantly, Mutti followed me inside. Herr Hoffmann spotted us and walked toward us. I said to Mutti, "Look he's coming to greet us." When he was near us, he said, "Frau Hellner and Fanny, Jews are not welcome in this store," and he pointed to the door. Sophy just looked at us. She stood there. She didn't move. She didn't say anything. We walked out.

David, contemplating a photograph of Bathsheba

(at an Air Force base somewhere in the Negev)

O for your kiss! For your love more enticing than wine, my eyes disrobe my dove
the eyes of sun and morning shine.

Are you really for real or formed of sunrise air, could the mind's meanderings compose a face so fair.

The twinkling night-sky pales in your lucent shining eyes, the moon in envy hides
beneath the perfume of your sighs.

Merry laughter, rippling clear as a tumbling little mountain stream, your sadness at another's tear,
your soul, as pure as a child's sweet dream.

Your hand's soft touch upon my brow caressing cool as twilight's sigh, the wondrous music of your voice like an angels' chorus from the sky.

To win your love, jewelled crowns would fall and gold and kingdoms lose their worth, heaven's entrance would be left unsought while you my sweet remained on earth.

The Partisans

Wrapped in darkness, dragging their feet through mud
Moving forward by moonlight to reach the forest path
They rotate sites, orders are silently obeyed
Hiding from the evil, ready for assail
Partisans, lonely warriors of liberty
They dream of freedom to live with dignity
A sacred mission fighting for their land
Without possessions but rifles in their hands
The sky their roof, dense trees their dwelling spot
Frost bitten in winter, summer swells their throats
Partisans young and old ready to attack
The shiny boots, sudden in a night pitch black
No drums for comrades fallen in a battle
No sound of laments only weapon's rattle
No face is known, no names on heroes list
The only tribute, a tear our eyes mist,
Courage an ally, endurance lead to victory
Brave partisans, you are a gem in history
Your songs of glory filled at last the air
Merit for your pain, sorrow and despair.

THE TRADITIONS CONTINUE

Jewish life in Yemen revolved around the synagogue and the beit midrash. It continues that way for the Zabari family in Rehovot.

Wandering Jews

Toddlers in synagogues cause smiles of pure delight.
And toddlers in synagogues give parents cause for fright.

Will they yelp or will they cry as they bob up and down?
or will they try a new cute trick that makes the rabbi frown?

Perhaps they'll charge the Bimah to see what makes it beam,
or climb up to the Holy Ark to see the Torahs' gleam.

To taste, to feel, to handle, toddlers' hands reach out but open-mouthed, expectant smiles hastily turn to pouts as Dads and Moms, red-faced, short-fused reclaim their wandering Jews.

An Important Link

To be recited during the Passover seder at Yachatz – when breaking the middle Matzah.

Now is the time in our seder to take the middle matzah and divide it in half. As we break this matzah and set it aside, we link ourselves symbolically with all Jews throughout the world, especially those who have lived under the heel of the oppressor.

Our seder meal will not conclude until the missing piece of matzah is found and returned to the table. The matzah, when thus restored, shows the desire of our people to be together as one, at peace.

No plant grows without first bursting out of its seed; no butterfly flies over a plant without first losing its cocoon; no child is born without its mother's discomfort and pain of labor. It is often only within "brokenness" that we can discover our paths to healing. The broken matzah reminds us of tikkun olam – our need to make a better world.

Passover is so real and so tangible because we not only taste our freedom but also resolve to work for the liberation of all people. Therefore, it is a time to ask ourselves: What have we done to help others? What are we doing to care for those in need? How are we relieving someone else's distress? Can we reach out and assist with our tzedakah, our charitable contributions, or through gemilut chasadim, our acts of loving kindness? How can we repair the "brokenness" of this world?

What have we done to help others

Today the Star of David rises proudly in the former Soviet Union, but the shadow of the hammer and sickle may yet be revived. Schools, synagogues, centres and social agencies now struggle to take root. We are proud that we too "remembered the plight of the stranger" and acted to bring hope to those in need. Torah is now taught in a land where Hebrew was once outlawed.

Jews who left the former Soviet Union, Ethiopia and other devastated countries experienced a modern exodus – enabling them to bring their children and grandchildren to freedom in Israel, a land sworn to us by our ancestors and God.

May this broken matzah, our bread of affliction, remind us of our people's history, and challenge us to create a future of wholeness for Jews the world over, Amen.

This reading was created by the United Jewish Appeal Rabbinic Council in New York.

Students making Passover popular in Russia

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Until 1995, Alexander Vladimirov had never attended a Passover seder.

"I knew absolutely nothing about Pesach," says Vladimirov, a sociology major at the Jewish University in Moscow.

Today, the 20-year-old is in charge of the Passover Project at the Moscow Hillel Centre.

And he's not alone. Vladimirov is just one of hundreds of young activists who have been trained to conduct Passover seders for the Jewish community.

The 3-year-old project includes an extensive network of seminars organized by Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, and the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation.

This year, a special grant from the U.S.-based May and Samuel Rudin Family Foundation will allow some 400 Hillel activists – many of whom are participating in a seder for the first time – to conduct more than 500 seders in more than 200 communities.

The result: Passover is the most widely celebrated Jewish holiday in the former Soviet Union.

During the weeks before Passover, training seminars are conducted to prepare student volunteers to conduct the seders in areas as far-flung as Siberia and the Far East.

Some of the seminar leaders are Israelis and some are local students who led seders for the first time last year. Other teachers this year were expected to be North American Jewish students who would travel to the former Soviet Union to participate in the project.

The students who are leading the seders grew up in typically assimilated Soviet Jewish backgrounds, says Vladimirov, adding that before his first seder he knew more about Russian Orthodox holidays than about Passover. But after their training sessions, the students know more about Passover than virtually anyone else in their community.

Leading the seders is not always easy. "We often come to a community and people look at us as if we were aliens from another planet," says Masha Golberg, a 21-year-old math student and a Moscow Hillel activist.

Eugenia Mikhaleva, Moscow Hillel Centre's executive director, says that the seders demand a combination of tradition and the students' creative innovations. Because of the special needs of the Jewish community in the former Soviet Union, for example, the seders are conducted throughout the week of Passover – in the morning, afternoon and evenings.

"Students try to apply different approaches to different audiences. The elderly appreciate more storytelling and Yiddish singing. Kids want to play, and a mixed gathering would be a grateful audience for a short performance based on the Passover story," says Vladimirov.

Wine is still scarce in many communities and students often have to carry backpacks with Passover kits that include matzot, bottles of wine and Haggadot to guide people through a seder.

Activists always have to call in advance to tell local community leaders what should appear on the tables.

"Usually, people come to eat, drink and talk. This isn't their fault. This is their understanding of a holiday. Our task is to change this attitude," says Vladimirov.

"We are bringing a small revolution into these people's life. But we have to do it delicately, to introduce formal things step by step."

Why do students whose ages range from 17 to 34 join a project that requires a substantial investment of their time and energy?

The rewards come in different ways. Students enjoy Jewish camaraderie, travelling and digging into their Jewish roots. Mikhaleva says that the Passover Project is also an effective way to recruit new people to Hillel's activities.

For many, the participation in the Passover Project also represents one of the first serious accomplishments in their lives.

"This is one of the major tasks for Hillel – to give people an opportunity for self-realization," says Mikhaleva.

Vladimirov remembers the first seder he conducted for a group of Jewish elderly in St. Petersburg.

"They had not had seders since childhood and did not remember much," he recalls. "Suddenly, I realized that I was only helping them to release their own memories."

Montrealer named new Vancouver CJA director

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — David Vineberg, who moved here from Montreal 18 months ago, recently became director of campaign services of the Greater Vancouver Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA).

"David... brings to the position his outstanding experience as a volunteer in one of the best campaigns in North America," said Drew Staffenberg, Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver executive director, in an interview.

"Hiring someone of David's calibre sends a strong message to the Lower Mainland Jewish community that we are serious about making the campaign grow and about supporting our constituent agencies," Staffenberg said.

Vineberg will be responsible for providing professional leadership to the Lower Mainland's CJA campaign. This year's campaign, in which more than 350 volunteers took part, raised almost $4 million.

Vineberg was an active volunteer in the Montreal Jewish community for many years, taking part in more than 26 CJA campaigns.

Vineberg and Sherry Stein, who is director of development of the Fraser Institute and an active volunteer in the Lower Mainland Jewish community, made the decision to leave Montreal as they watched the televised results of the 1995 Quebec referendum.

"When we heard Parizeau's crack about 'money and the ethnic vote,' we knew it was time to leave Quebec," Vineberg said.

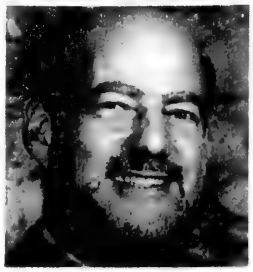
He had been thinking about relocating in the United States, but when he visited Whistler on a skiing vacation in March, 1996, he said, "I fell in love with the West Coast."

Seven months later, he and Stein moved to Vancouver.

Vineberg soon became involved with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and with the CJA campaign. Almost immediately, he noticed there were significant differences between the Vancouver and Montreal Jewish communities.

"Montreal has an old, established ...Jewish community," Vineberg said. "And because I grew up in a city with deep Jewish roots, I took for granted the Jewish community's commitment to act together to maintain itself and to grow.

"Vancouver has a newer, smaller community that still needs to learn how to work together."



David Vineberg

Vineberg said the Lower Mainland Jewish community must cooperate if it is going to successfully deal with the myriad challenges facing it on the cusp of the 21st century, including an aging population; the boom-and-bust nature of the resource-based British Columbia economy, which has a significant impact on fundraising; the continuing immigration of Jews from other parts of Canada and other parts of the world; the high rate of assimilation of young Jews into non-Jewish society; and the increasing cost of providing services.

Vineberg said the campaign needs to reach out to the Jewish community. "We must educate the community about the Combined Jewish Appeal and the services it finances . And we must train our canvassers to build face-to-face relationships with donors."

Religious leave issue thrown out of court

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish teachers in this province are back to square 1 in their efforts to win paid religious leave on the High Holy Days after Judge Gil Goodman ruled that the issue did not belong in the courts.

Goodman heard the arguments on behalf of the teachers and the school divisions in Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench March 18 to 20.

The legal counsel for the four school divisions cited in the case – Winnipeg School Division No.1, Assiniboine South, Seven Oaks and Fort Garry – argued the hardship of having to hire unprepared substitutes. What was unexpected though was the school divisions' objection that the matter was one that should be settled by arbitration.

"The precedent was set in another case six months after we filed our statement of claim," says Mel Myers, the lawyer for the Manitoba Teachers Society. "We were prepared to go to arbitration three years ago but deferred it because we felt that this issue of religious days off could be corrected in the courts, that the courts would make a clear statement that the situation was discriminatory and then send the case back to the arbitration board for a final ruling. Only the arbitration board can determine the financial settlement.

"It was just a few days before we were scheduled to go to court that we learned that the school divisions were going to raise this jurisdictional matter."

The teachers also challenged the fairness of the school calendar, Myers notes. The teachers are arguing that the calendar is in itself discriminatory in that teachers are given Christmas and Good Friday off with pay, but Jewish teachers do not receive the same consideration for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Goodman hasn't rendered a decision on that issue yet.

Myers suggests that arbitration would likely be of benefit to the teachers. He says he wants to read the entire judgment before deciding whether or not to appeal.

"No matter what, the Manitoba Teachers Society will continue to pursue this issue," he says. "They believe that the complaints of discrimination are valid. By being denied full pay for all three High Holy Days, Jewish teachers are being discriminated against."

Diane Beresford, president of the Manitoba Teacher's Society, expresses the teachers' disappointment about the turn of affairs. "It could take years to settle this issue once and for all," she says.

Cohen helped shape legal institutions in Canada

MONTREAL — Jurist Maxwell Cohen, who died last week at the age of 88, played an important part in determining the direction of the law and legal institutions in Canada and internationally as a law professor, dean and scholar, and through domestic and international public service.

Obituary

Cohen was dean of law from 1964-69 at McGill University, where he began teaching in 1946. He was the first Jew on the faculty's full-time teaching staff. He later chaired a number of royal commissions and the Canada-United States International Joint Commission, served as adviser to governments and on a variety of international bodies, culminating in his appointment as a judge ad hoc at the International Court of Justice.

Cohen leaves a legacy of prolific writing in the press, books, scholarly journals, reports to government, speeches and lectures on widely varied aspects of law.

His work as chair of the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda is still cited as the leading study on that controversial subject. The committee's 1966 recommendations led to the amendment of the Criminal Code to include the wilful promotion of hatred against identifiable groups and other anti-hate provisions.

"As a student and throughout his career, Cohen contributed to public knowledge and debate," wrote Donald McRae, dean of common law, and William Kaplan, associate professor of law, at the University of Ottawa in a collection of essays they edited in honor of Cohen, entitled Law, Policy, and International Justice (McGill-Queen's University Press, 1993).

"Cohen shaped legal education at McGill for...40 years, and he set an exemplary standard of scholarship and service to the field for international and domestic lawyers in Canada."

In his many roles, Cohen brought "a powerful intellect, a creative and imaginative mind, a world view, and a deep-seated concern for humanity to the myriad of problems" set before him.

Then Supreme Court justice Brian Dickson, in the foreword to the same book, hailed Cohen as a "great Canadian jurist" who made a "vital contribution to the Canadian and international legal communities."

Cohen can be considered a pioneer because few lawyers in Canada at the time devoted themselves full time to research, writing and teaching, he wrote. Cohen came to be expert in legal history, public law, international law, human rights and legal education. Into his 80s, Cohen had been scholar-in-residence at the University of Ottawa law faculty and was a professor emeritus of McGill until his death.

Of Cohen's many remarkable achievements, one stood out for Dickson. "During the five years in which he presided over the Canada-United States International Joint Commission, every judgment was unanimous, even where bitter boundary disputes had existed. At the Supreme Court of Canada, the best we have been able to do has been unanimity in 75 percent of cases."

Born in Winnipeg in 1910 (his maternal grandfather was a pioneer farmer in Oxbow, Sask.), Cohen was educated at the University of Manitoba and continued his studies at Northwestern and Harvard universities. His first job after graduation was lawyer for the Combines Investigation Commission of the federal labor department. In 1938, he wrote one of the first analytical treatments of Canadian anti-trust law.

He served in the army from 1942-46, reaching the final rank of major, and was a war correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor. He would later be a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly, Saturday Night and other publications.

Maxwell Cohen

At McGill, while dean, Cohen founded the National Law Program in 1968, under which both common and civil law, the country's two legal systems, could be taught side by side at the undergraduate level, something unheard of at the time.

McGill law professor and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler, who gave the eulogy at Cohen's funeral, once said: "Like many others, I was the beneficiary of Maxwell Cohen's scholarship, deanship, counsel. He was, in the very best sense of the word, teacher, mentor, inspiration and friend...Cohen has his disciples – and not only disciples but devotees – and I would be honored to count myself among them."

Cohen had a strong association with the Jewish community, serving on the public relations committees of the Canadian Jewish Congress and old United Zionist Council in the 1960s. He was a recipient of the Samuel Bronfman Medal, Canadian Jewry's highest communal honor.

He is survived by his wife Isle, daughter Joanne and son-in-law Andrei Sulzenko, and grandchildren Alexa and Ben.

El Al upgrading its service

to better serve the community, assuming we will have a similar commitment from the community to El Al. We have served the community for many years and we want to continue to serve the community for many more years. We hope the community will see the advantage of having El Al serve their needs."

The airline is working hard to become more attractive to its clientele, he said. It's a trend that began in the last year and a half, coinciding with changes in El Al's Israeli management. "There's a total revolution in the company and the main target is improving service. We have taken good steps in this area."

On March 1, El Al began offering completely smoke-free flights to and from Israel, "because we listened to our customers," Shamai said.

The airline is upgrading its fleet and is planning to add a fourth 747-400 on its North American route. Each plane offers passengers their own personal video screen in the back of the seat in front of them. With Air Canada's (AC) entry into the Canadian market, El Al has dropped its price by about 20 percent in peak season to more "comfortable" levels, he said.

There's even "awareness of the tight squeeze" in El Al jetliners and "in the process of paying more attention to the needs of passengers, all issues will be resolved," Shamai said.

From 1971, when El Al inaugurated direct flights to Israel from Montreal, and from 1986,when Toronto was added to its Canadian departure locations, El Al was the only airline flying directly to the Holy Land. That situation changed dramatically two years ago when Air Canada began offering non-stop flights to Tel Aviv.

Airline alleges unfair trading practices

Shamai believes Air Canada has an unfair advantage over El Al. The Canadian airline, he contended, "does not operate a Canadian route. They operate a North American route," using Toronto and Montreal as "a hub" to transport Israel-bound passengers from the United States.

"They don't have to fill their planes with Canadians," Shamai argued.

So far, El Al's Canadian business hasn't suffered much. In 1997, the Israeli carrier increased its passenger totals by about one percent despite AC's competition.

Most of that gain was attributable to increases during the peak season with many of those passengers coming from Air Canada overflow. "We take more in the peak season, they take more in the low season and we're also taking away from European carriers," he said.

What worries Shamai and El Al's brass "is not what they take, but the potential of increasing their capacity."

This summer, Air Canada is proposing to add two new weekly flights from Montreal to go along with the five it will offer from Toronto. El Al, by contrast, is planning to offer five flights from Toronto and two from Montreal, but the Montreal flights will originate in Toronto. Air Canada will have seven frequencies, El Al five, he said.

El Al believes that the current situation harms its U.S.-based business and is an unfair trading practice. An Israeli government delegation was scheduled to meet with representatives of Transport Canada in Ottawa on April 6 to discuss that issue, among others.

"There is a dispute between the countries," Shamai said. "The main principle is the taking advantage of the hubbing system to bring unlimited numbers of Americans to Israel and from Israel to the United States through Toronto and Montreal."

Israel believes the AC practice violates a bilateral agreement with Canada and that AC is using its Canadian departure points more for American travellers than for Canadians. Israel wants Canadian authorities to limit AC's Israel route capacity, Shamai said.

Radical decision on child support guidelines

In a landmark decision called Francis vs. Baker, the Ontario Court of Appeal has just ruled that in cases involving higher income earners, trial Judges cannot normally award an amount of child support lower than that set out in the new Child Support Guideline tables. The federal and provincial laws dealing with child support now cite specific dollar amounts that a non-custodial parent must pay, depending on (a) the payer's gross yearly income, (b) the number of children from the relationship, and (c) the province in which the child(ren) normally reside.

New Guidelines to determine amount of child support

These figures are neither tax deductible by the payer nor taxable to the recipient. However, any agreements signed or Court orders obtained prior to May 1, 1997 continue to be in force and are unaffected by these new laws, unless either parent applies to the Courts for a change in the amount. This "grid" or table is thought to apply "presumptively" in all cases. However, many lawyers interpreted certain words in the new laws as a sanction for the children of wealthy payers (annual income in excess of $150,000) to be treated differently.

These lawyers felt that in some cases it might be "inappropriate" to award the Guideline amount if this resulted in a windfall" for the wife, i.e. an amount far greater than that needed to cover the childrearing expenses for which child support payments are intended. In Francis vs. Baker, however, a lawyer/husband was ordered to pay $10,034 monthly to his wife based on an annual income of $945,548. This monthly payment was calculated by Madame Justice Benetto of the Ontario Court (General Division) in accordance with the formula outlined in the Guidelines.

The Ontario Court of Appeal rejected the husband's argument that the Guidelines' use of the word "inappropriate" could allow the Courts to award less than the amount dictated by the formula, if this amount was excessive. However, the Court ruled that the word "inappropriate" could only be interpreted to mean "inadequate"; that is, a Court could order more than what the Guidelines called for, but rarely less.

Higher income earners to enjoy less flexibility

In the Appellate Court's ruling, any other interpretation would render the Guidelines meaningless and could undermine the legislation. The Court did recognize certain exceptions that the Guidelines expressly call for, such as split custody or shared custody. (In split custody, one or more children reside with one parent while their sibling(s) reside with the other. In shared custody, children divide their time between parents but reside with both.) Otherwise, unless this decision is successfully appealed, high income earners may no longer be able to hope for flexibility in the law.

Many will complain that the Court of Appeal has now sanctioned Judges to order child support payments so large that they are tantamount to spousal support. Others will agree with the decision because it upholds the very purpose of the new legislation, i.e. to create certainty and take away the need to litigate the basic monthly amounts that a non-custodial parent should pay. If the law is designed solely to create certainty, then this decision and the Guidelines clearly achieve that purpose.

Payers of all income brackets may be liable for "extras"

In addition to the basic amount payable that this decision addresses, a payer of any income bracket may also be liable to contribute some or all of the money necessary for "add-ons" or extras such as school tuition, day care and extracurricular activities in proportion to the income of both parents.

I'll address these "extras" in the May 7 issue of the CJN. For now, on behalf of my wife Rhonda and our children Joshua, Elana and Jeremy, I would like to wish you a Kosher le Pesach!

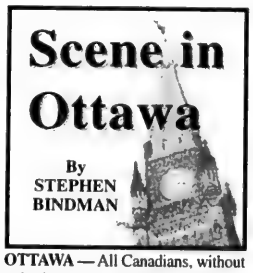
Arnie and Bill, give it up



OTTAWA — All Canadians, without a doubt, owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to Bill Hobson and Arnold Fradkin.

Hobson was the first head of the federal Justice Department's war crimes unit when it was set up in 1987 after the Deschenes royal commission into war criminals in Canada.

Then, as now, he was a driven man, determined to do justice after decades of inaction against suspected Nazis who have lived peacefully in our midst.

Fradkin, a veteran Justice counsel, was the first Jewish lawyer in the war crimes unit and a key player in its early years.

He too had the "fire in the belly" so necessary to finally confront the evil of World War II in a Canadian courtroom.

Together, they did what, until recently, no other federal lawyers had done – put together a successful Canadian war crimes case.

Hobson and Fradkin were counsel on the case against retired University of British Columbia botany instructor Jacob Luitjens. In short order, they marshalled the evidence that led to Luitjens being stripped of his Canadian citizenship and then deported to his native Holland to serve a prison sentence for collaborating with the Nazis.

It was only earlier this year – several years after Luitjens was kicked out of Canada – that the Federal Court finally ruled on the case of a second accused collaborator. The federal cabinet still hasn't formally revoked Wasily Bogutin's citizenship.

In recent years, though, Hobson and Fradkin have been fighting another battle – to prove that Fradkin was the victim of anti-Semitism in the Justice Department.

Sadly for all concerned, the time has now come for them to drop their obsessive fight.

Ever the loyal public servant, Fradkin has remained publicly silent, though he has fought the issue within the department, even taking the unheard of step of writing directly to then justice minister Allan Rock with his concerns.

After years of silence, Hobson, now a legal consultant in Toronto, has been waging an increasingly vitriolic campaign against his former department that refuses to take him back.

He first publicly raised the anti-Jewish allegations in a speech to a Canadian Jewish Congress conference last April and recently launched a confused $1-million lawsuit against the department and several of his former colleagues for intentionally "inflicting nervous shock and mental suffering" on him and his family.

In essence, Hobson alleged his successor as head of the unit, Peter Kremer, questioned the objectivity and legal advice of Fradkin, undermined his reputation and forced him out of war crimes work, because he was Jewish. He also accused Kremer of engaging in a deliberate "foot dragging strategy" to subvert the hunt for alleged war criminals because of his anti-Semitic views.

A new 260-page report by former Osgoode Hall law dean John McCamus categorically rejects the allegations.

"I have been unable to discover any evidence of anti-Semitic incidents or attitudes in the work of the war crime section during Kremer's term as director nor any such evidence with respect to members of the chain of managerial command responsible for its work," concludes McCamus.

The law professor said he questioned dozens of current and former colleagues and legal opponents of Kremer, Jewish and non-Jewish, and not a single one raised any suggestion he harbors anti-Semitic feelings.

"Indeed the overwhelming impression I have gained from these discussions is that it is widely believed that the allegations being made against him are profoundly unfair."

The report is hardly as flattering about either Hobson or Fradkin.

McCamus concludes that although Hobson is an "individual of integrity," his version of some events, whether because of "innocent confusion, fading memory or some other difficulty," cannot be relied on with confidence.

Fradkin was described by colleagues, Jewish and non, as being "obsessed" and a "passionate zealot" and McCamus concluded Kremer was justified in thinking he had lost objectivity on one case he had worked on for years and was eventually dropped over his strong objections.

Despite McCamus's complete rejection of the anti-Semitism allegations, the report does confirm earlier accounts of a war crimes unit at battle with itself, rife with bureaucratic turf wars and deep division over whether the best route to go was criminal prosecution of suspected Nazis or stripping them of their citizenship and deporting them.

Clearly, this is a report that should have been commissioned at least three years earlier when an internal review concluded the anti-Semitic allegations, though based on weak evidence, should be investigated by someone independent of the department.

As well, McCamus's tome should have been made quickly available to those outside the department like Hobson and the Canadian Jewish Congress so they didn't have to go begging for a copy.

But despite Hobson's gripes to the contrary, the report appears to be independent, mind-numbingly exhaustive and fair.

No doubt, Hobson and Fradkin, perhaps justifiably, feel hard done by for the way they were shunted aside when new management took over the war crimes unit.

But if they persist in their anti-Semitism claims, there is a real danger they will be remembered not for their pioneering war crimes work in the Luitjens case but for their failure to move on. That would be a real shame.

Arnie and Bill, give it up.

Pesach celebrated in Whistler

By DAVID LITVAK
Pacific Correspondent

WHISTLER — Pesach on the Mountain, a Passover vacation retreat is taking place in the ski resort of Whistler until April 19.

The retreat, which is being coordinated by Sea to Sky Kosher tours, is expected to draw guests from around the world to the Chateau Whistler Resort, located on Blackcomb Mountain, north of Vancouver.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of England, who is the scholar in residence, will lead the first seder at the retreat and give a community lecture at the Norman Rothstein Theatre in Vancouver on April 19.

Leible Wolf, from Melbourne, Australia, founder of the Human Development Institute, will lead the second seder.

Rabbi Yitzchak Wineberg, one of the retreat's organizers says programs offered include Torah classes, skiing, tennis, swimming, golf, tours for adults, and a day camp for children.

Also featured is a concert by Dudu Fisher, one of Israel's most popular singers.

Rabbi Wineberg says the Chateau Whistler's banquet kitchen will be converted into a kosher kitchen and will serve approximately 1,000 to 1,200 kosher meals a day, ranging from traditional Pesach delicacies to innovative gourmet cuisine.

Three-day packages for the beginning, middle or end of the retreat are also available.

Israel, Palestinians differ on Hamas murder

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As the atmosphere of threats, accusations and denials heats up, the circumstances surrounding the death of the Hamas movement's chief bombmaker remain shrouded in mystery.

While Israel has denied any involvement in the death, Hamas officials have renewed their threats to avenge the killing of Mohiedeen Sharif, vowing to strike at Jewish targets in Israel and abroad.

Last weekend's threats came amid reports that the Palestinian pathologist who initially said that Sharif was shot dead before his body was planted in a car and an explosion set off on March 29, now reports that it is difficult to say whether Sharif was shot before or after the explosion.

In addition, Palestinian police are looking into the theory that Sharif was shot by a Hamas member who collaborated with Israel.

Palestinian police, stung by a different theory, summoned Hamas spokesperson Abdel Aziz Rantissi for questioning, after he reportedly said that Sharif had been assassinated by the Palestinian preventive security service.

Rantissi, who was quoted by the Jerusalem Post and Israel Radio's Arabic service, said Sharif had been tortured by Palestinian preventive security service agents to provide the names of those Palestinians who helped him hide.

Rantissi reportedly added that in order to cover up the arrest, Palestinian security officials put Sharif's body in the car and blew it up.

Rantissi later denied the remarks attributed to him.

Meanwhile, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's wife, Suha, told Sharif's family during a condolence visit, "We consider him a Palestinian martyr."

Sharif, 32, was seen as the heir to Yehiya Ayash, who was killed by a booby-trapped cellular phone in the Gaza Strip in January 1996. Ayash had topped Israel's most-wanted list for masterminding a series of suicide bombings that killed scores of Israelis.

Sharif, too, was on Israel's list of wanted Hamas terrorists, for his involvement in planning several suicide bombings.

But observers point to a difference between Israeli officials' public stances in the two cases: While Israel would neither confirm nor deny accusations that it was behind Ayash's death, the denials have been unequivocal in Sharif's case.

Indeed, the head of the Shin Bet domestic intelligence service was dispatched last week to tell Arafat that Israel had nothing to do with Sharif's death.

Israeli officials believe that Sharif was killed during an accident at a bomb-making factory in the West Bank town of Ramallah.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu charged that last week's explosion provided proof that the Palestinian Authority was not taking sufficient steps to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure in the autonomous areas.

Netanyahu has made such a crackdown a precondition for advancing the deadlocked negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

"As was proved in the recent case in which another bomb factory was discovered in Ramallah, right under the noses of the Palestinian Authority, there exists a widespread Hamas terrorist infrastructure in territories against which the Palestinian Authority is not acting systematically," Netanyahu was quoted as saying in a statement issued after last Sunday's weekly Cabinet meeting.

An Israeli army officer in the Ramallah area said that even if Sharif's death were part of an internal Palestinian dispute, Israel would be the target of a retaliation.

Netanyahu demanded last Friday that Palestinian officials stop blaming Israel for Sharif's death and warned he would hold them responsible for any revenge attacks against Israel.

Israeli security forces remained on high alert last Sunday.

In the Gaza Strip, border police and army troops dismantled a small homemade bomb that had been left at a perimeter fence near the Gush Katif bloc of Jewish settlements. A sign with anti-Jewish slogans was found attached to the package.

Near Ramallah, Israeli security forces detained five Palestinians suspected of throwing stones last Friday at an Israeli car, seriously wounding the driver.

The driver, Eliezer Frankel of Rishon le-Zion, remained listed in serious condition at Hadassah Ein Kerem Hospital in Jerusalem.

Police, Israeli Arabs clash

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A violent confrontation between Israeli security forces and Israeli Arabs has aroused bitter emotions on both sides.

Israeli Arab leaders called for a general strike to protest what they said was police violence against Bedouin demonstrators near the town of Shfaram in the Galilee.

Clashes erupted last Saturday night when Israeli police tried to break up protests against the demolition of three homes in Umm Sakhali, a Bedouin village near Shfaram.

At least 20 Israeli police and approximately the same number of protesters were hurt during the confrontations.

The clashes broke out when Israeli Arabs from surrounding villages arrived to try to rebuild the homes.

Local residents said the demolished homes had been standing for more than 40 years. The Interior Ministry, which issued the demolition orders, said they were recently built without permits.

Salakh Salim, head of the leftist Hadash Knesset faction, said police used "brutal measures" against the demonstrators, including "tear gas and even live fire."

"We will not agree to this sort of humiliation and opposition," Salim told Israel Radio. "It is as if we are in occupied territory. We are Israeli citizens."

Israel's police commissioner, Yehuda Wilk, charged that Bedouin community leaders were using the situation to create a political football.

He added that there was no justification for the violence directed at the police, who he said were enforcing court orders.

"It is inconceivable that a police officer should go to carry out an order and be met by a hail of stones or end up in the hospital," Wilk said.

The violence prompted Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to plan to meet with Bedouin leaders in the Galilee, his office said.

Even while seeking to meet with the Bedouin leaders and defuse the situation, Netanyahu said the police had his full backing to enforce the law throughout Israel.

Deputy Prime Minister Moshe Katzav, who is responsible for Israeli Arab affairs in the government, called on the Interior Ministry to be more sensitive toward the Bedouin community.

10-year sentence for Papon evokes relief and bitterness

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BORDEAUX — For many Jewish leaders in France and elsewhere, the punishment did not fit the crime.

After 19 hours of deliberation, a jury in this southwestern French city convicted Maurice Papon of complicity in crimes against humanity and sentenced the former Vichy official to 10 years in prison.

The mixed verdict left many in the courtroom – including lawyers for the prosecution and defence, and some relatives of Jews deported from France during World War II – far from satisfied.

The sentence "leaves behind a certain bitterness," CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations, said in a statement.

Many expressed concern that because of Papon's age and the appeals process, he might never spend a day in jail.

CRIF and other French Jewish organizations applauded the guilty verdict against the 87-year-old Papon, but they were clearly expecting a harsher sentence.

The Jewish Student Union of France said the jury, attempting not to disappoint anyone, managed to disappoint everyone.

The group said it "deplores the inadequate link between the crimes he is accused of and the sentence he got."

Papon went on trial in October on charges of ordering the arrest of 1,560 Jews, 223 of them children, between 1942 and 1944, when he was secretary-general of the Bordeaux prefect's office and head of its Jewish affairs office.

After the liberation, Papon went on to an illustrious postwar career, serving as police chief of Paris between 1958 and 1967, and as budget minister in the French cabinet during the 1970s.

Legal action against Papon began in 1981 after a newspaper article detailed his past.

But proceedings against him were repeatedly obstructed by French officials reluctant to see a trial dredge up embarrassing memories of France's collaboration with the Nazi occupiers.

The trial was the longest in French postwar history and has forced the country to re-examine its role in the wartime Nazi occupation.

French Jewish groups and the lawyers for the civil plaintiffs in the case had expected a life sentence – the legal norm in France for crimes against humanity.

However, the state prosecutor in the case, Henri Desclaux, had recommended a 20-year term.

Guilty of charges

In its verdict, the jury of nine civilians and three judges said Papon was guilty on the charges of arrest and illegal deportation of some of the Jews deported from the Bordeaux region. But the jury did not convict him of complicity to murder, accepting the defence argument that Papon was not aware of Hitler's Final Solution plan to exterminate the Jews.

One of the lawyers for the civil plaintiffs, Alain Levy, charged that Papon's lawyer had misled the jury by insisting in his closing argument that Papon could not be convicted as an accomplice to murder if he had not known of the Final Solution. Levy had argued during the trial that Papon knew the deportees would be led to their deaths, even if he did not know the full dimensions of the Nazi genocide.

Indeed, Papon had admitted during the trial that children taken out of hiding and deported from Bordeaux during the war would meet a "cruel fate."

At the postwar Nuremberg Trials, where the definition of crimes against humanity was established, the judges said the mere knowledge that Jews were going to their deaths established the guilt of those involved in the deportations.

Nearly all of the Jews deported from Bordeaux died in the Auschwitz gas chambers.

For his part, Papon, who was hospitalized several times during the course of the trial, showed no emotion when the verdict was read.

In a final statement to the jury, Papon had expressed defiance and anger, saying, "The accusations are false and this trial is a fake."

Relatives of some of the victims gasped when the verdict was read out and they heard that Papon had been absolved of the deportees' deaths.

But some expressed relief that Papon had at least been found guilty and sentenced to 10 years.

"For a man of such standing, a man with such a high idea of himself, you can't say this is nothing," said Michel Slitinsky, a plaintiff in the case who brought the first charges against Papon in 1981 and whose father was among those rounded up by Papon's police.

While many believed the sentence should have been greater, the symbolism of the verdict was important. "The symbolic conviction shows the French people consider the Vichy government and its civil servants to be fully responsible for the deportation of France's Jews," said CRIF, the French Jewish group.

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Israel expressed the view of many when it said, "This conviction reinforces the important principle that there can be no statute of limitations on the crimes of the Holocaust."

Ethiopian Folklore Haggadah proving very popular

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel correspondent

JERUSALEM — The Haggadah has always been one of the most popular Jewish religious books to entice artists and book designers.

Some of the earliest, most valuable and finest examples of illuminated religious books are Haggadot. Artists have been attracted to the many possibilities of the story of the Exodus together with its poems.

Many publishers produce expensive copies of some of the most famous and rare Haggadot that are today mostly in the hands of museums or private collectors; for example the Birds Head Haggadah, the medieval Golden Haggadah, the Venice Haggadah and the Sarajevo Haggadah.

At this time of the year, as Pesach approaches, many new versions of Haggadot become available. The basic Hebrew text and layout is, for the most part, fairly standard – the variety is usually found in the illustrations and explanations.

This year is no exception. The story of the redemption of the Jewish people excites the artistic imagination. There also cannot be many books that have been translated into so many different tongues. The encouragement to translate the Haggadah might largely be attributed to the fact that the Shulchan Aruch permits and encourages the reading and explanation of the Hagaddah in the vernacular, so that everybody can understand and participate in the retelling of the story of the Exodus on seder night.

Although the Haggadah has encouraged commercial exploitation, such as cheap copies given away in Israel by various popular daily newspapers just before Pesach, there are examples of "commercial" Haggadot that are in themselves much sought after. An example of this is the Ethiopian Haggadah commissioned by Israel's largest bank, Bank Hapoalim.

This beautiful 80-page hard cover Haggadah contains 90 high-quality reproductions of original paintings by Ethiopian immigrant artist, Tsagaye Barihun. The paintings depict Jewish life and observances in an Ethiopian village.

Barihun was born in the Ethiopian city of Gondar in 1940. While studying to become a teacher he discovered a talent for painting. In 1971 he married Esther, who came from a prominent Gondar Jewish family.

"Shortly after I married, my wife and I decided that we would like to come to live in Israel, it had always been our dream. However, the authorities refused us permission and we had to remain in Ethiopia for another 20 years," said Barihun. "In 1991, I escaped from Ethiopia with my wife and six of our seven children by disguising myself as a Christian holy man with his family. We managed to cross over to the Sudan and eventually after many trials and tribulations arrived in Israel."

Barihun and his family settled in Netanya and the son that they left behind in Ethiopia joined them in Israel in 1993, after being given permission to leave Addis Ababa.

His painting came to the attention of Allon Baker, who owned a studio and small publishing company in Jaffa. Baker showed some examples of the paintings to Joel Rabinowitz, an ex-New Yorker, who is Bank Hapoalim's vice-president of international communications and public relations. Rabinowitz had the idea of incorporating a collection of Ethiopian Jewish themes into a Haggadah to give as a gift at Pesach to 14,000 of the bank's clients around the world. Thus the Ethiopian Folklore Haggadah came into being.

The Haggadah, besides its conventional text, has much information about the observances surrounding the Fasika (Passover) festival, as well as a history of the Beta Israel people.

The parts of the seder service not traditionally practiced in Ethiopia, such as the recitation of Who Knows One, and Only One Kid, are incorporated in this Haggadah and depicted by the artist as he sees them after learning the traditions that are practised in Israel.

The Haggadah itself was a recent introduction to Ethiopian Jewry. The Pesach tradition in Ethiopia was for the laity to listen to the kes (the priest) reciting the Passover story and answering amen at the appropriate time and place.

As soon as the existence of the Haggadah became known outside the bank's clientele, it became clear that there would be a demand from the general public. The publisher therefore decided that anybody would have the opportunity to buy the book after this Pesach. Also from May 3 to 7, Barihun's original paintings will be on exhibition at the Seventh Jerusalem International Judaica Fair. The new Haggadah can be seen on the Internet at, [www.koret. com/ hagada/].

Uneasy relations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

With the Oslo peace process floundering, Israel's bilateral relationship with its chief ally, the United States, has come under considerable strain.

The immediate cause of the tension is Israel's refusal to accept a still unannounced American plan calling for a phased redeployment from 13 percent of the West Bank in exchange for additional Palestinian efforts to combat terrorism.

The deeper cause of the growing rift is Israel's reluctance to implement a demand by Washington for a "time out" in expanding existing settlements in the territories.

Due to these disputes, and the virtual collapse of talks between Israel and the Palestine Authority (PA), Israel's ties with the United States have sharply deteriorated, and are probably in their worst shape since the George Bush era in the early 1990s.

Washington's annoyance with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government flared late last month when U.S. mediator Dennis Ross failed again to break the year-long stalemate in negotiations. Frustrated by the glacial pace of developments, American officials have warned that time is running out, and that the United States may walk away from the process, thereby leaving both parties to their own devices.

Everyone understands that the implicit purpose of these warnings is to exert pressure on Israel, given the fact that the PA in principle has accepted the U.S. peace plan.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has declared that the United States has no intention of imposing its plan or of issuing any ultimatums. But speculation is rife that Bill Clinton – adjudged by many to be the most pro-Israel president in history – will try to inject a sense of urgency into the moribund peace process by formally announcing his proposals, a tactic opposed by the vast majority of U.S. senators. If he does so, Netanyahu will be under increasing pressure to move forward.

Netanyahu, however, may prefer brinkmanship to cooperation. Two weeks ago, having made it abundantly clear that a 13 percent withdrawal would be "utterly impossible for security reasons," he said that he would accept no "diktats."

At this juncture, Netanyahu may be more interested in preserving his government – which hangs by a slender thread – than in appeasing the Americans.

Most of his ministers are opposed to ceding more territory, let alone giving up settlements, and those who would grudgingly support further pullbacks would likely vote against relinquishing 13 percent during the interim period.

The current controversy over the scope and timing of redeployments suggests that Israel and the United States have embarked on a test of wills, if not a collision course.

Israel and the United States continue to share vital strategic interests. This is absolutely clear. But since Netanyahu's accession to power two years ago in May, there has been a marked deterioration in the tone of U.S.-Israeli relations. On his first visit to Israel after the 1996 election, Warren Christopher, the then secretary of state, acknowledged that peace without security is a fallacy. But in a dig, he reminded Netanyahu that security cannot be attained without peace.

Albright, Christopher's successor, has been even more forthright. While urging the PA to fight terrorism, she has advised Israel to desist from "unhelpful unilateral acts" (Har Choma, for example) which impinge on the integrity of the peace process. Two months ago, in a remarkable confession, she told Netanyahu and PA President Yasser Arafat that she was "sick and tired" of their mutual recriminations.

Clinton, who out of pique shunned Netanyahu on his visit to the United States last year, has been just as forceful in articulating Washington's position. As he put it recently: "We don't think anything should should be done which undermines the trust of the parties, violates either the spirit or the letter of the Oslo accords and predetermines the outcome of final settlement issues."

As long as this philosophy is at the core of Clinton's policy, Washington's relations with Israel will by definition be uneasy.

Shul bombing rocks Latvia

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agaency

MOSCOW — The Latvian government and the Baltic nation's Jewish community are reeling from a bombing that seriously damaged the only synagogue in the Baltic nation's capital city of Riga.

"People are angry and they don't know what to do," Rabbi Mordechai Glazman, said in a telephone interview from Riga.

The early morning blast to the 93-year-old building in Riga's historic Old Town caused an estimated $20,000 to $40,000 in damages, but no injuries.

The explosion, which occurred at 1:50 a.m. April 2, tore out the 200-pound wooden synagogue door, destroyed all the windows and casings in the basement and the first and second floors, and left deep gouges in the synagogue's wall.

The windows of the bottom five floors of two apartment buildings across the street from the synagogue were also shattered.

The bomb had reportedly been placed on the front steps of the synagogue building.

The Week in Israel

March 30

• Two Hamas terrorists were killed in Ramallah when a car stuffed with bombs detonated, apparently, prematurely. (A top Hamas bombmaker and fugitive, Mohiedeen Sharif, was one of the two killed.)

March 31

• The government adopted the recommendation of a committee dealing with the conversion of adopted children. It called for the creation of special rabbinical courts to deal with such conversions. The families of the children would not be required to be religiously observant after the conversion.

April 1

• The cabinet formally agreed to a withdrawal of troops from south Lebanon on condition that Lebanon assure no acts of terror will occur from the area.

April 2

• A committee of ministers approved a statement declaring that "Jonathan Pollard was recruited by people who worked on behalf of the State of Israel ...even if his handlers did not receive the necessary authorization." Pollard condemned the offer as "bogus."

April 3

• A state of alert was imposed around shopping malls and open air markets. Israel warned the Palestinian Authority that any act of terror by Hamas in relation to the death of Mohiedeen Sharif will lead to "harsh reactions."

50 Years Ago

JERUSALEM, March 31 (JTA) — Determined to cut off Jerusalem from the rest of the country, Arabs today erected 15 strong roadblocks near Bab el Wad on the main road from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv. British military authorities have begun negotiations with Arab leaders in the Bab el Wad area to remove the roadblocks and open the road to Jewish vehicles, on condition that the Jews do not proceed in armed convoys.

Arab leaders today indicated that they will not accept such a pact unless the Jews are ready for "unconditional surrender."

Eighteen Million Man March

Join In

It is "count down" time for the eighteen million man march. 3,310 years ago our ancestors, the Israelites, marched out of Egypt to freedom, giving birth to an independent free nation – Am Yisrael.

As we anticipate the forthcoming final redemption, with Moshiach the Torah states: "G-d will take out of exile each and every Jew." No Jew will be left behind.

For over 3,000 years, ever since its inception as a people, Judaism has espoused the concept of "Moshiach."

In fact, the belief in Moshiach and Resurrection is clearly and unequivocally stated in "The Thirteen Principles of Faith." The Twelfth Principle states: "I believe wholeheartedly in the coming of Moshiach, and though he may tarry, I await his coming daily." The Thirteenth Principle affirms that "I believe wholeheartedly in the Resurrection of the dead."

The Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem M. Schneerson, proclaimed as a Prophecy that "The time of Redemption has arrived" and that "Moshiach is on the way." All that we have to do, the Rebbe said, is to "increase in acts of Goodness and Kindness."

Our Sages tell us that the Jewish Nation is considered as one complete body. At birth, the heart, brain and all limbs of the infant, come into being at once. So to it is with the Jewish Nation. The brain and heart, the leader of Am Yisrael and the limbs, the entire Jewish community, are born during the same month.

It is therefore no coincidence that the Rebbe's birthday is on the eleventh day of the month of Nissan, the same month as the "birth" of the Jewish nation.

During this month of Nissan, the month of Redemption, and in honour of the Rebbes' 96th Birthday, it is appropriate to heed the Rebbe's Prophetic proclamation, and respond to his call.

Let us increase in the study of the subject of Moshiach and Redemption. Let us increase in Mitzvoth. Let us increase in acts of Goodness and Kindness. Thereby changing the world for Good.

Join the Eighteen Million Man March, marching now towards the Redemption with Moshiach, making this the ultimate Passover.

Film gives balanced insight to world of chassidim

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Chassidim live in closed, insular societies and generally shun publicity. As a result, they are usually misunderstood, if not resented and ridiculed, by outsiders.

In A Life Apart: Hasidism in America, filmmakers Menachem Daum and Oren Rudavsky penetrate the chassidic world for what is perhaps the first time and portray it in a balanced fashion. We meet a rainbow of Chassidim (from a fishmonger and a merchant to a hockey coach and a teacher), visit their homes and classrooms and attend one of their weddings.

The documentary, which explores their distinctive lifestyle and their adaptation to the United States, benefits from the commentary of three scholars (Samuel Heilman, Arthur Hertzberg and Yaffa Eliach). Narrated by actors Leonard Nimoy and Sarah Jessica Parker, it will be broadcast on Vision TV on April 17 at 9:30 p.m. and repeated on April 18 at 2:30 a.m. and April 20 at 12:30 p.m.

A minority within a minority, the Chassidim we see lead traditional lives centred on prayer, study, family and community. They reject popular culture, notably television, movies, pop music and art and sports. They have little or no use for secular learning, regard universities as superfluous institutions, and avoid jobs which conflict with their absolute values.

At an early age, the sexes are segregated and educated in separate schools. Dating is forbidden and marriages are arranged by parents or matchmakers. Girls are raised for motherhood and big families are the norm.

As well, conformity is valued and individualism is suppressed.

Divided into sects, the chassidic movement is headed by charismatic and revered rebbes. Their leadership skills encompass the ability to transmit sacred knowledge from one generation to the next through the medium of storytelling.

Before World War II, the Chassidim looked upon the United States as a treife medina, an impure land, because of its inordinate power to absorb new arrivals and transform them into "Americans."

To illustrate the point, we're told that, as late as 1939, a leading Lithuanian rebbe recognized the physical danger facing European Jewry, but concluded that Chassidim were still better off in Europe than in America.

The Holocaust all but decimated the Chassidim. Four out of five were murdered between 1939 and 1945. After the war, some Chassidim, displaced and angry, lost their faith and left the movement. The rest, however, gathered around surviving rebbes from the Ger, Bobov, Satmar, Skver and Lubavitch dynasties.

Rather than searching for the fabled American dream, the rebbes were determined to preserve the old East European ways. "We will tailor America to fit the Torah," proclaimed one rebbe, neatly summing up their strategy. The rebbes brought lost relatives to the United States and found work, apartments and even marriage partners for their acolytes. They succeeded in recreating what had nearly been obliterated by the Nazis and their collaborators.

In keeping with its fair-minded tone, the 1½-hour film presents dissident voices. We hear from a young woman who basically rejected her chassidic upbringing because she rebelled against its rigidities; from a feminist who argues that chassidic women are assigned inferior roles; from a Jewish chaplain who was rebuffed by Chassidim; and from a black man who finds them standoffish, patronizing and spiritually arrogant.

All in all, A Life Apart is informative and stimulating, TV at its best.

On April 14, at 9 p.m., Vision TV also airs Sparks Among the Ashes, the story of an American boy's journey to Poland for his bar mitzvah. And on April 16 at 8:30 p.m., Vision TV will broadcast Hanged on a Twisted Cross, a portrait of the anti-Nazi theologian Dietrich Bonhoeffer.

Leonard Bernstein Update: Eye on Arts is intrigued to receive the latest issue of Prelude, Fugue & Riffs, a newsletter "for friends of Leonard Bernstein."

In eight well-designed pages, the publication gives news of such Bernstein-related matters as the recent Sotheby's auction of some of the late composer-conductor's possessions (top-selling item was a single baton, which fetched $16,000 US); the Leonard Bernstein Jerusalem International Composing Competition (which did not award the top prize of $10,000 this year); and the recent "leonardbernstein.com essays competition." (the two best essays are reprinted).

Prelude, Fugue & Riffs also brings news of a new production of West Side Story currently touring Britain, a calendar of events highlighting Bernstein compositions being performed around the world, and the "Bernstein Century," a series of 10 CDs that Sony released in March.

The newsletter urges its readers to write to the United States Postal Service in connection with a planned series of commemorative stamps in honor of major cultural events of the 1950s, to be chosen by popular ballot. Travel Talk

BY BILL GLADSTONE

NOTES FROM ALL OVER

IGTO Celebrates Anniversary: Some 500 Toronto-area travel agents showed up last week at a posh ballroom in a downtown hotel for a very special celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary, hosted by the Israel Government Tourist Office of Toronto.

The guests were treated to a full-course dinner followed by entertainment by Israeli singer Maytal Golan and band, and dance-animator Rivka Atzmony to keep things lively.

There were very few prepared speeches, since the IGTO intended the evening to be more of a celebration than an occasion to sell Israel's great touristic features.

But in one of the few moments devoted to talk, Toronto-based freelance writer Toby Saltzman described her longstanding love of Israel, noting that as a member of the Society of American Travel Writers, she was looking forward to visiting Israel again for SATW's upcoming annual conference in October. Hundreds of North American travel journalists are expected to attend.

Montreal actor featured in Straight Up season finale

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — One of CBC's most-talked about TV series (at least in the media) Straight Up wraps up its second season on April 15.

Straight Up, a gritty drama about teenagers, has a lot more substance to it than most American-produced shows like Beverley Hills 90210. Set in Toronto, the show attempts to portray real teenagers in real-life situations.

The seven episodes this year dealt with such themes as sexuality and relationships, but were all linked together by a common thread – the murder of Sam outside a popular fast-food restaurant.

In addition to resolving the murder, the show's last episode will focus on the character Alex, an alienated, starving for attention teenager, wonderfully portrayed by Montreal actor Jacob Tierney.

Tierney, 18, will be awarded the YTV Achievement Award for Acting for this role on April 19.

"That was very unexpected," Tierney said from his hotel room here where he is currently filming a movie. "I didn't even realize I was nominated for it."

Tierney's character in Straight Up, Alex, is ignored by many of his classmates and at home finds his parents also ignore him. His one venue for expression is music but when a tape he made is stolen at a party, Alex falls deeper into his insecurity and isolation.

Jacob Tierney

"It was a very challenging role to play," Tierney admits. "He's so different than I am and it's always challenging playing somebody who's not like you.

"Alex is searching for an identity," Tierney says. "Music is a way for him to express himself. When that's taken away from him, it's like it killed him."

Tierney attended Royal West Academy High School in Montreal. He started acting when he was six in a film called Obsessed.

"At the time," he said, "the Montreal acting community wasn't that large so every time someone in my age group was required for a film, I was given a call."

He has since acted in Pin, Rainbow and the upcoming False Pretences opposite Eric Roberts.

You can catch his performance on the Straight Up finale on CBC TV April 15 at 8 p.m.

Play has no connection to reality

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Good intentions do not make a play. It's an old theatre maxim, and it applies to Cherry Docs by David Gow, running at Factory Theatre until April 19.

A Jew-hating skinhead is on trial for murdering an Asian in Toronto and a liberal, middle-class Jewish lawyer is assigned by legal aid to defend him, if the lawyer decides to do it.

It's an explosive idea with lots of potential, but in the end it doesn't come to grips with the problem of anti-Semitism, even in the workplace milieu of the skinhead, let alone in the corporate board room.

Rather it's a case of skimming the surface, which is popular with theatre folk who may see Jewish content plays as a way of filling theatre seats, without hitting the nitty gritty or bottom line.

Playwright Gow has a good ear for middle-class perceptions of the multi-racial society, but his thesis that love, not tolerance, conquers all is like Political Science 101.

His idea is that Danny Dunkelman (R.H. Thomson) will defend the skinhead (Ross Manson); and so he has Dunkelman look at his late father's tallit for inspiration and give his father's briefcase to Manson into the bargain. The actions are symbolically interesting, but they do not help resolve the central debate of the play.

This is not to criticize the acting abilities of Thomson and Manson, who both go an extra mile to make it work. Or, for that matter, the quality of the writing.

The direction by Richard Rose and the staging give the play a cartoon-like quality not helped by the menorah burning behind a scrim, as two slides on a screen provide a weak ending.

To sum up, Gow's premise that a well-intentioned lawyer, despite personal faults, can change a steel-booted anti-Semite for the better is a nice fairy story, but it has no connection to reality.

The critics and others who have a vested interest in not rocking the boat will like Cherry Docs, but this reviewer can give it no more than an E for effort.

Lyrics hold the seeds of indestructible people

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — She wears no makeup and a simple, long black dress. There are no strobe lights and glitzy special effects.

But before the evening is over, Adrienne Cooper, and her pianist-arranger, Zalman Mlotek, have sung the songs that kept Jews alive or ushered them to their death.

For 500 rapt fans at Trinity-St. Paul's Centre, there will never be another night like it. How could there be, because as Cooper and Mlotek say, they are still trying to decipher the music of the ghettos of Warsaw, Lodz, Kovno and Vilna.

So their show, Ghetto Tango, must keep changing as researchers learn a little more about the songs that had to pass censorship and yet conveyed vital information along with entertainment.

As Cooper says, "The music carries an encrypted energy that remains indecipherable."

That may be, but the haunting, rousing renditions of Moyshe Hart Zikh, Vayl Ikh bin a Yidele and Mues (Money), among others, were clear enough to those who heard them. In those lyrics were the seeds of an indestructible people.

Not quiet on the Eastern Front

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

For many who fought in World War II, the Eastern Front became synonymous with hell. To many German soldiers, the threat of being sent to Russia was one to take seriously indeed. Some preferred to work in the concentration camps.

It was probably even worse for the Russians. Poorly trained, and even more poorly equipped, the Russians suffered the worst losses of the war. It is currently estimated that up to nine million Soviet troops died, but if you include civilian casualties, the figure is close to 30 million.

There are many books written about the Soviet/German war, but My Just War, the memoir of a Jewish Red Army soldier in World War II, by Gabriel Temkin (Presidio, 258 pages, $24.95 US) is superior because it is a personal account.

Unlike the books that focus on military leaders, tactics, strategies and weaponry, My Just War is one soldier's perspective, full of eyewitness accounts of arguably the most horrific battle ever fought.

Temkin, a Jew, was born in Poland. He was 18 when the Germans invaded Poland, and he fled with his fiancée Hanna to Bialystock, which was under Soviet occupation. In 1941 when Germany invaded the Soviet Union, Temkin was conscripted into the Red Army.

In Stalin's U.S.S.R., all foreigners were treated with suspicion and because he was a Polish refugee, Temkin was not "trusted" enough to serve on the front. He was transferred to a military labor battalion and spent the first part of the war building tank fortifications.

On July 8, 1942, almost a year to the day of the German invasion, Temkin was captured by the Germans and became a PoW.

Being a prisoner of war was a sort of "Catch-22" for a Russian soldier. On the one hand, treatment by the Germans was often barbaric. Figures cited by the author show that 2.8 million Soviet PoWs were killed, mainly by starvation, in the first eight months of the war. On the other hand, in the Soviet Union, becoming a PoW was tantamount to treason:

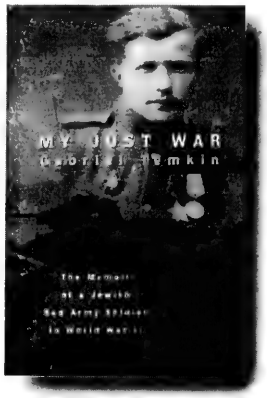
"Families of Red Army soldiers who gave themselves up as PoWs were to be denied government benefits and aid. He who became a prisoner of war could be exonerated from guilt and shame, but only if he got out or was killed while trying to escape."

For Temkin, the situation was even worse as he was Jewish, and Jewish prisoners were subject to "special treatment" by the Nazis:

"Hunting for Jews [amongst Russian PoWs] was the first thing they were occupied with... [when one circumcised Russian prisoner] continued to deny being Jewish, he was mercilessly beaten and forced to dig his own grave before being shot."

Fortunately for Temkin, his Aryan looks fooled the Germans and his heritage was never discovered.

Temkin escaped from the camp and after spending some time on a kolkhoz (collective farm), he eventually reunited with the Soviets who by now, after Stalingrad, were on the offensive and slowly liberating Russian and Ukrainian towns from the Germans.



As with all prisoners of war, Temkin was ordered to report to an NKVD (predecessors of the KGB) camp for interrogation. As a prisoner of war and because he had spent some time living under German occupation, he was suspected of being a collaborator, but when he told the NKVD officer he was Jewish, his interrogator realized his error and burst out laughing. There was no way he could have been a collaborator.

Temkin was placed in a reserve unit and saw active duty in May 1943. His knowledge of foreign languages soon got him transferred to a reconnaissance platoon where his job as part of the Soviet vanguard was to capture German soldiers to find out the enemy's strength and position.

Temkin describes his tour of duty on the front in great detail: how the Russian soldiers were ill-trained, how they frequently marched into battle without rifles, the hundreds of miles they covered on foot in the snow, sleeping in rye stacks...

His vivid description of the scorched earth policy the retreating Germans carried out is shocking. Even more shocking is the casual attitude the soldiers and civilians had towards all the death and destruction around them.

One scene that comes to mind is of a woman Temkin saw who carried around with her a German soldier's legs. "She lifted her shawl revealing an axe and a pair of glossy officer boots with protruding legs cut off above the knees. She liked the boots, she told me, but could not take them off because they stuck tight to the stiff's frozen legs. At home, as they thawed, the legs could easily be removed without damage to the boots."

There are many other descriptions of the horrors of the battlefield plus the occasional first-hand analysis of the Soviet army. There is, however, one scene I found touching.

Frequently, when any of the troops marched past towns as prisoners or advancing soldiers, the women watching from their houses would take pity and feed them or do their laundry and provide them with shelter. "More than once I saw a mother looking at me tenderly, as holding back tears or shedding them profusely, she would whisper: 'Perhaps your mother is now taking care of my boy.' Such words would make my throat tight with emotion. I would have liked to take my mother's photo out of my pocket and show it to those loving mothers ...but would they have been smiling gently at me if they knew I was Jewish?"

Temkin also touches upon a touchy subject: the reputation the "liberating" Red Army had for raping and looting. "In Hungary, and later in Austria," he writes, "incidents of violating women ceased to be a sporadic phenomenon... the stories of shooting, hanging, torturing, raping, looting and burning could hardly have been exaggerated...the desire to avenge [the German atrocities in the Soviet Union] did not need to be instilled by propaganda. The 'simplest' way to avenge was to prevail over the enemy's women, to satisfy a sexual need while simultaneously retaliating for factual or perceived wrongs."

Although Temkin admits that these acts happened, there is one thing he wants to set the record straight on. The stories regarding ill treatment of children were not true: "Whatever their behavior towards adults might have been, on the basis of what I myself witnessed, I would claim that Russian soldiers had generally too many tender, gentle, soft feelings for children to hurt them deliberately."

My Just War is filled with such observations and descriptions. Having been interested in the Eastern Front of World War II since I was a teenager, I found this book a fascinating read. More than an academic/historical description of the war, Temkin narrates his book from the heart of a soldier who fought in this "living hell."

Pedophilia treatment helps reduce sexual assaults

BEERSHEVA — Sexual assaults on 500 children a year in Israel have been prevented by a new treatment for pedophilia, according to the estimates of Dr. Eliezer Witztum, a professor of psychiatry at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

The treatment, a combination of behavioral therapy and a new drug that reduces testosterone levels, was developed by Witztum with Dr. Ariel Rosler of the Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Centre and tested on paroled pedophiles over a period of three to four years.

According to Witztum, the drug, called triptorelin, reduced the men's deviant sexual fantasies and urges and enabled them to control their behavior. Not one of the 24 men undergoing treatment has committed another sexual offense against a child.

In a report on their study in the New England Journal of Medicine, Witztum and Rosler claim that their drug is more effective and has fewer side effects than testosterone-reducing drugs currently being used in the United States. The Israeli drug is given by injection once a month so that doctors can be certain that known sex offenders are getting their medication.

Ten years ago, Israel's Probation Services asked Witztum if he could find a way to prevent recidivism among paroled pedophiles. While many psychiatrists in Israel are reluctant to treat this population, believing they cannot be helped, Witztum accepted the challenge to treat non-violent child molesters. A cultural psychiatrist, he says he knew that "to succeed in this almost impossible mission, you must add some biological element in order to help these people overcome their impulses."

Side effects

Not satisfied with either the efficacy or the adverse side effects of the drugs he tested on patients, he turned to Rosler, an endocrinologist and expert on sex hormones. The result of their collaboration was a treatment combining the synthetic hormone triptorelin with behavioral and cognitive therapy that worked on all 24 men in their four-year study. Triptorelin has not yet been approved for use in the United States but is marketed under the brand name Decaptryl-CR by Ferring Pharmaceuticals, the Swedish company that financed the study.

For behavior so potentially damaging as pedophilia, Witztum insisted on an uncontrolled study. He says a two to three-year study in which acknowledged child molesters would be given a placebo rather than genuine medication would be immoral.

The next step, says Witztum, is to coordinate treatment with other countries to increase the denominators and further prove its effectiveness. The doctors are also working to modify its side effects, which include impotence, hot flashes and bone weakness.

New AIDS treatment used at Hadassah Hospital

JERUSALEM — Doctors at Hadassah-University Hospital have received permission from Israel's Health Ministry to be the first in the world to try a cutting-edge AIDS treatment.

Using an innovative cell therapy, AIDS patients will be given immunologically active lymphocytes following transplantation of bone marrow stem cells from a healthy sibling's blood.

This procedure, pioneered by Prof. Shimon Slavin at Hadassah, has already cured dozens around the world suffering from non-cancerous genetic disease. This is the first time in the world the treatment will be used for AIDS patients.

According to Slavin, the Donor Lymphocyte Infusion (DLI) is "likely to reduce the amount of available HIV-1 in the patient's blood by eliminating the stores of the virus concentrated mostly in bone marrow-derived cells — turning the clock back and restoring his condition of several years before."

The DLI procedure will be performed by Slavin's Bone Marrow Transplantation Department and the Cancer Immunotherapy and Immunobiology Research Centre at Hadassah-University Hospital in cooperation with the Hospital's AIDS Clinic, led by its director Dr. Shlomo Ma'ayan.

Slavin was the first to use a modified version of DLI 11 years ago on a baby suffering from a terminal case of leukemia, who is today alive and well.

Because DLI is regarded as experimental, its high costs – comparable to conventional bone marrow therapy, but far less risky – may not be covered by Israeli health funds. "The best solution would be for a philanthropist to finance the cost of the first few patients so we can show that it works," Slavin said.

Its' time to fire up baseball's 'religious' passions

By DAVID S. BEDEIN
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — With the resumption of the baseball season, I have surfed dozens of Jewish Web sites that are alive with the thrill of the return of North America's national pastime – baseball.

In my travels, I have detected a religious passion for Abner Doubleday's invention. Indeed, an editorial that recently ran in the Atlanta Jewish Times praised American baseball as a Jewish religious national pastime.

As an observant Jew, I would agree that the point is well taken. I think the time has come to declare once and for all that baseball is indeed "a religion."

The first step in the introduction of such an ecumenical religion would be to introduce the custom of confession for those of us who have sinned off the great diamond.

I seek an appropriate egalitarian minyan to come out of the dugout tp hear my own previously undisclosed confession.

Yes, I have sinned with my mitt and scorecard in place.

You see, I grew up in Philadelphia, a place where the Phillies never won and where prayers never helped.

Then came 1964, the year after my bar mitzvah, when the Phillies looked as if they were going to the World Series.

It was also a time when my Chabad Hebrew school teacher often reminded me that I was now responsible for keeping the mitzvot myself. I was of age.

I put in a special prayer for each of the Phillies on the first day of Rosh Hashanah, reciting the lineup and even the bullpen, when the Ark was open for special prayers.

But I decided that the second day of Rosh HaShanah would require something more – a personal pilgrimage to Connie Mack Stadium.

After I heard the blowing of the shofar at Overbrook Park Congregation, I quietly moved to the back of the shul, feigning a tummy ache to my little brother and sister.

I had five crisp one dollar bills that wouldn't jingle, which I had saved from my summer paper route.

I headed in the direction of the bathroom, looking this way and that, feeling like Moses when he had just killed the Egyptian. I made a dash past the old men who were talking and calmly walked two blocks to the bus that took me to 69th Street and then the subway.

I was afraid to look back. Maybe I would turn to a pillar of salt like the kind you'd find on a Philadelphia soft pretzel.

I had made a clean break.

I was in my bar mitzvah suit, en route to Connie Mack, in line for those great unreserved seats behind home plate.

I had thought of everything: my Phillies hat was in my tallit bag – good cover for my yarmulke. I had kept the machzor with me and had a scorecard carefully folded inside.

The Phillies were playing the hapless Mets that day. There were 12 games left in the season and the Phillies were 6½ games ahead. In the fifth inning, around Minchah time, Frank Thomas, the Phillies' much-needed right-handed power hitter whom they had recently acquired, was on first. It was well known that Thomas routinely sprinted to second base on an infield ground ball.

That day was no different. Suddenly, Thomas made his move and slid head first into second base.

When he got up, his finger was broken – something that almost never happens.

I heard Phillie radio announcer Richie Ashburn tell his audience that Thomas would be out for the season. Ashburn, who died last year, had been a Whiz Kid during the last Phillies championship in the year I was born. He represented the past and the future for the Phillies – like our prayer for the Temple to be restored.

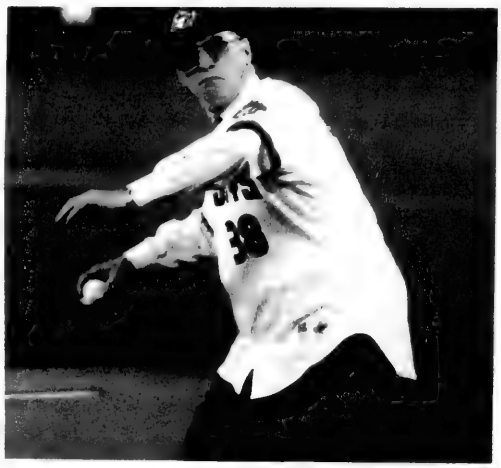
Well, the Phillies lost to the Mets and I made it back to Overbrook Park for Ma'ariv. Or at least that's what I told my mother.

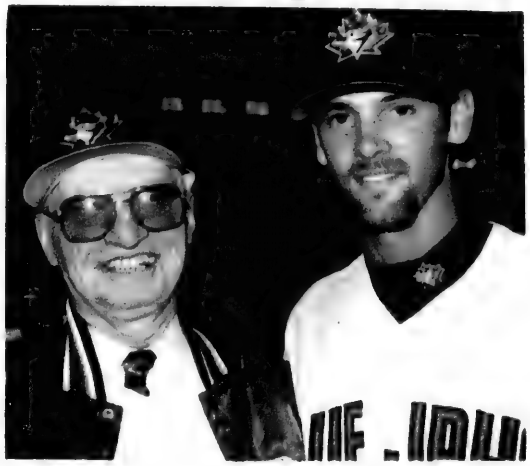
Little did I know the loss to the Mets would be the beginning of the Phillies' infamous 10-game losing streak. I felt I had jinxed the team, since the Phillies' slump began on the second day of Rosh Hashanah.

Everything that could go wrong in those 10 days did go wrong. By Yom Kippur, there was no joy in Philly Mudville. I remember my despondency that Sukkot, when the Yankees of Mantle, Maris, Berra and Ford were not facing our holy Phillies in the World Series. I phoned a call-in show on WCAU, then the CBS affiliate in Philly, to ask Ashburn what had gone wrong.

Ashburn gave me an answer that I felt was a reproach for going to the ball game on the second day of Rosh Hashanah. He said a great lesson is never to be overconfident and not to do things you shouldn't do. He was referring to Phillie manager Gene Mauch overplaying his star pitchers, Jim Bunning and Chris Short, but I thought he was referring to my Rosh Hashanah escape to Connie Mack Stadium. At the time, I had thought of it as a pilgrimage.

Baseball as a religion? It's always had the trappings.





IN THE BIG INNING...

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, retired spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, winds up to hurl the first pitch of the Toronto Blue Jays' second season game last week at the SkyDome. The honor was part of the festivities marking Rabbi's Kelman's retirement after 38 years at Beth Emeth. With him (above right) is Jay's outfielder Shawn Green. The rabbi even composed a prayer for the team. [Photos: Chuck Kochman/System 4 Productions]

The Inside Back

Sage advice for Hugh Segal: Go for it! Uh, maybe not...

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

By the time you read this, veteran Tory strategist and quintessential back-room boy Hugh Segal probably will have decided to seek the leadership of Canada's Progressive Conservative (PC) party, to fill the void left by newly minted Quebec Liberal Jean Charest. (Last week, insiders were saying Segal was "90 percent decided" that he'll run.)

I've always admired Segal for his insights, erudition and moderate conservatism, and I even met him once. So it came as something of a surprise that he didn't consult me on whether to seek the job of top Tory. To remedy what I assume could only be an oversight on the part of his handlers, I herewith submit my own reasons why Segal should go for it, and why he shouldn't.

Segal should stay out of the race because:

• He's Jewish. Despite our noble efforts to achieve cross-country hyphenation of our identities, Canada may not be ready for a Jewish leader of the PCs. Ontario wasn't ready for Larry Grossman, who was considered too Toronto and, yes, too Jewish for the rest of the province.

• The polls are against him. Segal is registering just four percent national support. He even trails John Crosbie and is well behind Joe Clark in the race for the public's affections. He's seen as too east-coast, and a little too wily, thank-you very much.

• He has no direct political experience. Segal's lungs are doubtless less than pristine thanks to 25 years of inhaling all that back-room smoke. He's a thinker, a mover of chess pieces, not a trench warrior. He ran for seats in the House of Commons in 1972 and 1974, losing both times, and made an aborted run for the Tory leadership in 1993. The gutter sniping didn't become him. He looked much better as principal secretary to former Ontario premier Bill Davis, and Brian Mulroney's chief of staff.

• He's too conservative. Insiders say Segal isn't as pink as he seems. He served as an unpaid adviser to Mike Harris in the early days of Ontario's most right-wing government in recent memory. He's a strict law-and-order man, and still has strong connections to Harris.

• Although long associated with Ontario's Big Blue Tory machine, Segal is a bilingual Quebecer. It's time for someone outside Quebec to lead the Tories and possibly, the country.

Not bad.

Now, the reasons why Segal should throw his hat into the ring:

• He's Jewish. The party once led by John A. Macdonald needs a leader who graduated from Montreal's Talmud Torah school system, and speaks a passable Yiddish to boot. Segal would bring Jewish sensitivities to the job. In fact, he embraced the Tories in the late 1950s because as a Jew in Quebec, he felt like an outsider, and John Diefenbaker's Conservatives were successfully reaching out to other outsiders, like fishermen and farmers. Segal's Tories would be inclusive, cozy even.

• The polls are against him. That's not necessarily a bad thing. The polls were against Joe Clark in 1976, and against Alexa McDonough too. The polls loved Kim Campbell. Polls, shmolls.

• He has no direct political experience. And thus, no baggage, axes to grind and dark agendas. But he can duke it out with the craftiest politicians too.

• He's not all that conservative. Segal espouses a moderate conservatism, tempered with compassion and a limited form of state intervention. A self-described Red Tory, his heroes are Bill Davis and Alberta's Peter Lougheed. In fact, Segal says he's jumping into the fray mainly to stave off the Reform party's hijacking of the right's agenda, and to avoid a Reform-Conservative merger. He's been extremely critical of Preston Manning and Mike Harris, and takes pot shots, even if polite ones, at rightist maven David Frum.

• He's a bilingual Quebecer. At this stage of the game, the federal Tories need someone who speaks the language of Quebec to lead the country into the next referendum campaign.

There.

Now Segal can make an informed decision.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am 48 years old. My mother and father who are respectively 82 and 87, have been becoming increasingly dependent on me for the past couple of years. I am very willing to help my parents, but I find that their demands are becoming overwhelming for me. They often call me at the last minute, expecting me to leave work to take them to appointments and so on. My siblings all live out of town and don't understand how much I do for our parents. I also feel that all the time I am giving to my parents is taking away from time I should be spending with my teenage children and husband. What can I do to balance these pressures? I feel like I'm being pulled in all directions.

JH

Dear JH,

Firstly, it is important for you to know that you are not alone in your feelings of "being pulled in all directions." The feelings of being overwhelmed are very common and understandable. Without the support of other family members, taking care of aging parents can become very difficult.

You may wish to look into community supports that exist specifically for adult children caregivers. These may help you cope with the myriad of feelings and problems you are facing in your caregiving role. You may also want to elicit the help of other agencies that can help you with the variety of jobs you have taken on as a caregiver. For example, you mentioned that your parents call you, expecting you to be able to take them to their medical appointments – certain organizations offer volunteer accompaniment to appointments, whereas others will accompany for a fee. The community is full of resources intended to help you and your parents. Contact your local social service agency and ask them for help in locating the many resources existing in your area.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Hamas suspect claims he was tortured by PA

By STEVE RODAN and MOHAMMED NAJIB
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Hamas member Ghassan Adassi, charged with complicity in the killing of bombmaker Muhi Sharif, sent a message from his jail cell last night that he was tortured by Palestinian Authority (PA) interrogators to get him to confess to a crime he did not commit.

Meanwhile, Sheik Abdullah Nimr Darwish, the head of Israel's Islamic movement, began mediation efforts between the PA and Hamas. He met yesterday in Gaza with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat and later with Hamas leaders.

Denies confession

"I know that this letter can lead to my death," Adassi wrote in a letter obtained by The Jerusalem Post. "I know, however, that I have died a million deaths already in prison.

"To the whole world, I say I don't know anything in the murder of Muhi Sharif. I didn't participate in or witness his death as attested by my interrogators. I gave this version after torture and threats that I had never experienced in my life."

Adassi said PA interrogators accused him of collaborating with Israel and killing Sharif "for Jewish interests."

"They beat me harshly and prevented me from sleeping for three continuous days. They hung me by my hands from the ceiling of my cell... They compelled me to sign by force," he wrote.

Adassi was one of five Hamas members accused of participating in the killing of Sharif on March 29. The PA said Hamas fugitive Imad Awadallah has confessed to the killing of Sharif and blowing up his car to conceal the cause of death. Hamas said the PA has so far detained about 300 of its members. The PA said the number is about 60.

Imad is the brother of Adel Awadallah, now regarded as the most wanted Hamas fugitive.

Palestinian Preventive Security chief Jibril Rajoub denied Adassi's accusations and doubted the authenticity of the letter. "If he was strong enough to type this letter, I don't see how he was tortured," a Rajoub aide said.

In his letter, in which he appealed for protection from Arafat, Adassi accused Rajoub of threatening to harm his sister unless he

Conversion institute approved

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A special cabinet subcommittee last week approved establishment of a joint conversion institute run by the three streams of Judaism, formally setting into motion implementation of the Ne'eman Committee's recommendations on the conversion issue.

The institute is to be set up in Beersheva, which has a large concentration of immigrants from the former Soviet Union, and is to be headed by Benjamin Ish-Shalom, a former Hebrew University professor of Jewish philosophy who today heads Beit Morasha of Jerusalem – the Centre for Advanced Jewish Studies. The directorate of the institute is to be made up of representatives of Orthodox, Reform and Conservative Jewry.

The subcommittee's statement reads: "The government views positively the recommendations of the [Ne'eman] Committee... The implementation of the recommendations will bring closer together the different parts of the nation, both in Israel and the Diaspora."

But no sooner had the panel announced its decision, then it was attacked by both haredi and Reform and Conservative spokespersons.

Nevertheless, Finance Minister Ya'akov Ne'eman, who chaired the committee and seemed set on implementing the findings, said he is "satisfied" by the decision.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Zundel Decision Reserved

TORONTO — A human rights tribunal has reserved a decision on a motion to throw out the case against Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel. Its decision is expected by May 11.

Doug Christie, Zundel's lawyer, had asked the tribunal to quash the case because of a perceived lack of impartiality.

The human rights tribunal is hearing a complaint that Zundel violated the Canadian Human Rights Act by distributing hate material through a computer Web site based in the United States.

ISRAEL

Peace Groups Write

JERUSALEM — Nine Israeli peace groups sent letters to leaders of the United States, United Nations and European Union urging them to step up their involvement in Middle East peacemaking. The groups, which included Peace Now, Rabbis for Human Rights and Bat Shalom, a women's group, blamed Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for the deadlocked Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

Cabinet Signs Request

JERUSALEM — Netanyahu recruited all cabinet members to sign a request to U.S. President Bill Clinton seeking a pardon for convicted spy Jonathan Pollard.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz, quoting government sources, said Netanyahu hoped to gather 100 signatures from members of the Knesset to add to the letter.

Youth Summit Planned

JERUSALEM — Seeds of Peace, a foundation based in New York and Washington, D.C., which creates coexistence programs for youth from regions of conflict, has announced that it will hold a Middle East youth summit from May 1 to May 7, in Villars, Switzerland.

The announcement was made at the American Consulate in Jerusalem.

WORLD

Clinton Honors Rebbe

WASHINGTON — Clinton has proclaimed April 7 as Education and Sharing Day in honor of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson's birthday. For 20 years, U.S. presidents have designated the late Lubavitcher Rebbe's birthday, the 11th of Nissan, as a day to mark his educational commitment and vision.

Foundation Gives Money

ZURICH — A private Swiss foundation distributed some $530,000 to about 5,000 Holocaust survivors, most of them in eastern Europe, according to the group's officials. The Foundation for Humanity and Justice is separate from the $190-million Holocaust Memorial Fund established last year by Switzerland's three largest banks.

Swiss Officials Silent

ZURICH — Until the final results of a study are published later this year, Swiss officials are refusing to comment on the extent of Nazi-looted art that found its way into the country. A Swiss newspaper reported earlier this week that more than 700 works of art looted by the Nazis, with an estimated value of several million dollars, are being held by museums and private collectors in Switzerland.

Cook Meets Jewish Leaders

LONDON — Robin Cook, Britain's foreign secretary, met with leaders of that country's Jewish community in a fence-mending effort.

At the meeting, Cook stressed Britain's commitment to Israel but said the country needs to have a "balanced approach" to the peace process. He later met with Israel's ambassador to Israel.

Cook was criticized by Jewish groups and Israel after he met with a Palestinian official at Har Choma, a Jewish housing project, while on a tour of Israel.

Animals Keep Kosher

JERUSALEM — Animals at the biblical zoo were not given bread during Passover. Although the prohibition against eating bread only applies to humans, officials thought visitors might be offended at watching the animals eat bread.

Lifelong Zionist Makes Aliyah at 102

JERUSALEM — Belle Goldstein, 102, recently arrived in Israel on aliyah from Brooklyn, N.Y. She is Israel's oldest immigrant from North America.

Goldstein has been involved in Zionist causes all her life. She has attended most of the Zionist Congresses since the 1939 congress in Geneva, and was active in American Mizrachi Women, serving as its president from 1942 to 1947. Mizrachi Women – now known as Amit – gave her a send-off.

She has visited Israel more than 40 times to see the state being built and to visit her daughter Raisel Rauchwerger, who made aliyah with her husband in 1946. Rauchwerger, now 74, is a retired English teacher living in Ramat Gan. Goldstein is joining another daughter, Leona Malka, 73, who has returned to Israel after a nine-year stay in New York. They are making their home at Kfar Gideon, near Afula.

Danny Tal, Jewish Agency emissary in New York, called Goldstein "the embodiment of 100 years of Zionism."

She is not Israel's oldest olah. Zipora Matiba of Chechnya and Rahel Smemshilashvili of Georgia made aliyah in 1996 at age 111.

Munk counters accusations against Swiss

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of Canada's best known businesspeople is promoting a Fairness for Switzerland Committee to counter accusations that the landlocked European nation mistreated Jewish refugees – including using them for slave labor – during World War II.

Peter Munk, president and CEO of Barrick Gold, said the international news media have picked up on a research document issued through the Simon Wiesenthal Centre that focused on conditions of internment in Switzerland during the war. "I feel that the tone was accusatory and void of any sense of appreciation," Munk told The CJN.

In a telephone interview from Switzerland, Munk said, "I and 14 members of the Munk family were accepted here and lived through the war here... There is no one who suffered more than we had. We were put to work and we did it gladly."

Munk said Switzerland gave refuge to his family in 1944 at a time when Jews throughout Europe were being slaughtered. The United States had closed its door to Jews fleeing the Nazis, and those who found themselves in Switzerland could count themselves among the lucky ones.

His family worked gladly, because "we wanted to make a contribution to those who put us up when other [Jews] were being killed.

"You have to please understand that in today's American terms, people worked hard. The Swiss worked hard. But it was a matter of survival. They gave us room and board... You must judge the era from the context of the time."

The report that has so upset Munk was prepared by historian Alan Morris Schom. Titled The Unwanted Guests; Swiss Forced Labor Camps 1940-44, the report found that Jews fleeing Nazi Germany were kept in 62 camps, often under very harsh conditions and forced to work at stone quarries, building roads or clearing forests.

The Schom report states that on Oct. 17, 1939, after the war had begun, the Swiss Federal Council (Bundesrat) ordered the expulsion of all refugees who did not hold visas. "It is estimated that upwards of 100,000 Jews were ultimately handed back to the Germans to face their fate in the 'Final Solution,'" the report states.

Other findings:

• Introduction of the "J" for Jude in German passports was requested by the Bundesrat in September 1938, making it easier to identify and bar Jews trying to enter Switzerland.

• Models for the refugee camps were proposed by Heinrich Rothmund, the same high police official who had recommended introducing the passport "J."

• Of the refugees accepted by Switzerland, only Jews were excluded from state support, food, housing and clothing.

• Despite financial contributions by the world Jewish community and Swiss Jews, "Bern levied a special Jew-tax on all 'wealthy' Jewish refugees... Wealthy Christian refugees were not required to pay a similar Christian tax."

• Internees in labor camps were under constant armed guard. Those who complained could be sent to "punishment camps" or "in most cases simply escorted to the nearest border crossing and handed over to the Vichy police or to the Gestapo."

• In December 1942, in the midst of the Holocaust, the Swiss removed "racial grounds" as a criterion for granting refugee status.

• Jewish families were often separated with members sent to different camps.

Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC), criticized Munk for generalizing from his own experience.

"I have dozens of letters" attesting to awful conditions suffered by Jewish refugees, including mistreatment, threats of being turned over to the Nazis and incarceration, even though Jews were not prisoners, he said.

More than 30,000 German and Austrian Jews were turned away at the border. "They were identified as Jews because the Swiss government had asked Germany to put a "J" in their passports so they could be turned away."

One Swiss border official, Paul Gruenninger, was fired by the Swiss government and stripped of his pension after the war, when they learned he had disobeyed instructions and allowed Jewish refugees into the country.

"He lived in poverty and was only rehabilitated two years ago and hailed as a hero," Steinberg said.

Negative image antidote

Last week I speculated in this column about the cumulative effect upon the generations of younger Jews, of seeing and hearing over and over again over the past 30 years, a predominantly negative image of Israel.

That effect, to state the obvious, cannot possibly be positive.

In his recently published, magisterial and majestically written history entitled Israel, Martin Gilbert alludes to the "negative image effect" in his concluding paragraph.

"Israel is often at the centre of attention. This is seldom for her achievements, which are considerable, or for the quality of life which she has created and which is the envy of many nations. It is Israel's wars, her political and social divisions, her conflict with her neighbors and with the Palestinians, and the stark intrusion of acts of terror into daily life that make its locations and its leaders internationally recognized."

I have no expertise in education, but it seems correct to me that it is in the realm of "education" broadly-defined that the true and long-lasting antidote to the "negative image effect" ultimately rests.

Using "education" then as a starting point, I offer up, as promised last week, the following thoughts as a possible approach "to help redirect the hearts of our children towards one of the things most precious in our hearts: Israel."

It is not a parenting secret that example is one of the greatest influences upon our children. Our behavior as youngsters very often becomes our habit as adults. Thus, to hope to imbue our children with the values and the causes that we hold most precious, we have to let them see visible tangible proofs of the importance of those values and causes in the "dailyness" of our lives.

This therefore becomes a larger issue than simply how to foster a positive, more aware attitude towards Israel among the younger generations. It touches upon upon factors which these past few years have been wrapped up in the question of "Jewish continuity."

For the purpose of this column, I narrow the focus from the generic (continuity) to the specific (Israel). However, it is a form of self-deception to think that support for Israel among our youth can stand apart from support for being Jewish, as it were.

Support, enthusiasm, advocacy, friendship, affinity – whatever the terminology for the association – must be anchored in a commitment to being Jewish. How one defines or expresses that commitment is not for me to suggest. For every person, it is a matter of deep intimacy and soul-searching.

Nevertheless, some sense of serious Jewish commitment is the beginning point for a serious relationship towards Israel. Our children will know as they evolve into mature, sentient human beings, and even before, whether our commitment is serious, and therefore worthy of following, or hollow or non-existent, and therefore as valuable as yesterday's newspapers.

From within this context of a serious commitment to our Jewishness, we talk and teach and dream and muse about Israel to our children as both a place and an idea.

This dichotomy is hardly new. In fact, it is merely another way of expressing the great wisdoms of our prophets and our sages and more recently, our pioneers.

But it is a far easier lesson to propose than to actually execute. The right balance must be struck between place and idea.

Israel must be taught as a place, because, after all, some five million human beings live there – our brethren and cousins – struggle, there, raise children, build roads and fight too many wars.

But the emphasis cannot be on Israel as place alone.

Israel as an idea, as first expressed in the Torah and then taught and continually retaught in every generation, represents among the noblest, most elevating of all human aspirations and causes, namely the constant striving for the betterment of all mankind.

But nor can it be only Israel as an idea that is the pre-eminent message to our children. For then, much like the haredi rejection of the modern state of Israel, our perspective becomes out of balance and we ultimately distort the very values we purport to be championing.

In the weeks to come, I will revisit this subject. There is much more that must be said.

Elsewhere in this paper on our Campus News pages, Frances Kraft wrote a story about Jewish Campus Service's (JCS) recent Volunteer Recognition Evening in which she listed this year's award recipients. Our reporter noted that JCS also presented "founding friends of the campus" certificates to Morris Zbar and to Helen Zukerman. What she did not write, however, was that she too, received a "founding friend" certificate from JCS.

The CJN is proud of Kraft's achievement. We are pleased that her extra efforts to provide wide, eclectic coverage of campus life and activities was also evident to JCS. Making The CJN more "relevant" to our students is a very high priority with us. In furtherance of that priority, we introduced a weekly campus page last year and our new Web site features a corresponding campus news link.

Our promise to students throughout the country is to keep our commitment to news of campus life an unflagging commitment. MBD

Media Human Rights Awards extends reach to the Internet

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights honored representatives of print media, radio, television and – for the first time – the Internet, at the recent 23rd annual Media Human Rights awards ceremony.

Six categories of media were recognized at a dinner attended by 400 people at the Sheraton Centre Hotel. League founder Lou Ronson (see CJN, Mar. 19) received the organization's prestigious Special Human Rights Award.

Several media award winners paid tribute to the people whose stories they told.

"We thank [them] for being courageous enough to open their hearts and to reflect on what can only be deep wounds, in the hope that others won't have to suffer the same abuse," said Teddy Katz of CBC Radio who co-produced award-winner Black Ice, a story of racial discrimination in elite level hockey.

"The CBC has taken quite a few hits over the years," he continued. "Special projects like this one have become a bit of a luxury. I only hope more time and money will be found in the future, so that these kinds of stories can continue to be told."

The other five winners were the Edmonton Journal for Alberta Sterilization Policy (print dailies category), Kenneth Lewis for his Web site The Einsatzgruppen Archives, Saskatchewan's The World Spectator – Moosomin for Freedom of Speech vs. Freedom from Hatred (print non-dailies), the New Brunswick Reader magazine for its series on Native heritage, culture and current issues (print series), and Vision Television for an episode of the series Skylight entitled Survivor of Residential School #63.

Honorable mentions went to the Ottawa Sun, for Sins of the Fathers, the Sioux Lookout Anti-Racism Committee for their Web site, the Ottawa Citizen for Our Father, the West Ender Newspaper of Vancouver for Rights and Wrongs, CBK Radio in Saskatchewan for Stony Rapids Sewer, the Evening Telegram of St. Johns, Newfoundland for One Tenth, and SRC-Saskatchewan for its short television documentaries Tuée dans la baie d'Hudson and L'adoption traditionnelle des Inuits.

As a judge in the radio category, Rev. John Erb, executive director of the Anglican Foundation, listened to 18 programs, from which two finalists were chosen.

"I learned more from those 18 programs than I could possibly imagine," he said.

"The media is our moral theatre," said awards chair Toni Silberman. "It reflects public attitudes and the public agenda and it has the power to change those attitudes and the agenda."

Ottawa Citizen reporter Shelley Page, whose story Our Father received honorable mention, spoke of the impact the article had in her community. The article, about the Catholic-raised family of a Jewish Holocaust survivor and their journey to knowledge of their roots, spurred the Catholic St. Basil's Church and the Reform Temple Israel to form a committee for better understanding between the two communities, she said.

"It was one of those rare experiences," she said of her two months' work on the article. "I'm 33, and I don't think I'll ever get a chance to encounter or write a story like this again in my life."

Elinor Caplan, MP, congratulated the winners for their "outstanding efforts to keep the fabric of our society in good repair."

The media awards are given for "alerting, informing and sensitizing the public to the nature and value of human rights," explained Rochelle Wilner, the league's national chair. Issues covered must be related to the Canadian scene, she noted.

The league's national director, Karen Mock, also presented awards to United Synagogue Day School student Matthew Harris for the anti-racism assembly he planned single-handedly at his school, and to three volunteers for their efforts on an anti-racism poster series used in subway stations and bus shelters.

Honoree Lou Ronson, to whom affectionate tribute was paid by a long list of speakers – including Rabbi Gunther Plaut, himself a previous recipient – said that without the intensive participation of the media, a society devoid of bigotry, racial intolerance and xenophobia can only be "an unreachable dream."

Non-Orthodoxy causes assimilation, rabbi warns

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Conservative and Reform movements lead to assimilation, warns Rabbi Moshe Stern, spiritual leader of Toronto's Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

In a light vein, using jokes and anecdotes, Rabbi Stern, chair of the Vaad Harabonim, was explaining Orthodoxy to (Conservative) Shaar Shalom Congregation.

"There is not a Jew alive who can trace his family back to the first Reform Jews – they are all assimilated. That tells you something about what happens when you dilute [the teachings of Judaism]."

Rabbi Stern was careful to distinguish between the movements themselves, and individual Jews, saying that "labels don't mean anything – we are all Jews."

Rabbi Stern denied the belief by many that because the Orthodox reject Conservative and Reform conversion, they reject Conservative and Reform Jews. "That's like saying we reject a child because of his bad behavior."

Torah Judaism, a term he said he prefers to Orthodox Judaism, believes that when Moses went up to Mount Sinai, G-d gave him two tablets of stone indelibly engraved by His hand.

"We believe that every word [in the Torah] is the word of G-d, immutable and unchangeable. If we believe in it, we have to accept it wholeheartedly."

People are constantly having meetings to discuss continuity, Rabbi Stern said, sending children to Jewish camps and to Israel.

"But we don't tackle the real problem – the Jewish home. Who are we trying to fool? We are wasting millions on somehow trying to maintain continuity."

The purpose of religion, he explained, is "to raise you to a higher level, not for the rabbi to go down to your level."

Telling an anecdote about a child asking her father, who had decided to put on tfillin one morning, who had died, since she only saw people praying when someone died, Rabbi Stern said "we are playing a game. We don't want an observant life, Shabbat or the mitzvot – yet we expect continuity."

There is no secret to Jewish survival, Rabbi Stern said. "It is a total Jewish commitment to living a Jewish life."

The Jews in Egypt, he said, were "so assimilated, so close to disappearing that had G-d not taken them out at that precise moment they would have disappeared," in spite of the fact that they didn't change their names, or their Hebrew language.

Israelis now think that having Hebrew names, speaking the language and living in Israel is enough to ensure the survival of the Jewish religion. But "53 percent of high school kids in Israel defined themselves not as Jews, but as Israelis."

There is a tremendous cultural gap between the secular and religious in Israel, which is not solely the fault of the secular, the rabbi admitted. "There is enough blame to go around for everyone."

David Ben-Gurion, the first prime minister of the state of Israel, "recognized that issues of personal status [like marriage, divorce and conversion] must be in the hands of rabbis who demand the highest standards of Halachah. It's the same as saying a state won't accept a false passport."

He questioned the current alignment between the Reform and Conservative movements against the Orthodox monopoly on conversion, "especially since the Conservative claim to accept Halachah, while Reform doesn't."

Quoting a prominent Reform spokesperson as saying that "what Reform does today, the Conservative will do in 10 years," Rabbi Stern warned that there is a movement by some members of the Conservative movement in the United States to urge the Jewish Theological Seminary to recognize patrilineal descent, which is anathema to those who follow Halachah.

"That's what happens when we begin to dilute Torah."

The Conservative movement, he charged, is "based on the wishes and demands of lay people," such as in the role of women, and driving to shul on Shabbat.

The polite, albeit obviously disapproving audience, responded with vigor during question period.

"You are drawing a line between your 'right' way and what everyone else is doing – you are preaching to us to convert to Orthodoxy," charged one. "Where is the common ground?"

"You are asking me to apologize for changes we didn't make," Rabbi Stern replied. "Our common ground is that we are all Jews, with one Torah and one set of laws."

He urged the adoption of one set of standards for conversion. "I don't want the situation to arise where my children can't marry yours."

Teens prepare for March of the Living

TORONTO — Nearly 200 Toronto students will soon join over 7,000 Jewish teens from across the world to march from Auschwitz to Birkenau. This year's March of the Living, sponsored in Toronto by UJA Federation, will have the largest number of participants in the program's 10-year history.

The march departs for Warsaw on April 19 and ends with special 50th Independence Day celebrations in Israel May 4.

The itinerary will also take teens to several Polish centres and to the concentration camps of Majdanek and Treblinka.

"The march began 10 years ago to answer a need for young people to connect to their Jewish past," says Toronto chair, Barbara Bank. "Although the march provides no answers to the atrocities of World War II, it urges people to get involved and help build their Jewish future by liberating the ghosts of the past."

"I have heard stories about the war from my grandmother," says 17-year-old participant Ruth Wahl. "It will be overwhelming to be a place that flourished and had such a rich existence before it was overtaken. I feel compelled to pay tribute to family members who were killed."

Each of the students submitted an essay and attended personal interviews before participating in the march.

Celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary with nearly 10,000 people at this incredible evening.

Syrian terms

Early last week, one Lebanese civilian was killed and three others were wounded when two bombs exploded near the border fence between Lebanon and Israel. No Israeli troops were injured, but it was clear to all concerned that they were the intended targets.

It was also clear that Syria was behind the bombings.

Like an unmistakably identifying signature on an unwelcome piece of correspondence, the bombs were a message from Syria's president, Hafez al-Assad. He is determined to undermine the proposal for the IDF's withdrawal from southern Lebanon adopted last week by the Israel cabinet.

As one military analyst told Yediot Achronot: "Syrian president Hafez al-Assad is not ready to stop the letting of IDF blood in south Lebanon before Israel agrees, in principle at least, to withdraw to the international border on the Golan."

But the deadly incident at the border was only the first piece of twine in a raveling string of Syrian mischief.

Assad also received Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharazi in Damascus last weekend, where Kharazi visited not only with Syrian officials, but also with the Iranians' surrogates in south Lebanon, the Hezbollah. It's highly unlikely their conversations focused on disarmament.

In addition, a report surfaced last week that Israel had complained to the United Nations that Syria is violating a 1974 ceasefire agreement by building fortifications near the Golan Heights. According to the report, the construction apparently includes some 30 miles of embankments leading from the heart of Syria to the Golan. Syria claims the construction was for agricultural purposes.

Assad's strategy is obvious. He will not allow any diplomatic initiative to rest in Israeli hands. He is intent on proving that any movement by Israel out of Lebanon will happen only on his terms.

Hatred, again and again

It is absolutely essential that the conflict between Israel and its neighbors not be converted into a religious one. As long as the struggle is one for an accommodation between contending territorial claims, there is hope for an eventual compromise. But if the struggle is defined in religious terms, the possibility of compromise becomes ever more remote.

That is why Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, and indeed even the radical, violent Jewish extremists are so dangerous. They believe that the justice of their cause emanates from God and that they alone understand God's word. In truth, however, God is simply the excuse, and hatred is their justification for their cause.

If there was still any lingering doubt about this, two events last week are yet further proof of the fact.

Hamas militants issued a statement calling on Muslims around the world to attack "Jewish and Zionist interests which have been spreading all over the world." They were ostensibly responding to and branding as a "fabricated tale" the conclusion by the Palestinian Authority that Mohiedeen Sharif, Hamas' master bomb-maker, had been killed by other Hamas operatives. They vowed "revenge" upon Jews and Israel for Sharif's death.

In Mecca, during a sermon to the thousands of pilgrims on the Haj, the annual pilgrimage by devout Muslims to the Kaba in the Grand Mosque in Mecca, an Islamic cleric called for a holy war to liberate Jerusalem. "How can Muslims stand idle in front of these aggressors?" he asked.

By casting his challenge to "Muslims," the cleric at the Grand Mosque implicitly, but surreptitiously and dangerously, defines the struggle as one against Jews. Hamas is more brazen; they have no need for surreptition. They openly call for violence against "Jewish and Zionist interests."

These exhortations to violence must be quickly and unambiguously censured by all governments seeking to help bring about peace in the Middle East. It is not acceptable merely to dismiss these statements as more-of-the-same, not-to-be-believed rantings of religious fanatics. They must be viewed and condemned for what they are: a call to murder.

Objects to CJN report on War Crimes Unit

I feel obliged to write to you concerning your front page story entitled "Government report on anti-Semitism slammed" (CJN, April 2).

A year ago when senior Justice Department officials were accused of anti-Semitism, I remember the dismay, even anger, within the Jewish community. Anti-Semitism can never be condoned. That the director of Canada's War Crimes Unit, dedicated to prosecuting the Nazi persecutors of Jews and others during World War II, was said to be guilty made the accusations all the more terrible.

John McCamus, a professor at Osgoode Hall Law School, well-known in the legal community and with a reputation for fairness and independent-mindedness was engaged to investigate the accusations. His exhaustive investigation resulted in the 260-page report released last week, which found no evidence whatsoever of anti-Semitism in the Unit nor any such evidence with respect to the managers responsible for its work.

I believe that the findings of the McCamus Report are of enormous interest to your readers. I was, therefore, disappointed to read your coverage, which seemed to place more emphasis on the disproved allegations of the complainants, rather than focus on the very positive findings which completely clear the War Crimes Unit of alleged anti-Semitism.

Peace requires compromise on both sides

While CJN editorials regularly and correctly point out that the Palestinian Authority's tolerance of terrorism and incitement to violence have been a major cause of the decline of the Oslo peace presence, they rarely refer to other causes.

The current Israeli government's attempt to expand existing Jewish settlements in the heartland of the West Bank, build more bypass roads on "public lands," and cut off Jerusalem from the West Bank Palestinian areas, equally go to the root of the dissolution of the peace process.

Negotiations will only move forward when both sides are ready to compromise on the fundamentals: maximum security cooperation and efforts to root out terrorism for Israel; and statehood in a viable, contiguous bloc of territory for the Palestinians.

Reject Jewish 'guilt' over Israel

Sheldon Kirshner fails to examine the dichotomy between the polls which show that "Most Israelis, Palestinians back Oslo" (CJN, March 26), while "efforts at true conciliation have not been accepted by either Arabs [or Israelis] at the grassroots level."

It is not hard to understand why Palestinians back Oslo, since they can continue their hostility to Israel and gain more and more territory at the same time. The more perplexing issue is why Israel continues to pretend the Palestinians are viable peace partners. The fact of the matter is that many Jews in Israel and the Diaspora believe that creating a Palestinian state will prove once and for all that Jews are unworthy of hatred.

A vestige of the Haskalah is the self-destructive view that there is something fundamentally wrong with Jews and Judaism and only repentance will absolve the guilt due to Israel's creation. According to this self-hating view, settlements and the Jewish religion are obstacles to Israel's acceptance by the international community. This is the reason Israel continues to make "confidence building measures" while the Arabs continue to violate the accords.

In addition, the elevation of the Kabbalistic principle of tikkun as the primary Jewish truth has mandated that the accords will achieve Shimon Peres' "New Middle East." Thus, Israel requires repairing, and the creation of a Palestinian state, despite all the evidence that Arafat and Co. are undeserving of statehood, will usher in the Herzlian dream of international peace and brotherhood.

The Jewish world is setting itself up for a disappointment on a par with the destruction of the second Temple. Only a rejection of all religious and secular forms of mysticism in favor of a reappraisal of what is possible on an individual as well as a national level will save Jews from assimilation and save Israel from further weakening her own strategic position.

Objects to registry of 'true Jews'

Andy Rechtshaffen writes that he shares a previous letter writer's "discomfort" with the Orthodox community's registry of "kosher" Jews in Israel (CJN March 19). But he goes on to say that there's no coercion nor any effect on "the rights of any Jewish group." In his view, "it is simply about preserving the Jewish nation..."

How can he be so blind to what has happened in our own lifetimes? How can he not see that this is a move that is parallel to that of racial purity, which has led to the worst forms of oppression and slaughter? How can he be so certain that such a "registry" will mean only "that our children and grandchildren will marry Jewish"?

I cannot see this move as anything else but another example of the short-sightedness and extremely ethnocentricity, indeed a form of outright phobia on the part of those who seek an absolute guarantee of "purity." In the past families certainly did ask questions and struggle with difficult circumstances, but rabbinical advice was sought when necessary and no one had to resort to an exlusive "registry" of true Jews!

On Pesach, the shofar sounded

A Mimouna folklore

By YEHIEL BEN AYON

The village of Tetuan at the northern end of the African continent was first settled in antiquity. Among the picturesque palms are excavations that predate the Roman Empire.

Jews have always lived in Tetuan, where they were known for their exquisite brass work as much as for their piety. And among them lived many sages.

Of note was one particular scholar from a distinguished and noble family. Young, but still recognized as a rising star, he was respected and admired by all for his kindness and sweet demeanor. Good fortune, however, would seemingly not shine on this man.

Slowly, but evident to all, was the sad reality that he was taking leave of his good senses. There was no malice to his madness. His erratic behavior was, to be sure, a great embarrassment, but other than that, he hurt no one. In the streets, people would ignore him, hurrying on and avoiding eye contact. It was rumored that the root of his insanity was his study of Kabbalah. In any event, the Jews of the mella (Jewish quarter) tactfully let him be.

This young man's passion, or rather obsession, became his shofar. At all hours of the day or night he would sound his horn. Even on the Sabbath day he continued to blow. Passers-by continued on, seemingly oblivious, but truly deeply saddened at the turn of events. His distinguished family, once quite proud, were now full of shame. As he was quite harmless and rarely if ever ventured from the confines of the Jewish mella, they simply let him be. For several months now, he would spend his waking hours either sounding his shofar or chanting incessant psalms in his deep melodious voice.

Early one morning during the Muslim period of Ramadan, he left the mella and went to the house of the Cadi – the head of the Islamic authority. Awakening him and his family, the young man lost no time in criticizing a certain Muslim cleric whose job it was to climb the mosque's minaret and call the faithful to prayer five times a day. His bellowing, he said, was most annoying; it sounded more like a cry of pain than a call for prayer.

The Cadi stared in disbelief. Here he was, awakened from his sleep, standing on the steps of his home, hearing his faith belittled – and by a Jew to boot. Rage turned to wonder, which turned to sheer glee as the young man proceeded to make a proposition. The young man was offering to perform the ritual himself. He claimed to be much more qualified than the old Muslim. Nothing could have so pleased the Cadi's ears – a Jew, a sage from a prominent family, who wished to make the call to prayer! With much haste and humor, the Cadi himself escorted the young man up the long flight of stairs to the small room at the top of the tower.

That morning, the residents of the mella awoke wide-eyed. Who would have believed it? Could all the ears of the mella be playing the same trick? The voice they heard was the same one, the all too familiar one, that had been haunting them all along with psalms; only now it was coming from the mosque at that early hour. The indignity could not be greater. Nor did it stop. Day after day, five times a day the residents of the mella cringed at the calls from the mosque. Again rumors circulated as to how and why the young man had come to officiate in the mosque's services.

One day, there was a new voice calling the faithful to worship. It was soon realized that the young man had had an episode of clarity and on seeing himself atop the mosque's tower and realizing the misery of his situation, he had thrown himself from the minaret in a desperate act of regret. Thinking now that this was the pathetic end to a pathetic situation, the Jews requested his remains for burial.

The Muslim authority had their own plans, however. The youth was to be interred as a Muslim. Explanations of insanity were dismissed, the Cadi claiming that in Islam, sanity and insanity were relative. Who is to say who is truly sane? Perhaps the entire world is deranged and he is sane. Pleas and even bribes were ignored. Any further discussion would be interpreted as a contemptuous affront to Islam. So it seemed that what had been an indignity in life would continue to be so in death.

The observance of Ramadan for the Muslims corresponded to the Pesach celebration for the Jews that year. Resigned and seeing no other option, the Jews concluded the holiday with a rather subdued Mimouna.

But a group of teenage boys had other plans, plans that were quickly put into action. First they covered their naked bodies in white paint, and as the town slept, they quietly stole through the streets to the mosque where the man's body lay, under the watchful eyes of two Arab guards. Inside the mosque, the boys stood around the body, pronouncing demonic sounds and making gestures. The panic-stricken, superstitious Arabs fled from the sight of these dancing bodies of the night.

With little time to indulge in even a small bit of laughter, they hastily took the young man and buried him just inside the main entrance to the Jewish cemetery.

The Cadi went into a furious rage. The next morning, the foolish guards were brutally disciplined. The elders of the community were summoned to escort the Cadi to the Jewish cemetery in search of a fresh grave. If, indeed, one was found, the entire community would be held liable. A large contingent of indignant Arabs and tense Jews also followed the angry Cadi to the outskirts of town, where the Jewish cemetery lay.

A peculiar thing happened as the leading group came within sight of the burial ground. Most stood aghast and motionless. Some people ran ahead, some shouted in disbelief, others ran in fright, while still others fell to the ground quivering with their prayers.

There before them, just behind the main entrance to the cemetery, the same entrance behind which the hasty burial had taken place just hours earlier, stood a massive boulder that effectively covered the grave and the entrance to the cemetery. The rock, which weighed tens of tons, sat, as it does to this very day, in silence and in quiet defiance, as if it had been there forever, from the time of creation.

The young man's name has for obvious reasons always remained anonymous; and the date of the event has been forgotten. The cemetery and the rock can be seen to this day, and the people of this story can be remembered in the town of Tetuan, Morocco. It is a site of pilgrimage, held sacred by Jews and Muslims, who come to pray to the same G-d of Abraham.

Opinions

Thanks, its been fun

By Viva Press in Halifax

That's it. My days in Halifax have come to an end. As of April 9, my university days were officially over. Well, my graduation isn't until May, but all of my classes are done.

Four years ago, I came to Halifax to the University of King's College. I came to study journalism and English. I came to be a journalist.

Now, three years later, my "campus voice" column has come to an end. (Well, I have one more but it won't be from Halifax.) And yes, I am sticking with being a journalist.

Since my first column about journalism as an unconventional career choice, I hope I have kept you entertained.

For me, there have definitely been some changes since my first year in Halifax. At the time, I was one of few Jewish students at the university. Explaining my Judaism was an every-day occurrence. That's not saying the Jewish students here now don't have the same experiences, but there are many more of them. When I first came to King's, there were no more than 10 Jewish students at the university. Today, I guesstimate that there are about that number in first year alone.

I have to admit that after I wrote my first column, I wondered whether I could find enough things to write about from Halifax. After all, Halifax is no Toronto. The Jewish communities are like a David and a Goliath. Yet Halifax proved to be filled with anecdotes and interesting stories.

From spinning dreidels to shaking the lulav to celebrating Purim after a Hamas attack, my columns have spanned a number of topics. With the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation, I had the opportunity to travel to some of the smaller Jewish communities in the Maritimes, including New Brunswick's Fredericton, Moncton and Sackville communities, and Nova Scotia's Sydney and Wolfville communities.

In this column space I've written about the Jews of Cape Breton and their testimony to Judaism; about Halifax's stance on countering Christian missionaries; about helping students keep in touch. In my summers, you've followed me through Jewish communities in Bulawayo, Harare, Venice and Cape Town. From Israel, I wrote about lineups and fast food, the bomb in Machane Yehuda and the market after the blast, and Israel's 49th anniversary.

Now I'm on the move again. My last columns in this space will be from Israel. I will be celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary in Jerusalem.

My four years in Halifax will always stay with me. I hope that from my writing, a part of Halifax will stay with you too.

I'd like to thank you all for reading this column, and to thank those who have written in both for and against my opinions. I now pass this column on to another "campus voice." So, I'd like to say thanks, it's been fun.

Passover my brothers

By Justin Korda in Montreal

As the large Ouvert – Open sign finally appeared on Orange Julep's giant landmark on Decarie Boulevard this week, we Montrealers were given our first sign that spring is upon us. What a relief!

For others, though, the indication that spring is around the corner accompanies the excitement and added stress that come with the Passover holiday.

Aside from all the family politics we have to endure while preparing for the seder, for many of us, Passover signifies two main themes. The first is the idea of freedom, for we are celebrating the redemption of the Jews from slavery in Egypt. And the second is purity or cleanliness, which is evident in the close attention we pay to observing the rules about not eating or even having bread in our houses.

The theme of freedom on Passover is not, however, simply restricted to remembering the freedom that was acquired by our ancestors thousands of years ago. Passover is an especially appropriate time to contemplate the value of freedom as it exists in our own lives today.

We are told that each of us should consider ourselves as though we were actually the ones who left Egypt and were granted freedom. One reason given for this commandment is that if we were able to fully empathize with and feel the pain of slavery, we would truly know how to cherish the freedom we have. This is perhaps the hardest thing a human being can do – actually and unconditionally to put ourselves into someone else's shoes.

Little explanation is needed in addressing the theme of the gruelling Passover cleaning. While sorting the mounds of trash that have been piling up in my room, I noticed an article from a recent Canadian Jewish News that spoke of Jewish student activity in the city. What struck me was that the students interviewed, who are all dedicated to the Jewish community, all seemed to feel that "there are no galvanizing political issues attracting Jewish students" today.

Soldiers reported missing in '86

On this point, I beg to differ. There are two reasons for my doing so that are quite relevant to this time of year.

In 1982, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman and Yehuda Katz, three Israeli soldiers, were reported missing in action. In 1986, Ron Arad, an Israeli air force navigator, was taken prisoner of war. These four men are still, to this day, unaccounted for. They are being held in full violation of the Geneva Convention of 1949 that stipulates the basic rights of prisoners. This includes the basic human right to be seen by a Red Cross representative and communicate with their families. These men have now been missed by their families for the past 12 to 16 years. Arad has a 13-year-old daughter who has not seen her father since she was a year old.

This is reason number one.

In 1985, a Jewish U.S. Naval Department intelligence officer came across information regarding Iraq's growing capacity for nuclear, chemical and bacteriological warfare. The weapons were meant primarily for use against Israel. This life-and-death information was deliberately withheld from Israel by the United States, an act which clearly contradicted the many information-sharing conventions that exist between the two countries.

The Jewish officer, Jonathan Pollard, chose to secretly transmit this vital information to Israel. Pollard is currently serving a life sentence in solitary confinement for this act of "treason." Pollard is also the only offender in U.S. history to be sentenced to life in prison for aiding an ally, proving that this penalty has gone far beyond the crime.

This is reason number two.

These five brothers of ours are crying for help and G-d forbid that they should ever hear that their plight was not "galvanizing" enough.

Just as in past years when students initiated the successful movements for the freedom of Soviet and Ethiopian Jewry, this year we also witnessed the power that students possess and the results that can be achieved when this power is applied. And if we students don't address this call, no one will. Their fate is on our heads.

This Passover, while we chow down that tasty matzah in celebration of our freedom, let's all try to truly put ourselves in the shoes of our five brothers who don't have the luxury of freedom, never mind the blessing of matzah for the festival. Perhaps if we could really imagine ourselves in any one of their situations we would ask ourselves how we can continue to live while allowing their suffering to continue. Hopefully, we would then resolve to ensure that their freedom is achieved and that the essence of Passover is realized for them. At the very least, we will have answered the question, "Why is this night different from all others?"

Judaism and the blue box

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It was actually Tu b'Shvat when I wrote this column and I thought that the best way for me to contribute to the spirit of the day was to write about trees. To be precise, not about trees only, but about the way we as Jews relate to God's creation. The middle of the Pesach week may constitute a special way of reminding the reader of the responsibilities that the freedom we take for granted imposes on us.

Twenty years ago, we all joined the bandwagon of ecology – simply because we thought it was right to do so. There is even an organization in existence that has as its sole objective to move Jews to become ecological, supporters because Judaism and its teachings demand it of them. Founded in 1993, it is called Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life (Coejl). Organized in New York, Coejl serves as a coordinating office for the Jewish environmental movement. In collaboration with a full spectrum of Jewish religious and communal institutions, Coejl supports and promotes environmental education, scholarship, advocacy and action in the Jewish community.

I do not know how I got on the mailing list of the organization's attractive little publication, but I am happy they sent it to me. The main content of the issue I received examines the connection between Jewish obligation and ecological wisdom.

Usually, the basic verse quoted is found in the Torah's first book, Bereshit, 2:15: "The Eternal placed human beings in the Garden of Eden to fill it and to guard it." That was our obligation to begin with and it has not ceased, even though we no longer live in the Garden. Another oft-quoted verse reads: "The heavens belong to the Eternal, but the earth was given over to humanity." (Psalm 115:16)

On the other side, opponents of ecology often quote the first chapter of Genesis (1:28) that says that we are placed here to "rule" the earth. It says nothing about ecology.

True, but Nahum M. Sarna, renowned Torah scholar, comments that the biblical "rule" that we are to enjoy over the earth was fashioned after a concept not of absolute and capricious rulership, but of a kind of sovereignty that was limited by superior moral and ethical obligations. Thus the real meaning of the text is that we are God's stewards and therefore must care for the earth.

I have always liked what my late admired friend, Rabbi Robert Gordis, had to say on this subject. He spoke of the disregard of ecological demands as a disregard of the divinely imposed obligation to enjoy what has been created and to remember that we are forbidden to destroy it, "for the earth is the Eternal's in all its fullness, the world and all who inhabit it." (Psalms 24:1)

If you are interested in establishing a strong bond between yourself and the demands that ecology makes on us, you may wish to contact the organization at 443 Park Ave. S., 11th floor, New York, N.Y. 10016-7322. Or, if you're connected to the Internet, you can e-mail them at [coejl@aol.com] and their Web site address is [www.jtsa.edu/org/coejl].

The Kirshner File

Opportunities for Jews in new Russia

By Sheldon Kirshner

Hundreds of thousands of Jews have left Russia, the Soviet Union's successor state, since the late 1980s. But of late, fewer Jews have been packing their bags, largely because state-sponsored anti-Semitism has all but vanished and a wealth of economic opportunities have opened up in the new Russia.

In short, Russian Jews haven't had it as good since the early years of the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, which temporarily shattered the barriers which had marginalized them.

During the first two and a half decades of Communist rule, Jews made remarkable contributions to Soviet society in all fields. Yet by the close of the 1940s, they were being purged from the ranks of the government, the armed forces and security services, the diplomatic corps, universities and scientific institutions.

The death of Joseph Stalin in 1953 put an end to purported plans to deport Jews to Siberia. But the anti-Semitism he had encouraged did not die following his passing. With several notable exceptions, Stalin's successors hewed to his policy of denying equal rights to Jews.

With the collapse of Communism, the gradual rise of a free market economy and the abolition of internal passports listing nationality or religion, the onerous restrictions which had relegated Jews to second-class citizenship virtually disappeared. These changes, which meant little to Jews intent on emigrating, created a fresh political and social climate for those who preferred to remain behind.

Freed of the institutional shackles which had limited their chances for upward mobility, Russian Jews have begun to taste the fruits of democracy and freedom. Amid this heady atmosphere, a select few have positively flourished, both in politics and business, despite the prevalence of popular anti-Semitism and the rise of openly anti-Jewish political movements.

One of these individuals is Boris Nemtsov. Formerly governor of the province of Nizhny Novgorod, he is now a first deputy prime minister in the federal government. He was appointed by President Boris Yeltsin. A 38-year-old physicist, he has been placed in charge of reforming the economy in its transition toward capitalism.

Three other such persons are Aleksandr Livshits, Yakov Urinson and Yevgeny Primakov. Livshits, the former finance minister, is currently deputy head of Yeltsin's office, while Urinson is deputy prime minister for economic affairs. Primakov, the foreign minister, is one of those rare birds who attained prominence under the Communist regime.

Sergei Kiriyenko, who is half-Jewish, was recently named prime minister. Grigory Yavlinsky, who's also half-Jewish, is a leading economic reformer, as well as leader of the liberal Yabloko political party in the Duma.

A consortium of bankers and media barons backed Yeltsin's 1996 run for the presidency, and two of the most visible ones were Vladimir Gusinsky and Boris Brezovsky.

Gusinsky, chair of the newly-formed Russian Jewish Congress, was an engineer and a theatre director before striking it rich as an entrepreneur.

Founder of the Most bank, with assets of over $1 billion, Gusinsky heads Media Most, a communications empire consisting of, among other assets, NTV (the first independent television network in Russia), the Sem Dnei publishing house, the Segodnya daily newspaper, a radio station (Ekho Moskvy) and a mass-circulation magazine, Itogi.

Gusinsky, 45, has impeccable connections. One of his powerful patrons, the mayor of Moscow, Yuri Luzhkov, harbors presidential ambitions. No shrinking violet, Gusinsky was reportedly instrumental in the removal of Gen. Aleksandr Korzhakov from Yeltsin's inner circle.

In the current fashion, Gusinsky retains a private militia to protect him from jealous competitors. The 1,000-strong force is said to be commanded by Felipp Babkov, an ex-KGB general who, ironically, was involved in the suppression of dissidents.

Berezovsky, 51, a mathematician by training, is reportedly Russia's wealthiest man, a magnate who once boasted that he and six other businessmen control half the Russian economy. He owns car dealerships and has interests in banks, real estate, an oil company, aviation and a television network.

By all accounts, he made his first million in 1989 by forming Logovaz – the first private automobile dealership in the Soviet Union – in partnership with Avtovaz, a state-owned car manufacturer.

Berezovsky has a controlling interest in ORT, the country's biggest TV network; in Aeroflot, the national airline; and in Yuksi, one of the world's largest oil companies. He also owns shares in Ogonyok, a magazine that has been compared to Life.

Portraying himself as a free market reformer, Berezovsky apparently amassed his fortune of $3 billion by insider trading and political connections. He has a relationship with Yeltsin's influential daughter and his chief of staff, and is said to be the president's personal financial advisor. When Forbes published a story linking him to organized crime, he sued, then hired an American publicist to burnish his image.

Besides being a smart businessman, he is a savvy political animal. According to newspaper accounts, Berezovsky played a central role in last month's ouster of the prime minister, Viktor Chernomyrdin. Two years ago, Yeltsin named Berezovsky to a national security post, only to discover that he had taken Israeli citizenship in 1994. Last year, Berezovsky was relieved of his duties. But by virtue of his Kremlin ties, he remains a politically potent figure, one of the "new Russians" who's changing the face of the country.

According to a survey commissioned by the Russian Jewish Congress, only 18 percent of Russians think that Jews have too much influence over Russian society. But another poll, released last week, shows that 46 percent believe that Jews commit ritual murders.

Living with terror

By VERONIKA COHEN

I am an Israeli citizen on sabbatical in Canada. For me, terrorist acts or the threat of terror is not something I read about in the papers. It's something I live with daily, even while I am in Canada, because my daughter and her husband live in Beersheva.

I start my day listening to the news in the morning, and end it listening to it at night as the new day begins in Israel. I worried for two years when my daughter served in the army, and lived in a permanent state of anxiety for three years while my son was doing his army service.

I welcome the concern of the Canadian Jewish community about the safety of Israeli citizens. What bothers me, however, is the unquestioning acceptance of the policy of the current Israeli government as the best means to ensure that safety.

From my experiences in Israel, which include frequent contact with Palestinians, it is my conviction that the current Israeli policy is creating feelings of utter hopelessness among the Palestinian people. It is a policy that has worsened the economic situation of Palestinians, as workers are denied the means of feeding their families. It is a policy that leads to daily humiliation of Palestinians. Is this the way to ensure security and to pave the way to peace?

The closure of parts of the territories locks Palestinians into small "bantustands." It has become more difficult for them to travel than before the intifadah. Jerusalem, which is not only the religious but also the commercial and medical centre for West Bank Palestinians, has become off limits to the majority of them.

This is what closure meant for our Palestinian neighbors:

The younger brother of a Palestinian friend of mine became critically ill. Fortunately, this time, the ambulance carrying him was allowed through the checkpoint. However, the young man's elderly parents and his brother were denied permission to be with him. Naturally, they had no intention of leaving him alone as he hovered between life and death for weeks in the intensive care unit of Mokassed Hospital. Every day they made an exhausting trek by foot that enabled them to circumvent the checkpoint.

Imagine the rage that the parents must have felt.

Nonetheless, part of the Israeli public and many Jews abroad, want to believe that closure is effective and will ensure security, just as people suffering from life-threatening illnesses are willing to place their hopes on miracle-working cures. The trouble with false cures is that we waste precious time that should be used to seek cures.

During one terrorist attack, close friends of a young Jewish woman who participated in the dialogue in the Palestinian town of Beit Sahour, were killed. These students were buried in North America but friends sat shivah for them in Jerusalem.

Young Palestinians from Beit Sahour phoned to ask if they could come to comfort their friend. The problem was how to obtain permits for them to enter Jerusalem for two hours. I turned to a friend at the Foreign Ministry. He was willing to request a permit and guaranteed to personally take the young Palestinians from the checkpoint to the shivah house and back. A morning's work on his part resulted only in a refusal.

A sympathetic Knesset member was no more successful. Was the security of the Israeli public enhanced by preventing these young people, Israeli and Palestinian, from meeting, and deriving comfort from their friendship?

Statements by the Israeli government that it regrets the suffering caused to the average Palestinian are disingenuous to say the least. In fact, the closure is imposed precisely to create an unlivable situation for the entire population. The assumption is that the Palestinian community will control would-be terrorists in order to avoid further punishment.

This is cruel, but not entirely illogical. However, it does not work because a reliance on collective punishment guarantees that there will be no trust between the Palestinians and the Israeli authorities.

Roots & Remembrance

A mother's story

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Shortly after her mother Frances died in 1989, writer Helen Epstein began visiting the university library near her Boston-area home, browsing through books on death, on Jews and on Central Europe.

"I was mourning my mother," she explains in her latest book Where She Came From: A Daughter's Search for Her Mother's History, "and if you had asked me what I was looking for in that enormous tomb of books, I would have said that I was looking for her."

Epstein also began writing letters to archival institutions in the Czech Republic and elsewhere, seeking traces of her mother's family. She had been told that her great-grandmother, Therese Frucht, had been an innkeeper's daughter who, like the composer Gustav Mahler, had lived in the Moravian city of Iglau.

By visiting the towns where her ancestors once lived, Epstein discovered enough about them, and the life they led in the century before the Holocaust, to fill the pages of this well-written and moving book, published recently by Little, Brown & Co.

Assisted by Jiri Fiedler, a foremost expert on Czech Jewry who is himself a gentile, Epstein was drawn to a series of hill towns around Iglau, including Brtnice, where she met a kerchiefed 85-year-old woman who remembered the Fruchts; the family name had previously been Furcht. "The casualness with which she used the name Furcht took the air out of my lungs," Epstein records. "I went numb. I sat down on the bench, scattering the hens, and let my companions ask questions."

Soon after, she and a companion reached the wooden doors of Brtnice's old Jewish cemetery, which were locked. Epstein's friend "felt none of my hesitation. He walked up to the closed padlock, gave it a sharp tug, and the entire bolt fell off the tall wooden door. He opened it, I followed. The grass was high but the graves were untouched. There in the first row, directly facing us, were two tall, marble tombstones which, in bold letters, read FURCHT and FURCHT. I stood rooted in place, a weight lifted from my head, my blood at rest."

In researching her book, Epstein drew upon a 12-page family history written by her mother and an oral history that she had taken from her mother in 1974. She also consulted the Czech State Central Archive in Prague as well as local archives in Kolin, Iglau (Jihlava) and Brtnice.

Like another recent genealogical work, Theo Richmond's Konin: A Quest, Epstein's book is told as a personal quest into which the author projects her feelings, uncertainties and reactions as the research progresses. Where She Came From is ultimately a tale of Epstein's own entry into the world.

She draws out the story of her maternal ancestors, ultimately coming forward in time to tell of her mother's experiences in Terezin and Auschwitz and the immediate postwar era, when she met her father Kurt Epstein, and produced Helen, the first of three children.

Most of the time, Epstein shapes the natural drama of her family's past without seeming to embellish. In a few spots, however, the narrative seems overly polished, and the reader is sometimes left wondering how certain details could possibly be stated as fact. But Epstein, best known for her groundbreaking 1978 work Children of the Holocaust, is generally careful.

The late American genealogist Rabbi Malcolm Stern once noted that nothing is more fascinating to the genealogist, nor potentially more boring to others, as the newly discovered details of one's family tree. It is to Epstein's credit that, except for a few scholarly passages, Where She Came From keeps the reader eagerly turning pages. By relating her family's history, Epstein provides an interesting summary of the sociopolitical history of Czech Jewry over the last two centuries.

Jewish Life

Books

By Bernard Baskin

The Gift of the Jews*, by Thomas Cahill (32.95 Doubleday).

Thomas Cahill is astonished at the indomitable spirit and sheer persistence of the Jewish people. He regards their identity across the millennia against impossible odds as a unique miracle of cultural survival.

"Where are the Sumerians, the Babylonians, the Assyrians today? And though we recognize Egypt and Greece as still belonging to our world, the cultures and ethnic stocks of those countries have little continuity with their ancient namesakes. But however miraculous Jewish survival may be, the greater miracle is surely that the Jews developed a whole new way of experiencing reality, the only alternative to all ancient world views and all ancient religions."

This is the thesis of Cahill's brief but provocative book: how a ragtag army of nomads shaped who we are today; how the ancient Jews through the values and sensibility of the Hebrew Bible became inventors of western culture.

The spirit of survival

Beginning with Abraham's departure from the Sumerian homeland, the Hebrews broke with the repetitive or cyclical view of history assumed by the religions of the time. Instead, they projected a world view in which the present and future became more important than the past. With this new perspective there was for the first time openness to change, progress and hope.

In this spirit, the prophets of Israel achieved a thoroughgoing revolution in human thought by insisting that God's Kingdom of peace, and mercy – not always visible in the present – would appear in the future, the goal of all human struggle and hopes.

As the Jewish people and their leaders gradually grew in moral stature and spiritual awareness, monotheism attained an ethical emphasis, a sense of justice and a depth of compassion. Through the biblical narrative, says the author, "We become witnesses to the slow evolution of our entire system of values. God becomes the 'still, small voice' of conscience, the God of compassion, the God who 'will be there,' the God who cares about each of his creatures, especially the human beings he created 'in his own image.' "

For the author, the Ten Commandments have had a greater impact on our moral thinking and endeavors than all other ethical formulations. They constitute a unique summing up of the duties binding on humankind, unparalleled in their simplicity and comprehensiveness. He asks of skeptics, which of the ethical commandments they would drop and which would they add. He concludes that "it would be fairly impossible to improve on the Decalogue as we have it." Their appreciation guarantees the stability of human society by controlling four "danger areas" – power, wealth, sex and speech.

With superb narrative skill, Cahill retells the old and familiar Bible stories and comes up with surprising and original insights. His praise for the Jewish people as the originators of our most precious and enduring values is unreserved. "Most of our best words, in fact – new, adventure, surprise; unique, individual, person, vocation; time, history, future; freedom, progress, spirit; faith, hope, justice – are the gifts of the Jews."

The author is certain that democracy, grows directly out of the Israelite vision of individuals, subjects of value because they are images of God, each with a unique and personal destiny. "There is no way that it could ever have been 'self-evident that all men are created equal' without the intervention of the Jews."

Never pedantic, inflated, or pretentious, The Gift of the Jews offers a singular summary of the influence and wisdom of the Hebrew Scriptures.

Saluting Righteous Gentiles

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"More than once, in every generation, they have risen up against us, to destroy us. But the Holy One, blessed be He, delivers us from the destroyers' hands." – the Hagaddah.

Those remarkable lines also have special relevance to the next holiday on the Jewish calendar, Yom Hashoah, which begins next Wednesday night.

While history has proven the quote from the Hagaddah all too true, there have also been individuals who made a stand against evil. Today, I would like to focus on the many Internet resources dedicated to Righteous Gentiles, people who risked their own safety and the safety of their families to save Jews from certain death in the Holocaust.

The most striking salute to these heroes is the memorial forest planted in their honor outside Yad Vashem. Yad Vashem was established by the Israeli government to create a memorial to the six million Jewish victims of the Holocaust [http://yad-va shem.org.il/]. But it was also given the legal responsibility of honoring "the Righteous Among the Nations" [http://yad-vashem. org.il/RIGHT.HTM]. To date, over 13,000 men and women have been recognized for their heroism. Aside from the recognition, Righteous Gentiles who choose to settle in Israel receive free health care and cash benefits equal to the rate of the average wage [http://www.btl.gov.il/ benefit/right/right.htm].

One of the most famous Righteous Gentiles was Raoul Wallenberg [http://www.algonet.se/~hatikva/wallenberg/]. According to the official site dedicated to the efforts of the Swedish diplomat, Wallenberg is credited with saving the lives of at least 30,000 people. Also of note is the Raoul Wallenberg Interview Project [http:// rwa.bibks.uu.se/].

During the '80s and early '90s, Sweden's Uppsala University conducted nearly 200 interviews with Nazi victims in Budapest rescued by Wallenberg. Transcripts of over 50 of those English language interviews can be found at this site. More recently, reports have surfaced that suggest that Wallenberg supplied U.S. Intelligence during the war [http://www.us news.com /usnews/news/raouhigh.htm].

Thanks to the efforts of author Thomas Keneally and filmmaker Steven Spielberg, the name Oskar Schindler is known around the world. New Orleans' Southern Institute for Education and Research Schindler's List Teaching Guide [http://www.tulane.edu/~so-inst/slindex.html], a large site, examines the historical basis of the movie and also supplies extensive background information. According to a very interesting article from U.S. News and World Report, the post-war years marked a sad decline for Schindler due to bad investments and a failing marriage [http://www .usnews.com /usnews/news/othersc.htm]. One highlight for Schindler occurred in 1962 during the first of his 17 visits to Israel, when 200 survivors and their families gathered at Lod airport to shout "Oskar, Oskar, Oskar!" Also see Oskar Schindler: The Man and the Hero [http://remember.org/imagine/schindler.html].

Of course, many other heroes lived their lives in relative obscurity.

Next week, we'll look at Miep Gies, the woman who hid Anne Frank. And we'll hear the stories of two diplomats who defied their own governments in order to save Jews. Then we'll ask the basic question: Why did some people choose to risk their lives to do good while so much evil surrounded them?

Ne'eman, Burg to highlight Mizrachi dinner

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mizrachi of Canada will be celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary with a dinner at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation in Thornhill on Monday, May 4, at 6 p.m.

Guest speakers will be Dr. Yosef Burg, world president of Mizrachi, and Yaakov Ne'eman, finance minister of Israel, as well as the chair of the controversial Ne'eman Committee, set up to deal with relations between the Orthodox and non-Orthodox.

As well, the evening will inaugurate the Kurt and Edith Rothschild Scholarship Fund, established to honor the couple on the occasion of Israel at 50. It will help students who are going to study in Israel for one year after high school graduation.

Kurt Rothschild, chair of World Mizrachi, was born in Cologne, Germany. He was sent to study in England shortly before the outbreak of World War II, and in 1940 was sent to Canada and interned as an "enemy alien."

After his release, he graduated in electrical engineering from Queens University, and had an extensive business career, first in Montreal and after 1958, in Toronto.

Kurt Rothschild

Rothschild became involved with Mizrachi in 1945, and has been active in the organization ever since, frequently in executive positions. He has also been active with Toronto Jewish Congress; United Jewish Appeal; Canadian Friends of the Jerusalem College of Technology; Canadian Zionist Federation; Shaare Zedec Hospital; Bar-Ilan University; The Central Fund for Traditional Institutions; Israel Bonds; Eitz Chaim Schools; Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot Girls School; and Yeshiva University.

He also works on behalf of many Israeli yeshivot, and hospitals and schools in Canada and Israel. He is also on the editorial advisory board of The Canadian Jewish News.

Edith Rothschild has served as president of the Toronto Council of Emunah Women and as chair of the national board of Emunah Women of Canada. She works with individuals and families as a psychological counsellor and psychotherapist, offers lifestyle change and holistic health counselling, and lectures and conducts workshops on whole natural food.

Kurt Rothschild told The CJN that the scholarship fund is very dear to their hearts. "A year studying in Israel is a significant development [for youngsters]. It brings them closer to Israel and to Judaism, matures them, and we hope will help them become community members and leaders."

He considers Israel "key to our Jewish life the world over."

"I remember the end of the war," he mused. "We were nomads – we didn't know where we fitted in. Then Israel was created. We want it to be the centre of Jewish life."

Rothschild said that he recognizes that there are problems and difficulties in Israel, but believes strongly that even so, "we should treat each other with courtesy."

While Jews can't all agree on everything, he said, and there are many legitimate areas of disagreement, those discussions "should be conducted with dignity – which is often sadly lacking."

Chrétien to attend Israel's 50th bash

TORONTO — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien has confirmed that he will attend one of the largest celebrations of Israel's 50th anniversary outside of Israel.

The prime minister will appear at the Night of a Lifetime gala performance at Toronto's National Trade Centre, Exhibition Place, on April 30, Israel's Independence Day.

The event will feature a two-hour entertainment extravaganza hosted by award-winning actor Al Waxman, featuring Israeli singing sensation Yoel Sharabi, Toronto's leading cantors, a 50-piece orchestra conducted by Maestro Boris Brott with guest cellist Ofra Harnoy, and a live satellite link to Israel's festivities.

An Israeli streetscape and marketplace, complete with a live 200-acre grove, will set the mood for shopping, eating, and dancing before the performance. After the performance, the party will continue into the night.

"The 50th anniversary of Israeli independence is an event for Jews and non-Jews alike as it reminds us of how much a country can achieve in such a short time," said Murray Koffler, the Toronto philanthropist and entrepreneur, who is co-chairing the event with his wife Marvelle.

"We are celebrating Israel's 50 years of achievement as well as the long-standing friendship between Toronto and Israel. We extend a warm welcome to everyone to share this magnificent multicultural event," said Julia Koschitzky, chair of the Israel at 50 community celebration.

Israel at 50 is a consortium of over 170 organizations under the auspices of the Consulate General of Israel and UJA Federation. The April 30 celebration is one of many special events marking Israel's anniversary year.

Doors open at 6 p.m., and the stage show starts promptly at 7:30 p.m. Tickets start at $18 and are available through TicketKing, 416-1212.

Munk defends Swiss

[Cont'd. from page 3]

For his part, Munk points to a Swiss diplomat posted in Budapest, Karl Lutz, as a wartime hero. Lutz, for whom Hungarian Jews have erected a monument, issued fake Swiss passports, saving many Jews from death, Munk said.

Publicizing the contributions of someone like Lutz is one of the goals of the committee, which is just getting off the ground, Munk said.

Munk said he was recruited to the committee by Thomas Borer, who is heading a task force coordinating Switzerland's investigation into the country's wartime activities. Borer took notice of him after the International Herald Tribune published his letter to the editor in January, in which Munk complained about the Schom report.

After speaking to Borer and agreeing to participate, Munk wrote to prominent businesspeople, inviting their involvement in the committee.

"I truly believe the time has come for informed, well-placed, private citizens to help set the record straight about Switzerland and to respond to the unfair and ill-informed Swiss-bashers. To do so, we are creating a Fairness for Switzerland Committee that will not only disseminate some of the facts, but also protect a relationship that is important to all of us in North America," states a letter sent by Munk to possible committee-backers.

Coming to the aid of the Swiss, at a time they are being unjustly vilified, is a cause that's "near and dear to my heart," he told The CJN. "They saved my family and stood up to the Nazis... This is a subject that is alive to me. It was the most important event of my life."

Interestingly, Golden Phoenix, a biography of Munk written only last year by Richard Rohmer, devotes only six pages out of 349 to a chapter on Switzerland, with almost no reference to the conditions faced there by refugees.

Rohmer reports that on the family's arrival in Basel in late August 1944, Peter was put in a hostel for students, "while his father, his stepmother and most of the other Munk family members were taken to the Hotel Belmont at Montreux, which served as the military internment camp for refugees."

Prior to the war, the family had been well off in Budapest and Peter's grandfather, Gabriel, had "paid heavily" to secure a place for the family on a transport of Jews that was a down payment by the Germans as part of the Kasztner plan to trade 10,000 Allied trucks for Jews. After a long train voyage that took them to the transit camp section of Bergen-Belsen, where they spent about one month, the family was sent to Switzerland.

CHRC releases annual report

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Human Rights Commission received 1,527 new complaints in 1997 with 29 percent of those – the largest single group – based on disability, states the commission's annual report for 1997.

In addition, 1997 "was not a banner year" for race relations in Canada. "We saw outbreaks of inter-racial violence in a Halifax-area high school, skinhead marches against Gypsy refugee claimants in Toronto, the persistence of systemic discrimination in hiring and the continuing dissemination of hate propaganda," the commission stated in its report. "All of these show that acts of intolerance persist in Canadian society."

Release of the report coincides with the 20th anniversary of the creation of the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Assessing the evolution of human rights in Canada, the commission's chair, Michelle Falardeau-Ramsay, said the topic is "a work in progress... A significant gap persists between the rights that have been won in law and the reality of people's day to day lives. The complaints we receive remind us that sexual harassment and unequal pay are still facts of life for far too many working women; that racism and racial tensions have not disappeared; that gays and lesbians remain targets of discrimination; that people with disabilities still have difficulty breaking down barriers to meaningful employment; and that aboriginal people still continue to suffer the legacy of centuries of mistreatment."

In her introductory remarks to the report, Falardeau-Ramsay said that while the Canadian Human Rights Act makes no mention of poverty or social condition as a prohibited ground of discrimination, "yet in the broader context, poverty is a serious breach of equality rights which I believe has no place in a country as prosperous as ours."

Experience suggests there is a link between prohibited grounds of discrimination, such as women, the disabled and aboriginal peoples and poverty, she said. For women there is also a direct link to pay equity, "since many of the working poor are women employed in low-wage, undervalued jobs. But even if that were not the case, it is difficult to argue that poverty is not a human rights issue, given the devastating impact it has on people's lives."

The commission also reported that despite incidents of racial bias, communities are mobilizing "to make it clear that racial and religious hatred would not be tolerated."

The report pointed out that "the growth of the Internet had made it more difficult to combat hate propaganda. It noted that the Simon Wiesenthal Centre estimates that 300 racist groups are operating Internet sites in North America and Europe.

The commission, meanwhile, reported that the white supremacist Heritage Front closed its Toronto-based telephone hotline after the group was brought before a human rights tribunal by the commission.

Holy Blossom receives $1 million gift

TORONTO — A gift of $1 million to the Holy Blossom Temple Foundation from Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman will enhance adult educational programming at Holy Blossom Temple.

The gift will be used to set up the Gerald Schwartz-Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning.

"Our commitment to establishing a centre for adult Jewish study is a natural outgrowth of the Schwartz-Reisman lecture series," said Holy Blossom Temple president Morris Cooper.

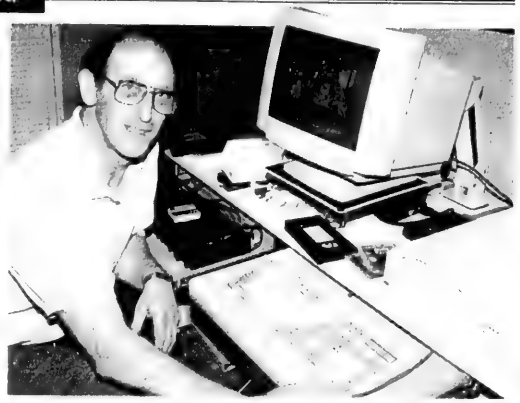
In recent years the series has brought leading world figures such as Sir Martin Gilbert, Natan Sharansky, Elie Wiesel, Abba Eban, Rabbi David Hartman and Amos Oz to the temple.

The creation of the centre will enable Holy Blossom Temple to expand its adult educational initiatives, said Cooper.

Schwartz and Reisman have involved themselves in many philanthropic endeavors that, among others, have benefitted Mount Sinai Hospital, the University of Toronto and Harvard University.

Heather Reisman and Gerald Schwartz

"This magnificent gift is the first one of its kind for the recently established Holy Blossom Temple Foundation," said Wendy Eisen, foundation chair. "It has set an important example that will encourage other members to ensure the future of our cherished, 140-year-old institution."



Michael Noar uses high-tech gadgetry to preserve the past.

Past, present connect with high-tech videos

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Michael Noar uses the latest in highest-tech gadgetry to connect to the past.

Employing a battery of computers, videotape editors and complex programs, Noar splices together old family photographs, transfers them to video, and adds some effects and music. The end result is worth millions of words.

A 61-year-old professional videographer and self-taught computer whiz, Noar has produced 20 or so customized videos to date, mainly for Jewish families, including children and grandchildren of Holocaust survivors eager to create a lasting family chronicle that can span four or five generations.

Noar believes it's important for the second and third generations after the Holocaust to appreciate their heritage. Thus, he's dubbed his product the Heritage Collection. "It's a living memory," he says. "A visual record."

It's a surprisingly simple concept, although technically, it's very complex, Noar says. Clients go through their family photo albums and usually bring him dozens of faded and frail snapshots of relatives, both living and long-lost, often taken back in the old country.

Noar then scans the images into his computer, transferring them to videotape, adds fades and other digital effects, and for the final touch, lays in a musical soundtrack that tugs at the heart even more. The final products are powerful and poignant family sketches.

The average video lasts 20 minutes but they can go up to an hour. Videos, Noar points out, can last for decades and can be easily dubbed, while photographs crumble.

Noar was inspired while watching Stephen Spielberg's Holocaust epic Schindler's List.

"There was one scene that showed massive piles of eyeglasses, shoes and luggage," he says. "People were told to bring their belongings with them [to the camps], and many brought their most precious possession – the family photo album.

"All that was lost, all that history. I wondered how many families have photographs forgotten in boxes or attics. I decided to try to recreate as much of that history as possible."

And people's eyes tend to be drawn toward videos. "These almost force you to look," Noar says.

One client, he says, wept upon viewing the finished product.

Reconstructionist guidelines seen having little impact in Canada

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bold new guidelines issued by North America's Reconstructionist Movement on the role of non-Jews in synagogue life should have little impact on Canada.

According to this country's two Reconstructionist rabbis, most of the recommendations issued by the movement's headquarters in Pennsylvania are already in place in Canada.

The groundbreaking 66-page report, entitled Boundaries and Opportunities, is a response to soaring rates of intermarriage and is an attempt by Reconstructionists to deal with more and more non-Jewish partners of synagogue members.

It suggests limited involvement by non-Jews' in major rituals, prayer, and synagogue leadership roles.

Those limits have long been in place at Toronto's Congregation Darchei Noam and Congregation Dorshei Emet in Montreal.

But the guidelines are significant, because they once again highlight the differences between non-Orthodox streams of Judaism in the United States and Canada.

Those differences have, in the past, led to sometimes irreparable rifts between Reform and Conservative Jews on either side of the border.

In 1994, the Reform Movement in North America issued a call for greater outreach to non-Jews, going so far as to allow gentiles a role in rituals, including handling Torah scrolls, taking part in life-cycle events and being allowed to assume positions of leadership in the synagogue. Those calls met with a less than enthusiastic response in Canada, and they effectively went nowhere.

Now, the Reconstructionist Movement seems to be going through the same phase, except that unlike the other streams, it is catching up to Canada's conservatism.

Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker of Congregation Darchei Noam calls the report "extremely traditional" in its outlook.

Twelve major recommendations in the document place stringent limits on non-Jewish participation in major rituals, synagogue membership and leadership; voting and burial rights; prayer; and partaking in aliyot.

High offices in synagogues, including chairing committees, leading prayer services, getting aliyot and reciting certain blessings – all must be reserved solely for Jews, the guidelines say.

Non-Jewish participation should be limited to "affirmations of respect" at life-cycle events, personal prayers, addressing personal remarks to the congregation and working on social action or study projects.

Rabbi Pinsker told The CJN that almost all the report's suggestions "are pretty much in place" at his 300-family member synagogue, where between 10 and 15 percent of regular attendees are not Jewish. "We're not breaking new ground here."

Rabbi Ron Aigen of Dorshei Emet in Montreal said his synagogue issued guidelines on the role of non-Jews in 1985.

Rabbi Pinsker said the report is an attempt to nudge Reconstructionists back toward a more traditionalist view and "to remove 'hobbyist' Judaism, where anything goes."

Community Matters

WOMEN WELCOME NEW LEADERSHIP

A group of the community's best and brightest leaders stepped forward recently to assume top positions in UJA Federation's Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation (JWF).

Judy Engel succeeded Agi Mandel as the new Chair of Women's Campaign, which raises close to $4 million each year from more than 7000 donors.

Carole Sterling, who previously served as a Women's Campaign portfolio coordinator and Chair of the Walk for Israel, has been named Women's Campaign Vice-Chair. Veteran UJA Federation volunteer Janice Langer succeeds JWF President Jill Reitman, following her two-year term.

"It's been an exhilarating and stirring year for me," said Mandel, who intends to remain active in UJA Federation. Mandel is particularly proud of close to 350 women who were encouraged to join the UJA Federation family for the first time last year. "Your efforts are living testimony to the tradition of Jews helping other Jews when and wherever it is needed," she told campaign workers.

Engel explained how her strong sense of Jewish pride evolved from the values of dignity and respect that her parents brought to Canada. "Together we are participating in the ongoing story of Jewish survival."

Outgoing JWF President Jill Reitman commended the JWF executive and volunteers for working to alleviate poverty and woman abuse in the Jewish community, and initiatives to provide furniture, food and clothing to the needy through the Community Response Project.

"Our strength as a Jewish women's organization lies in our ability to set aside religious and political convictions to work together for the common good," said incoming JWF president Janice Langer. "It is only through dialogue and cooperation that we can remain strong as a Jewish community and a people."

Capitol Conference for Young leaders

Thirty-five young Jewish leaders from across Canada recently made their mark in Washington, D.C. at the UJA National Young Leadership Conference.

The delegation, which included one participant from Vancouver, six from Montreal and the rest from Toronto, joined 3000 Jewish leaders, ages 25-45, who attended the three day program. The conference, which takes place every two years, is the largest gathering of its kind in North America.

"Our presence was definitely felt," reports Wendy Fish, who chaired the Canadian contingent. "People seemed very interested in our community and commented on our genuine and friendly manner."

Speaker highlights included U.S. Vice-President Al Gore, writer and lecturer Dennis Prager, Avrum Burg, Chairman of the UJA Federation supported Jewish Agency, New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, Canadian Judaic consultant Arna Poupko and actress/comedienne Rita Rudner.

The Canadian delegates also hosted 200 of their fellow conference participants at a special reception and visited the showcase Canadian Embassy, where they were briefed by Middle Eastern affairs expert Stuart Hughes.

For the first time in the conference's history, Israeli delegates representing various geographic regions in partnership with UJA Federation were matched with different North American communities.

"It was very educational hosting our four Israeli friends from the Gallilee," notes Fish. "All of us walked away with a better understanding of each other's Jewish world and the challenges we face."

"It was absolutely phenomenal," says Elyza Litwin, active in UJA Federation's Hands On Toronto young leadership volunteer program. "The quality of the speakers far exceeded my expectations and the sense of belonging was overwhelming," she adds. "I would definitely go back."

Raptors Delight

It was just the right dose of fun and fantasy when 85 children, under the care of Jewish Family and Child Service, were recently treated to a Toronto Raptors basketball game at the Skydome. The kids, many of whom had never been to the landmark stadium, and their 15 volunteer chaperones from UJA Federation's ATID program were also treated to a pre-game lunch, Raptors souvenirs and hugs from the team's mascot. ATID offers community involvement opportunities to the adult children of UJA Federation's most active campaign supporters.The outing, chaired by John Rose and Liann Granovsky, was sponsored by The Raptor's Foundation and the TD Bank through UJA Federation's Corporate Partners Program.

Night Of A Lifetime Ticket Sales Soar

Tickets to Canada's biggest birthday party marking Israel's 50th anniversary are going fast.

With just two weeks left before the historic Night Of A Lifetime celebration, April 30, 7:30 pm at the National Trade Centre, Exhibition Place, Coliseum Arena, more than half of the tickets to the 7000 seat venue have been sold.

"The whole community is buzzing about his event," explains Julia Koschitzky, Chair of Israel at 50 community celebrations, sponsored by a consortium of 170 organizations under the auspices of the Consulate General of Israel and UJA Federation.

The evening, hosted by Al Waxman, which will begin with greetins from Prime Minister Jean Chretien, will feature performances by Israeli singer Yoel Sharabi, Toronto's leading cantors Yaacov Motzen, Benjamin Maissner and Paul Kowarsky, cellist Ofra Harnoy, as well as a fifty piece orchestra conducted by Boris Brott. A live satellite link will connect the Toronto gathering with festivities taking place in Israel and the voice of Academy Award winning actor Gregory Peck will narrate a special video presentation.

Tickets ranging from $18 - $150 can be ordered by calling (416) 872-1212. Prices for children 12 and under are $5 when accompanied by adults with $18-$36 tickets and $18 accompanied by adults holding tickets from $50 an up, with a maximum of 4 kids per adult ticket. Seats cannot be purchased at the door.

Koschitzky urges community members not to be disappointed by waiting until the last minute to purchase tickets. "Nobody should miss this once in a lifetime event."

Award-Winning Artists Salute Israel

The stars will be shining brighter than ever on The Night of Lifetime as some of the biggest names in the Jewish entertainment world focus their talent on saluting the State of Israel, as she turns 50.

The fast-paced, two-hour, show hosted by Al Waxman from the CNE's Coliseum Arena includes performances by Isreal's Me'irim Dance Company, an adult choir, a children's choir and a live satellite feed from Israel.

The program's producer Robert Benia has employed the artistic talent of composer Stephen Glass to weave together several themes reflecting Israel's historic development, dividing the show into six segments culminating in a finale incorporating the entire cast of 500.

World-renowned cellist Ofra Harnoy, who has been captivating international audiences with her interpretations of the works of Tchaikovsky, Bloch and Chopin, among others, will perform an original piece composed by Glass.

Israeli pop star Yoel Sharabi, who has recorded eight albums and now resides in New York, will appear throughout the program, dazzling the audience with his unique synthesis of modern lyrics combined with traditional Israeli and Yemenite melodies.

Boris Brott, who received the Order of Canada for his excellence in conducting and who served as Assistant Conductor to the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Leonard Bernstein, will lead a 50 piece orchestra through both contemporary and original works composed and arranged by Stephen Glass.

"The idea is to bring Israel back to our central consciousness by using familiar images, orchestrations and passages that allow each and every one of us to identify with some aspect of Israel's existence."

Exhibit brings Israel to Toronto

The sights, sounds and tastes of Israel will be brought to life before The Night Of A Lifetime performance on April 30, as thousands gather to mark the country's 50th anniversary.

All things Israeli, including a genuine indoor Jaffa orange grove and authentic Jerusalem stone walls will transform Heritage Court, at the CNE's National Trade Centre, into an Israeli Streetscape.

"We want people to feel like they are walking through a crowded marketplace in Jerusalem or Tel-Aviv," explains Renee Rubinstein, who is chairing the exhibit.

"What better way to bring people closer to Israel than to re-create the magic that makes the Jewish homeland so dear to their hearts?" says Rubinstein.

Night Of A Lifetime ticket holders can visit the Heritage Court when the doors open at 5:30 pm and can continue wandering in and out of the exhibit throughout the evening as the main festivities take place.

Flower displays, a wide variety of kosher Israeli cuisine and visual presentations depicting the country's triumphant 50 year history will add to the atmosphere. Guests will also be able to purchase many Israeli products from dozens of vendors. All of this will unfold under a ceiling covered with stars to reflect the mood of the evening.

Mediacom is the major sponsor of Heritage Court. For tickets to The Night of a Lifetime call TicketKing at (416) 872-1212. For special group rates call (416) 593-4142.

Hashomer Hatzair reunion

By YONI GUTMANOVITCZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On July 18, members of Hashomer Hatzair will meet in Perth, Ont., to reminisce and celebrate the movement's 75th anniversary of service to the Jewish community.

When Hashomer Hatzair came to North America in 1923, it already had a reputation as a strong Jewish youth movement. With members in virtually every major Jewish community in Europe, Hashomer was welcomed with open arms by North American Jews.

In North America, Hashomer Hatzair quickly established "training communes" to teach urban youths the skills they would need in order to move to Palestine and establish kibbutzim. Over time, these "training communes" evolved into summer camps.

Perth, the site of this year's reunion, has been home to the lone Canadian Hashomer Hatzair summer camp since 1957, one of the two remaining North American locations of Camp Shomria.

As part of the two-day celebration, Hashomer alumni will have the opportunity to share their memories and experiences with the current generation of campers. As well, participants will be invited to take part in a variety of multi-generational activities and view the traditional closing ceremonies.

Reunion

"I'm hearing from people from all over the place," said Mintzy Clement, reunion coordinator and an ex-Shomerette herself. "We have somebody who is planning on coming in from Russia for the reunion."

While this is officially a reunion for former Shomrim from the Perth summer camp, Clement said the reunion is open to all ex-Shomrim.

"There are people coming who have never been in the movement in North America, people from Finland, Poland and Israel who are coming because they live here now, and they want to celebrate Hashomer."

More than a chance for the older generations to relive their youth, this reunion offers a chance for current Shomrim to find out what the movement was like in the past.

"I wonder what it was like to be at camp 30 or 40 years ago. I wonder what was different. I've always wondered what kind of celebration the movement had in 1948 when Israel was declared a state. I hope that this summer I'll be able to find out," said Alon Klekner, a current counsellor in the movement.

Students honored by JCS

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over a dozen Toronto students were honored at Jewish Campus Services' (JCS) recent Volunteer Recognition Evening, held at Ryerson Polytechnic University's Oakham House.

• Barry Pakes, a University of Toronto medical student and key organizer for the Toronto leg of the recent Wake-Up Tour, received the Schwartz Levitsky Feldman Chai award for special involvement in Jewish campus life.

• York University students Daniel Nurgitz and Sam Stone, who were involved in promoting the first annual Jewish student Arts Festival held last month, received the Jacobovici Family award for arts and culture.

• York student David Gordon, editor of the student publication Images, received The Canadian Jewish News award for Jewish campus communications.

• Yoni Stanleigh, religious affairs co-chair at U of T's Jewish Students' Union (JSU), received the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto Action Committee for Jewish Continuity award for enhancing Jewish identity and continuity.

• Alana Balaban, co-chair of UJA on Campus at U of T, received the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto award for chesed and social justice.

• York student Sidura Ludwig, who coordinated the first annual Jewish student Arts Festival, held last month, received the Gropper Family award for outstanding leadership.

Award winner Pakes acknowledged how important the support of JCS and the Jewish community has been. "Students are powerful, but there's only so much we can do [alone]," he said.

"All of you are our future," said Morris Zbar, UJA Federation vice-president, community planning and development.

"We provide significant funding [to JCS]," he added, "but significant isn't enough. We understand that and do what we can to help you find additional partners."

"It is through our partnerships with...the Conservative movement, Reform on campus, the various Orthodox groups in the city and many other organizations, that we have been able to present [a] special smorgasbord of opportunities for our students to dip into, said Zac Kaye, JCS director. "I see our agency as a three-legged tripod – students, staff and lay people. Take away one of the legs [and] the whole thing collapses."

One of JCS' biggest goals, said its acting president, Jack Zarek, is to raise funds to hire more staff and reach more of the 15,000 Jewish students on Toronto campuses.

Kaye and Lance Davis, director of the JSU at U of T, paid tribute to Rabbi Michael Skobac, who is leaving JCS to take on a new position at Jews for Judaism.

Peer awards went to Tammy Weisz of Ryerson; Sharon Aba, Michael Weinberger and Tally Wolf of York; and Sandy Benayon, Elli Mandel and Sharoni Sabony of U of T. JCS also honored presidents Eyal Lewin of Ryerson Hillel, Terri Rothenberg of York's Jewish Student Federation, and Eliana Schonberg of U of T's JSU.

Kaye presented certificates to "founding friends of the campus" including Zbar and Helen Zukerman, who recently provided a substantial arts grant to JCS.

Yoni Stanleigh, left, religious affairs co-chair at U of T's Jewish Students' Union, receives the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto Action Committee for Jewish Continuity award for enhancing Jewish identity and continuity from Morris Zbar. [Frances Kraft photo]

We must not forget Jewish brothers in FSU

By JAMES NAHON
Special to The CJN

Last year at Passover, I was part of a group of 26 North American Jewish students from the one-year program at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and 26 Ukrainian Jewish students participating in The Pesach Project.

Opinion

The purpose of the project is to help bring a feeling of Passover to as many Jews as possible in the former Soviet Union. It is sponsored and organized by Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life and the United Jewish Appeal.

We spent three days in Kiev with our Ukrainian partners preparing for our responsibilities. Then we were divided into groups of six, each group having three North Americans and three Ukrainians.

Shoved into tiny vans with nothing more than haggadot, kosher wine, matzot, and a great deal of enthusiasm, we set out on a journey that would change our lives.

Over the next four days, each group visited three or four shtetlach. At each stop we conducted a seder that included storytelling, singing, dancing, praying, a little haroseth, and many tears of joy.

My group drove 11 hours across Western Ukraine to a region that borders Poland, Hungary, and Slovakia in and around the Carpathian Mountains. We conducted five seders.

During our seder travels I met at least 350 Jews. For most, this was their first Jewish experience since the Holocaust. For the children, it was their very first Jewish experience.

The vast majority of the Jews I met live in a state of poverty we can not even imagine. Moreover, they live without any knowledge or feeling for Jewish tradition.

These poor communities lack even the most basic Jewish facilities: synagogue, Jewish cemetery, kosher food, and hardly any opportunity for Jewish education, observance, and the like.

During our first seder in Truskavec, I met Sasha and his family. Sasha is an English teacher but this was his first opportunity to actually speak English. He was humble and warm. He said to me "Jamie, I am poor man." He paused for a moment and then continued, "I have poor family, everyone you see in seder is very poor", pointing to the 50 or so other seder participants.

I thought for a while and replied "But Sasha, you are happy man?" He threw his arm around his wife and two sons and with a great smile said "I am happiest man in world, with beautiful wife and beautiful boys!"

At that same seder, I met an old woman who told me she was in Auschwitz. I watched her cry throughout the seder. She showed me the numbers on her arm, explaining that medical experiments had been done on her, and as a result she was never able to have children. Her husband had died and she had no family left. But she said that she was still very happy, and with tears in her eyes she showed us Ukrainian folk dancing.

I felt Hatikvah was written for them

During our second seder, in Dragobych, I was introduced to an old man who had been in the Plaszow camp where he met Oskar Schindler. He pulled a violin from out of nowhere and started to play Hatikvah.

We managed to get everyone to stand, and we pulled the old violin-playing Holocaust survivor to the stage. Then, my two Hebrew University peers and I sang the Israeli national anthem.

The Jews of Dragobych who were with us had never heard Hatikvah before. As we sang, I stared into the eyes of our silent audience. I felt at that moment that Hatikvah was written for them, for Jews who have lived their entire lives under oppression and circumstances that we from the west can hardly fathom.

To me, the Jews of the former Soviet Union are Hatikvah.

They are middle-aged or old people with virtually no Jewish feeling, education, or experience. Yet they each have a Jewish soul.

One of our seders was in the town of Borislav where roughly 60 Jews remain. Before the seder began we were given a tour of the old Jewish sights. We saw the place of the former Jewish cemetery where a gas station now stands. A plaque there reads: "This is the place where the Jewish cemetery once stood, may G-d bless their souls." We walked through the old Jewish synagogue which is now a Russian Orthodox Christian school. Where a Torah once rested there is now a cross.

As we drove on the main street of the village, we were told that the 3000 Jews of Borislav were killed here. There is no memorial to mark the fact. Aside from the handful of remaining Jews, the people who live in Borislav neither know nor care about their fate.

The majority of the Jews in the FSU have been forgotten by their western brothers and sisters. They are so isolated and lost that the very sight of young Jews from the outside world made them tremble with emotion and cry. It is time that we in the west put more effort toward them.

They need help if they are to have a fair shot, not only at a Jewish future but at a decent standard of living. These communities need consistent help and resources simply to exist. Who will help them if not for us?

This reminiscence is a plea to the Canadian Jewish community, not to be silent as we often have been in the past, but to take a stand in helping the Jews of the former Soviet Union. And to always keep in mind the age-old idea that has kept Judaism alive and strong for more than 3000 years – that Jews are responsible for the well-being of other Jews.

James Nahon is completing his fourth year at McGill University.

Mitzvah Day held in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Social Action committee of Agudath Israel Congregation organized the community's first Tikun Olam Mitzvah Sunday on March 29.

Marion Mayman, who co-chaired the event with Yaffa Greenbaum, says its aim was to educate people so that they would know that writing a cheque is not the only way to get involved [in the community]."

The full day of activities began with Shacharit services. A breakfast and panel discussion followed, featuring panelists from various community institutions: Lisa Melamed and Lauren Shaps of Jewish Family Services; Helen Alvo, social services worker with a geriatric support team; Chuck Rotenberg, a lawyer and a representative of Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others (JACS); and Annette Albert, who spoke about disabilities and barriers.

Melamed said that over 15 percent of Ottawa's Jews live in intermarried families, "which means that Jewish continuity in this area is in danger."

She told the audience that "our elderly, our poor and our immigrants feel alienated. These people are a minority among Jews because they are poor, and a minority among the poor because they are Jews."

Shaps said that "research has clearly linked Jewish education to Jewish continuity. Our schools, synagogues, Jewish Community Centre and camps must be warm, welcoming and affordable to all members of the Jewish community, " she said.

Rotenberg told the group "I am here to tell you that addiction is a Jewish problem."

People who attend the semi-annual JACS retreats, he said, are from all ends of the Jewish spectrum, including Chassidim.

The encouraging news, Rotenberg added, is that Ottawa's Jewish community has recognized the problem and has gone to great lengths to provide resources and support for those with addictions. "This is a Jewish problem and there are Jewish solutions to it."

Alvo and Albert outlined services for geriatric and disabled members of the community.

Following the panel discussion, a Mitzvah Day Market Place featured 25 community organizations which set up booths to dispense information, answer questions and recruit volunteers.

Volunteer activities at the event included polishing the synagogue silver, embroidering new tallitot, and filling gift bags for the residents of nursing homes, Tamir House and local women's shelters with items donated by local businesses. Members of the synagogue choir went to Tamir House to entertain residents, and some volunteers visited local nursing homes.

Hadassah honors fighters of Machal

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Vancouver Hadassah-WIZO recently held a reception to honor the fighters of Machal, the veterans of Israel's 1948 War of Independence.

The honorees were part of a Canadian contingent who, in their youth, volunteered in the Israel Defence Forces.

The volunteers honored included Andre Blum, Sam Camerman, Miriam Davidowicz, Max Freedman, Al Gelmon, Arthur Goldberg, Henry Goodman, Leonard Hyman, Yale Joffe, Harold Lenett, Manny Maltin, William Mendelson, Jeffrey Milton, Sam Morris, Frank Orban, Dave Panar, Al Rosenhek, Joe Tunis, Benjamin Ungar and Sonny Wosk. Also honored were the late Myer Goldstep, Ralph Moster, Harold Orloff and Frank Sitz.

Sylvia Cristall, president of Vancouver-WIZO council, said the gala, which attracted some 180 people, completed the organization's annual Youth Services/Youth Aliyah campaign.

Hadassah-WIZO national executive vice-president Lily Frank travelled from Montreal to pay tribute to the honorees. After they received plaques, Harold Lenett said, "The Jews' secret weapon in the war was their unity. The Arabs were unable to cooperate, but Israel had the support of every Jew, including those in the Diaspora.

"May the commitment to Israel of the volunteers of my generation continue l'dor v'dor," he said.

Keynote speaker was Christoph Meili, who, as a security guard at the UBS Bank in Zurich in 1997, came upon documents from the 1930s and '40s marked for shredding. Guessing they were related to the Holocaust, Meili turned the documents over to a Jewish group in Zurich. The group then turned the records over to Swiss prosecutors.

Meili was fired from his job and began to receive anonymous threats.

UBS later described its order to shred the documents as a "regrettable accident."

In April 1997, fearing for their safety, Meili, his wife and two children, left Switzerland for the United States. His request for permanent residency in the United States received congressional support and was signed into law in August 1997. "I'm the first Swiss to receive political asylum in the United States," Meili said.

Today Meili works as a security guard in New York.

Wise deals with life after the bombing

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sherri Wise

VANCOUVER — A recent picture of Sherri Wise – the one she chose to accompany this article – shows a young woman with a broad smile, but the 28-year-old Canadian dentist injured in last September's triple suicide bombing on Ben Yehuda Street says she'll never again be the same happy, carefree person she once was.

Wise, a first-time visitor to Israel who was volunteering there at a dental clinic for underprivileged children, was having lunch with two friends at the Village Green restaurant when the bombs went off. She sustained first, second and some third-degree burns to her arms, legs and face, and spent 11 days in Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital before returning to Canada.

It took four months before she was able to return to work part-time, Wise told The CJN by phone from Vancouver.

She puts in about three days a week at the office; much of the rest of her time is still devoted to medical appointments, including laser therapy, massage therapy, her dermatologist and a burn clinic.

She is awaiting word from the B.C. government about extended benefits, because her medical insurance only covers a fixed number of therapy appointments.

Wise received partial compensation for lost wages from the Israeli government, she said, and credits Hadassah Hospital for "great" care.

The top half of her right arm, where she received severe burns, is still painful, however, and she wears a pressure bandage to help it heal.

Emotionally, some days are better than others. "I don't react well to loud noises or anything that goes on behind my back. I don't like to do anything with big crowds. I'm still sad. I used to be the happiest person you've ever seen. My friends would ask me, 'Don't you get upset?' and I never did."

Wise is seeing a therapist to help her deal with the emotional aftermath.

Her friends have been very supportive, she said. "They've all been great. They've done little things to make me smile."

She is still in touch with her lunchtime companions from the day of the bombing, as well as her Israeli hospital roommate, whose progress, emotionally and physically, has paralleled Wise's closely.

Friends of hers left recently to visit Israel: "Are you scared?" she asked them. They told her they weren't.

"That was my response [before I went]. I guess I'm jealous that people can go with no fear. I don't know when – mentally – I'll be able to go."

Wise follows Israeli news more closely than she used to. "It means a lot more to me, because I've been there." She said she no longer takes her Judaism for granted.

Every so often she looks through the scrapbook she began keeping after the incident. Perusing her newspaper clippings, the many cards she received and the photos charting the progress of her burns reminds her how far she's come.

Students speak out at Jewish public speaking contest

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — "Should Israel trade land for peace?" Adam Shapiro asked his audience.

Looking squarely at the adults and children who recently crowded into the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver library, the Grade 6 student at Richmond Jewish Day School answered his rhetorical question forcefully and confidently. "No," he thundered. "HaShem told Abraham he was giving us the land, and it's ours. Case closed!"

Adam, one of 130 participants in the recent Greater Vancouver public speaking contest for Jewish students, was followed immediately by Lauren Schachter, of Vancouver Talmud Torah.

Lauren addressed the same question as Adam, but answered it in the positive. "The Jewish settlers need to be protected, but Israel should give some land to the Arabs," Lauren said. "Let's risk peace."

The annual contest, which attracted about 400 people, was co-sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation and the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver and was supported by Hadassah-WIZO, the Isaac Waldman Jewish Public Library and the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

Schools taking part included Vancouver Talmud Torah, Temple Sholom School, Richmond Jewish Day School, Vancouver Hebrew Academy, Chabad Lubavitch School and Or Shalom School.

Because 1998 is the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel, all speeches had an Israeli theme. For the first time in the contest's history, 12 students delivered their speeches in Hebrew.

Winners included: In the Grade 4 (A) competition, Elana Wenner and Alexis Hershfield; Grade 4 (B), Claire Schachter and Sasha Semach; Grade 5, Mira Barnett, Emil Cohen and Michelle Cutler; Grade 6 (A), Shifra Freeman and Shauna Nep; Grade 6 (B), Alexandra Perel-Winkler, Pascal Zeidel and Zohar Barzilai. Hebrew section winners were Ira Barzelai, Brooke Babins and Jonathan Davis.

Richmond Jewish Day School won the "Best School" award, for having the most students per capita taking part in the event. All participants received a $50 scholarship from Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver toward the cost of a trip to Israel.

Daniella Goodman, of Vancouver Talmud Torah, described a family trip to Israel that almost ended in tragedy. "We had planned to meet friends at the Dizengoff Centre in Tel Aviv at 7 o'clock in the morning, but we were late leaving our hotel," she related. At 7:25, "the phone rang. It was our friends, calling to say that a bomb had just exploded at the centre. We were really lucky."

Richmond Jewish Day School Grade 7 student Jessica Lithwick spoke about her recent bat mitzvah. "It brought me closer to Judaism and to my Jewish ancestors," she said. "It was the time I've felt closest to klal Yisrael."

Zohar Barzilai, a Grade 7 student at Vancouver Talmud Torah, discussed the importance of the establishment of the State of Israel to world Jewry.

In an enthusiastic and charmingly off-beat speech, Megan Kornfeld, of Vancouver Talmud Torah, talked about her wish to celebrate Purim in Israel. In a similarly imaginative vein, Andrea Nitikman, of Richmond Jewish Day School, compared and contrasted vacations in California and Israel.

Mitch Gilbert, director of Planning and Community Services of Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, was one of the judges of the Grade 4 speeches.

"I thought it was going to be an easy job," said Gilbert. "But all the speeches I heard were not just good, they were terrific. It was hard to make a choice."

The public speaking contest was started by Vancouver physician Dr. Larry Barzelai, in memory of his father, Morris Black.

"The purpose of the contest is to encourage Jewish children to research various topics and present them in public," Barzelai said.

Kosher poultry processor reconsiders decision to close

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Acme Produce Co. (1969) Ltd., Winnipeg's last kosher poultry killing plant, is back in business, less than three months after being closed by owners Morris and Harvey Brown.

"While we were closed, we were inundated with phone calls from members of the community expressing their deep concern, regret and disappointment," they said.

"People were telling us how much they missed the fresh shchitah and competitive prices. That led us to reconsider our decision. We feel an obligation to the community to try again."

The Brown Family has owned the business since 1969 and had been in the chicken business for many years before.

"It is a real credit to Winnipeg to have the only kosher chicken and turkey killing plant west of Toronto We stand behind the freshness and quality of our product," Harvey said.

"To bring in fresh product from Toronto or Montreal would take at least four or five days. We kill our poultry in the morning and you have it in the afternoon. There is nothing like freshly killed chicken for flavor, whether it is barbecued, roasted or used for chicken soup," he said.

Reuben Abecassis, executive director of Winnipeg's Vaad Ha'ir said, "Winnipeg is the only city in North America with a Jewish population of our size that still has beef and poultry shchitah," he says.

"We are unique. It is important to maintain traditional Jewish values. We hope that the public responds favourably to the continuation of poultry schchitah in Winnipeg."

Survivors to be honored at JNF Negev Dinner

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A group of local Holocaust survivors is being honored at this year's Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner, April 26 at the Hyatt Regency Hotel.

The theme of the evening, which also commemorates Israel's 50th anniversary, is From Ashes to Rebirth.

"We are acknowledging British Columbia's Holocaust survivors' half-century contribution to Jewish life, both locally and in Israel," said Barbara Silber, who is co-chairing the event with child survivor Marie Doduck.

A reservoir at Nyot Semadar in Israel will be dedicated in honor of the survivors.

The dinner will be chaired by Dr. Robert Krell, a child survivor, and will feature Joe Schlessinger, senior foreign news correspondent for the CBC and also a child survivor.

Jody Dales, a granddaughter of Holocaust survivors, will pay tribute to the honorees.

Local artist Linda Dayan Frumer created a painting for the cover of the invitations and for the commemorative booklet.

Honorary dinner chair is Dave Shafran.

Valinskys to be honored at London Negev Dinner

By SUSAN MERSKEY
Special to The CJN

LONDON — The 1998 Negev Dinner will take place here May 24 in the auditorium at Or Shalom Synagogue.

This year's honorees, Max and Betty Valinsky, are well known and respected members of the community. Since coming to London more than 30 years ago, they have been active in numerous volunteer organizations and have earned the friendship and admiration of all who have worked with them.

Max was born and raised in Toronto. A talented trumpet player, he worked as a salesman during the day, while playing in bands at night.

Betty was born in Belgium and lived there until she was six. During World War II, she was separated from her family. She was first sent to a camp in France, and then, along with others, was moved to various children's institutions, in order to escape discovery by the Nazis.

At the end of the war, Betty, then 11, was reunited with her parents. After a short time in France, the family returned to Belgium and lived there until they immigrated to Canada when Betty was 17.

Their mutual love of dancing brought Max and Betty together at a YMHA dance in Toronto. Following a whirlwind courtship, they were married three months after their initial meeting.

In 1967, Max purchased a clothing store in Tillsonburg and he and Betty, with their three daughters, Sarah, Ruth and Michelle, moved to London.

Max was active in the Dr. Isadore Goldstick Lodge of B'nai Brith for 30 years. As chair of B'nai Brith's Soviet Jewry committee here (to all intents and purposes, he was the committee), he organized many letter writing campaigns and petitions on behalf of Refuseniks.

As Russian families started arriving in London, Max was instrumental in organizing the collection, distribution and storage of furniture and household necessities. He also helped establish B'nai Brith's funding of phone calls that enabled members of London's Russian community to speak to their relatives who remained in Russia.

Max has also been an active member of London Jewish Federation, where he was a vice-president in 1996/97. He has participated in many UJA campaigns and is currently chair of Campaign '98.

Max's volunteer commitment has extended beyond the Jewish community. As a member of the Mayor's Anti-Poverty Task Force, his leadership in providing furniture for some of the city's less fortunate residents is well known.

In 1989 he received a 15-year Volunteer Award from the Ontario Ministry of Culture and was also named B'nai Brith Man of the Year. In 1992, he was the honoree at the State Of Israel Bonds brunch.

While caring for her growing family, Betty became actively involved with Hadassah-WIZO. A life member of the organization and member of the Bertha Weinstein chapter, she was a bazaar convener for three years and has chaired the medical services campaign.

Betty's interest in food gave her the inspiration for her store, From Soup to Nuts, which she ran for 15 years, building up a loyal following of customers. She was also a member of the London East End Business Association.

Betty has helped many London elementary school students to better understand the events of the Holocaust by sharing her own experiences with them.

The couple have both remained active since their retirement. Max is on the board of the London Squash and Racquet Club and plays every day. Betty is a passionate bridge player, who likes to teach new players. Both enjoy reading, walking and dancing.

Double anniversary celebrated in Hebron

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

HEBRON — Celebrating the nation's 50th anniversary and the 30th anniversary of the renewal of the Hebron Jewish community, tens of thousands flocked to Hebron last week to join in the first state-sponsored event of the jubilee celebrations.

Despite protests that the jubilee committee had transferred NIS 300,000 to the Hebron community to assist in the celebrations, committee head Doron Shmueli told reporters that the event cost far more and the Hebron community would foot the bill.

Visitors, wearing hats and carrying bottles of water because of the heat, were welcomed by the community and given explanations about the city's different quarters.

"Hebron needs to be in our hands," said Abraham Sharavani, who was born there 65 years ago. "Our forefathers are buried here. How could we ever leave such a holy place?"

One person was lightly injured by a thrown stone outside the Machpelah Cave in the afternoon, otherwise the celebrations went smoothly.

Hebron Jewish community spokesperson Noam Arnon said some 80,000 visitors took part in the celebration, arriving in 750 buses organized by the community, a few hundred private buses, and thousands of private vehicles.

The main celebration was held at a stage erected outside the Machpelah Cave. Dignitaries attending the event included Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau, Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi, Education Minister Yitzhak Levy, Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom, MKs Michael Eitan (Likud) and Meir Porush (United Torah Judaism).

"The government is interested in maintaining and strengthening the Jewish presence in Hebron, and at the same time protecting the rights of the Palestinians and honoring the signed agreements," Eitan told reporters

As the day drew to an end, Hebron settlers recalled a day 30 years ago when a small group of people headed by Rabbi Moshe Levinger decided to renew the Jewish presence in Hebron. Levinger's wife Miriam recalled that "we sensed that we had made an historic breakthrough, and we all felt deeply moved and excited."

Peace Now protesters denied access to Hebron

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

GUSH ETZION — Hundreds of Peace Now activists clashed with security forces at the Gush Etzion junction last week, blocking traffic for several hours on the main road linking Jerusalem to Hebron.

The activists were protesting because the jubilee committee had transferred NIS 300,000 for celebrations in Hebron. This was the first state-sponsored event of the jubilee celebrations.

Police were forced to remove protesters lying in the road and, during the clashes that ensued, some 32 people were detained for questioning and five police officers and two demonstrators were injured.

Police spokesperson Opher Sivan said that 19 activists had been released after questioning and that 10 were still detained and criminal charges would be brought against them for attacking police.

The demonstrators, who intended to continue on to Hebron to protest the celebrations there, were prevented by police from doing so.

Police officers at the site informed the activists that they feared violence would break out if they were allowed to continue to Hebron. As soon as they heard they were being prevented from going there, the activists split up into small groups and lay in the middle of the road, creating long traffic jams as cars and buses taking visitors to Hebron to attend the celebrations were forced to wait for up to two hours.

The IDF declared the junction a closed military zone and police called on the public to use alternative routes.

As police attempted to maintain order, demonstrators spilled out of the buses and into the road, chanting: "Peace yes, occupation no," and holding up signs reading: "Settlements in Hebron – a stain on Zionism" and "Jubilee celebrations in Hebron – a disgrace for Israel."

As tempers flared, Peace Now secretary-general Mossy Raz refused an offer by Judea and Samaria police chief Cmdr. Yitzhak Aharonovitch to allow 11 bus loads of activists into Hebron.

"Despite a prior agreement that the group would not be allowed to enter Hebron, they blocked the junction forcing us to remove them. The area is a closed military zone and because of their actions people are forced to travel an alternative route," said Aharonovitch.

Raz said that the activists would remain at the junction until police allowed the entire group to continue on to Hebron. He rejected claims by police that they feared for the safety of the activists and had received warnings that extreme right-wing elements might attempt to cause violence.

Some 2½ hours later an agreement was reached and the Peace Now activists were allowed to travel to Kiryat Arba, where they held a protest rally before dispersing.

Their acts were sharply criticized by members of the Hebron Jewish community, who charged that the police handled the demonstrators with kid gloves.

Commission to help survivors' claims

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — An international commission has been established to expedite the processing of insurance claims by Holocaust survivors and the heirs of victims.

The agreement to set up the commission was signed last week in New York. Signatories include the state insurance commissioners of New York and California, four major European insurance companies and three Jewish organizations.

Participants called the agreement an "historic breakthrough."

The commission, which will be composed of all the signatories, will have investigatory powers and will set up a mechanism to resolve conflicts between claimants and insurers.

The agreement also calls for establishing a fund to underwrite the commission's work and to provide humanitarian relief to families of Holocaust victims.

In a series of hearings by state insurance regulators earlier this year, numerous witnesses charged that European insurance companies have been stalling for 50 years to avoid payment on policies taken out by Jews in the 1930s.

Jewish groups that signed the agreement included the World Jewish Restitution Organization, the World Jewish Congress and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Israel considers foreign currency reforms

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israelis will be allowed to make domestic property purchases in foreign currency if Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Finance Minister Ya'akov Ne'eman approve the Bank of Israel's proposals for the liberalization of foreign exchange controls.

But there has been concern recently within the central bank that Netanyahu might not go ahead with the planned changes, particularly following last week's devaluation of the shekel.

Analysts last week suggested details of the proposals were leaked to calm the markets.

Senior central bank sources confirmed some of the key measures governor Jacob Frenkel submitted to Netanyahu and Ne'eman:

- Citizens will be able to hold foreign currency here, without any restrictions.
- Israelis will be permitted to open accounts abroad and transfer cash overseas in either shekels or foreign currency.
- Individuals will be able to purchase apartments in Israel in dollars.
- Investments in assets abroad will be unlimited.
- There will be no restriction on the use of credit cards abroad.
- In certain emergency cases, the few remaining restrictions will also be lifted.

The increased hype surrounding the final steps in turning the shekel into a fully convertible currency is attributed to the fact that the announcement is scheduled before the 50th Independence Day.

However, Netanyahu, Ne'eman, and Frenkel have all called for public calm in recent days.

This followed a topsy-turvy week in currency trading, with the shekel depreciating as much as 1.82 percent in a single day, as rumors spread about the likely contents of the report. The shekel ended the week at NIS 3.692 against the dollar.

The key restrictions that will remain in place will affect institutional investors.

An official close to the negotiations said there is an ongoing disagreement between the Treasury and the Bank of Israel over this issue.

The central bank is refusing to lift restrictions on the institutions, until the Treasury agrees to implement tax changes that would govern their operations overseas.

Various reports

While there are various reported differences among Netanyahu, Ne'eman and Frenkel over the contents and timing of the announcement, the three are of one mind about the desired results of the changes: that the shekel be fully convertible and that the regime be changed from one where all is forbidden except for that specifically allowed, to one where all is permissible except for the few specific cases where restrictions will remain.

Although the announcement of the reforms is anticipated on or before Independence Day, April 30, the implementation will take longer, according to a senior bank source. The final make-up of the limitations plus the need for individuals and companies to report on activities overseas will need to be enshrined in law. This could take several months to complete.

Pope: The Jews have been 'crucified by us for too long'

By LISA PALMIERI-BILLIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

ROME — During his traditional Good Friday "Via Crucis" procession from the Colosseum to the Roman Forum, Pope John Paul II made the unprecedented statement that the Jewish people "has been crucified by us for too long" and that not the Jews, "not they, but we, each and every one of us" are responsible for Christ's crucifixion, "because we are all murderers of love."

"Contemplating Christ who died on the Cross," continued the Pope, "our thoughts go to the manifold injustice and suffering that prolong his passion in every part of the earth." This theme recurred during the day.

Another priest, Father Cantalamessa, speaking to the Pope and the entire Roman Curia, cited the Church fathers of the second century who "sowed the seeds" of anti-Judaism and "indirectly favored the Shoah."

He said, however, that "anti-Semitism is born not of fidelity to the Scriptures but of infidelity to them." This was the first time such strong statements clearing Jews from "guilt" for Christ's death (an accusation often taught in pre-Vatican II Catholic theology) were made on Good Friday, and moreover by the highest authority of the Catholic Church.

A landmark 1965 Vatican document said Jews should not be held collectively responsible. The concept of universal guilt by sinners of all times for Christ's suffering was already contained in the "Roman Catechism" of the Council of Trent, but it was never applied to Easter sermons. The Pope's words were written by French Orthodox theologian Olivier Clement, at the Pope's request for a reflection related to the Church's past errors and Christian sins throughout history. This is part of the "purification process" leading to the Jubilee Year, of which the recent Vatican document, "We Remember: Reflections on the Shoah," is part.

Good Friday has traditionally been a time of fear for Jews, when anti-Jewish sermons incited crowds to hatred and often violence against Jews. Pope John XXIII was the first to lead Catholics toward a new theology regarding Jews, when he removed the words, "perfidious Jews" from Good Friday sermons. Now a further, perhaps definitive step has been made.

Conversion institute approved

"There are those on the extreme of both sides who are interested in there being a split and dispute," he said, "but we must make efforts to ensure that the deal is not torpedoed."

The decision to go ahead with the joint institute was made over the objections of Deputy Housing Minister Meir Porush, who sits on the subcommittee. Other members of the subcommittee are Ne'eman, Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky, Interior Minister Eli Suissa and Education Minister Yitzhak Levy.

The subcommittee also approved the allocation of funds for establishment of the institute, a move that Porush criticized as giving it government endorsement.

"There is no way the Reform and Conservatives should be involved in the conversion process," Porush said.

The Reform and Conservative movement spokespersons also took issue with the decision to establish the institute, saying it is an attempt to delude the public into thinking that the Ne'eman recommendations were agreed upon.

Rabbi Uri Regev, head of the Reform Movement's Israel Religious Action Centre and a member of the Ne'eman Committee, said that the panel did indeed present recommendations to the prime minister – the first one being the establishment of a joint conversion institute, and the second that the chief rabbis establish special rabbinical courts to perform the actual conversions. But, he said, those recommendations were never signed.

"We were not willing to sign until we had a meeting with the chief rabbis, and were convinced that they also accepted the findings," Regev said.

That meeting never took place, and the chief rabbis – while accepting the idea that the Chief Rabbinate will have sole authority over conversions – rejected the idea of a joint institute, and its inherent recognition of the liberal streams of Judaism.

"It was a package deal," Regev said, "and the rabbinate never accepted the package."

Regev said that the liberal movements have no intention, even with the establishment of this institute, of withdrawing their High Court petitions demanding that conversions performed here by Reform or Conservative rabbis be recognized.

Ish-Shalom, the man slated to head the joint institute, which will be under Jewish Agency auspices, did not want to elaborate on how he envisions it will function before he meets with Ne'eman and the other parties involved. All he would say was that the material will be presented in a way that will "reflect the traditions, customs, culture, and halachot of the Jewish people."

Survivor, diplomat to address communal service

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Ambassador Naphtali Lau-Lavie will address the Toronto Jewish community's annual Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah service on April 22 at Earl Bales Park, beginning at 7 p.m.

Lau-Lavie is a Holocaust survivor, former diplomat and advisor to Israeli leaders.

His new book, Balaam's Prophecy, will be released to coincide with the visit. The book, an autobiography, is also a personal account of Jewish history from 1939 to 1989.

Lau-Lavie tells of his harrowing experiences in Auschwitz and Buchenwald, where he was young and alone. His parents and one of his brothers, Milek, perished in the camps.

In April 1945, Lau-Lavie was liberated from Buchenwald. Three months later, at age 19, he immigrated to Palestine, but not before the incredible rescue of his eight-year old brother "Lulek," today Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi, Yisrael Meir Lau.

In 1948, Lau-Lavie joined the Haganah and fought in the War of Independence. He then studied at Hebrew University and later became a journalist with the Hebrew daily Ha'aretz.

In 1961, he covered the trial of Adolf Eichmann for his paper. One of the most poignant parts of his book is a description of testimony given at the trial by a woman who was a lone survivor of a mass shooting in then White Russia. After all the Jews in her village had been taken and shot, she emerged from the mass grave filled with bodies of her relatives and friends, and lived to tell her story.

Even for Lau-Lavie, who himself had witnessed so many atrocities, this was too much. He wrote, "I sat through her testimony, stunned, detached from everything around me. I took notes mechanically. When she finished, I looked at my notes and could not find a single legible sentence. I left the courthouse, and like a sleepwalker from another planet, began to roam the narrow lanes of the ancient Jerusalem quarter around the courtroom, one of the first built outside the old city walls.

"Parched to the point of suffocation I could not bring myself to ask for water at a nearby kiosk. I went home and stayed there for two days...On the third day, the newspaper phoned to see what had happened to me – what about the column I was assigned to write? After the midday editorial meeting, I went to the editor's office and told him that I could not cover the trial anymore. He understood."

In the early '70s, Lau-Lavie moved into politics and became a special adviser to Moshe Dayan, then to Shimon Peres and subsequently to Yitzhak Shamir. He was a key member of the Israeli delegation to the peace negotiations with Egypt in 1977 and 1979.

In 1981, he was appointed Israel's consul general in New York, with the rank of full ambassador.

Today, he is vice-chair of the executive of the World Jewish Restitution Organization, working to ensure that Holocaust survivors and their descendants receive compensation and restitution for the property and valuables taken from them during the Nazi period.

Lau-Lavie spends much of his time commuting between European capitals to negotiate with governments for Jewish communities in eastern Europe.

In many cases, there are no survivors to receive compensation, so Lau-Lavie arranges for proceeds from the sale or rent of property previously owned by Jews to benefit the local community.

Hamas suspect claims torture

repeated his confession in a meeting with Palestinian legislative council member Khatem Abdul Khader, a Fatah representative from Jerusalem.

Adassi said Rajoub said he had detained his sister and threatened to harm her if he retracted his confession. Later, Adassi learned that his sister had not been in PA custody.

"Today, I stand innocent before the Palestinian people and Hamas and tell them that I didn't deceive them," Adassi wrote. "But the pain of torture was greater than I could bear."

Palestinian human rights groups have requested permission to meet Adassi and Awadallah to ensure that their confessions are genuine.

Hamas renewed its appeals for the release of its leaders during a recent rally at the Islamic University. Several Hamas figures, including Abdel Aziz Rantisi have been detained since the organization criticized the PA inquiry committee which blamed Sharif's death on a feud within Hamas.

PA secretary-general Tayeb Abdul Rahim, head of the committee, responded that he had consistently informed Hamas leaders of details of the investigation, and several times asked for their help in finding Awadallah.

"We told them that if you want to deny such a story, please help us capture the murderer, because Imad Awadallah has the solution to the riddle since we have confessions from those who participated in this process or were apparently involved," he said.

Abdul Rahim rejected Hamas accusations that the PA is blaming it to prevent Israel from being fingered for Sharif's death. He accused Hamas of acting as a sovereign power within the PA.

"This is an issue and this is a different issue," he said. "We shouldn't mix things up. I reject Hamas' declaration that we are helping the Israelis. We are the nationalists who participated in the armed struggle since 1965, whereas they began the armed struggle after Oslo."

PA communications minister Imad Falouji, a senior Hamas activist, defended the PA investigation. He said the PA will not allow anybody to take the law into his own hands and will limit troublemakers within the Palestinian people.

"The PA must know the reasons behind this accident," he said following his return from Saudi Arabia. "This is a Palestinian issue and the PA must do its duty to expose the facts."

Falouji said he will be in contact with Hamas leaders to try to achieve a reconciliation with the PA. He said he hopes the PA will not have to "take steps against any Palestinian political movement."

Meanwhile, the PA continued to press Hamas activists and Palestinian journalists to muzzle criticism of the authority.

Palestinian sources said two members of PA General Intelligence ordered the Awadallah family in Ramallah not to speak to journalists.

PA police interrogated Reuters journalist Abbas Mumni on suspicion that he videotaped Hamas fugitive Adel Awadallah last week.

The Gaza office of Reuters has been closed since Friday and PA officials said it will reopen next week after a meeting between them and Reuters representatives.

PM beset by pressures

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

With internal and external pressure building on Israel to redeploy from additional portions of the West Bank and thereby fulfil its contractual obligations under the Oslo accords, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu finds himself between a rock and a hard place.

Mideast Analysis

Should he embrace a still unannounced American peace plan calling for a "substantial and credible" phased withdrawal from parts of the West Bank in exchange for greater Palestinian efforts to contain terrorism?

Or should he, as some of Netanyahu's supporters and allies stridently insist, stick to his previously stated position and rebuff the Americans?

With Dennis Ross, the United States special envoy, expected in Israel shortly after Passover to revisit the issue, Netanyahu faces demands from far-right constituents to fob off Ross – President Bill Clinton's emissary – once and for all.

Apart from adamantly opposing Washington's proposal for a double-digit Israeli redeployment, they are staunchly against the idea of transferring more land to the Palestinian Authority (PA), which is currently in full or partial control of about 27 percent of the West Bank and most of the Gaza Strip.

Commanding a bare majority of 61 Knesset seats since the departure of David Levy and his Gesher faction from the government three months ago, Netanyahu clearly cannot afford to ignore the thunder from the far right in the Knesset.

The secular and religious parliamentarians who threaten to bring down Netanyahu's government in the event of further withdrawals belong to the Land of Israel Front, which is antagonistic to the Oslo process.

Headed by Michael Kleiner, the Land of Israel Front enjoys the support of at least 17 members of the Knesset, as well as the undisguised sympathy of former and present cabinet ministers (Benny Begin, Limor Livnat and Yitzhak Levy) and of the chair of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, Uzi Landau.

Netanyahu is acutely aware of the fervent opposition in his camp to the Oslo formula of relinquishing territory in return for security. Cabinet hardliners voiced criticism of the 1997 redeployment from Hebron and the subsequent offer, rejected by the Palestinians as insufficient, to cede another nine percent of the West Bank.

As Netanyahu ponders the Land of Israel Front's oft-repeated threat to pull the plug on his government, he must consider several other related factors.

The relatively moderate Third Way party, led by Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, is demanding further withdrawals, albeit modest ones which do not meet the expectations of the Palestinians, in the interests of preserving the peace process. Kahalani – whose four Knesset seats are essential to Netanyahu's political survival – has warned him that the Third Way will leave the government unless Israel meets its obligations.

The defence minister, Yitzhak Mordechai, has also issued an ultimatum of sorts. In early January, he talked of quitting unless Israel redeployed by April. The deadline has passed, but Mordechai has yet to pack his bags. Does he have the courage of his convictions?

Amid these uncertainties, Netanyahu must contend with American annoyance. Israel has already described as unacceptable the Clinton administration's plan for a 13 percent withdrawal. Can Ross, in his second mission to Israel in less than a month, bring Israel into line? If he fails again, there is a possibility that the United States will throw up its hands in despair and let Israel and the PA resolve their differences without outside help.

If that happens, the Land of Israel Front will not shed any tears. Animated by militant nationalism and a profound fear and mistrust of Palestinian aspirations and motives, Kleiner and company want Israel to expand settlements, build new ones, construct more bypass roads in the territories, finish the Har Choma housing project in eastern Jerusalem and cease all discussions of withdrawals to "Auschwitz borders."

Russians probe 'Israeli' PM

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Russian lawmakers want to be sure that their next prime minister is not an Israeli.

The speaker of the Russian Parliament's lower house, Gennady Seleznev, announced last week that the house has requested information from the government on whether acting prime minister Sergei Kiriyenko has Israeli as well as Russian citizenship.

Kiriyenko was named by President Boris Yeltsin as prime minister several weeks ago, after Yeltsin dismissed his entire cabinet. He is awaiting parliamentary approval.

In a television interview following his appointment, Kiriyenko, who previously headed Russia's Fuel and Energy ministry, was asked about his ethnic background and replied that his father is Jewish and his mother is Russian. He added that his surname is Ukrainian and that he was born in Abkhazia, a region in the former Soviet republic of Georgia.

• Police in Jerusalem went on high alert after officers shot and killed a Palestinian who ignored orders to stop at a roadblock.

April 7

• Ephraim Halevy formally assumed the top position of the Mossad.

April 8

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu sent a senior advisor, Yitzhak Molcho, to Washington to discuss advancing the peace process. Molcho's trip is in advance of the anticipated return to the region of special envoy Dennis Ross.

April 9

• Caroline Kharman, the first Christian woman to become an officer in the IDF, received her second-lieutenant's bars. The Arab Christian grew up in the mostly Druze village of Usfiya on the Carmel. She was the only female officer candidate among 13 males at the IDF graduation ceremony.

• A tourist vessel broke free from its anchor near Eilat and was blown toward shore, causing serious damage to rare coral reefs. Nature reserve officials believe the damage to the reef is irreversible. The 52 passengers and four crew members were rescued by navy and police vessels before the boat sank.

50 Years Ago

JERUSALEM, Apr. 13 (JTA) — The Jewish Agency announced today that a 13-man cabinet will be formed as the central authority for the Jewish State in accordance with the decision adopted yesterday in Tel Aviv by the Zionist Actions Committee, the supreme Zionist body between congresses. The "Declaration of Jewish Independence" adopted yesterday by the Zionist Actions Committee is not meant to defy anyone, Maj. Michael Comay, spokesman for the Jewish Agency, told a news conference.

Stanford, and many other top universities.

They know the classical texts of Western civilization, as well as the Torah and Talmudic texts of their Jewish heritage.

They have a knowledge of French and Spanish, as well as Hebrew, the ancient language of their own people.

They're intelligent, well-rounded, and self-aware, but they also have values which will give their lives depth and texture.

They're the graduates of Jewish Day Schools.

Aren't these the kind of people you want your kids to be?

A generation ago, Jewish parents measured the success of their children by how Canadian they could be. Under those criteria, we indeed succeeded. Just look at how many of us became university presidents, corporate executives, and political leaders.

But in this process, there was also failure. Many of us lost a powerful component of our identity. Our Judaism.

Today, we have the opportunity to succeed in Canadian society while strongly identifying as Jews. This is why Jewish Day Schools are growing. More are opening across the country every year. AVI CHAI, a private foundation established for the purpose of encouraging Jewish educational initiatives, urges you to find out about the Jewish Day Schools in your area.

Investors Find Comfort In Segregated Funds Amidst Volatile Markets

Many investors are currently enjoying phenomenal investment returns; as I write this article the TSE is at approximately 7550 and the Dow is approaching the unprecedented 9000 index level. While we are all encouraged by today's investment climate, successful investors know the importance of protecting their assets to guard against downturns in the market.

By S. Jonathan Kirshblum, Investment Executive

A common concern among many older investors is how to participate in the potential continued growth in the stock markets while not risking their principal investment. If this is a question that you have contemplated regarding your own portfolio or perhaps a family member's portfolio then I suggest the following: The most important question to ask yourself when considering this issue is, for whom am I trying to protect and/or grow the principal investment? Is it for me or is it for someone other than myself? There are excellent investment alternatives regardless of your answer. This article focuses on one investment ideally suited to investors seeking principal protection and growth potential primarily for the benefit of others. Such investors should consider Segregated Funds.

Segregated Funds are offered by life insurance companies. They look and act like many well known mutual funds such as Templeton or Fidelity, but they also have several unique advantages: they guarantee up to 100% of the principal investment at maturity (usually 10 years); they guarantee up to 100% of the principal investment in case of death (called the "death benefit guarantee"); they offer potential for creditor protection; and, the owner is allowed to name a beneficiary, thus avoiding the estate and associated probate and legal fees.

Recently, several insurance companies have added benefits that have made segregated funds an even more attractive investment. The most important addition is a new feature called the "freeze option." This benefit provides investors with a method to lock-in investment gains as the market value in their portfolio rises.

For example: A client invests $100,000.00. One year later the market value rises to $120,000.00. The client locks-in the $20,000.00 capital gain by exercising the "freeze option." This increases the guaranteed principal to $120,000.00. If the client subsequently dies and the market value of the fund has dropped to $90,000.00, the beneficiary still receives $120,000.00.

The "freeze option" is a powerful new benefit that offers peace of mind to older investors seeking capital growth. They have a guarantee that their investment plus any market gains will be paid to a designated beneficiary. The freeze option protects the value of their principal investment against falling markets since the new guaranteed amount is maintained even if market prices later decline. The freeze option eliminates the need to buy and sell securities in order to lock-in capital gains and also avoids triggering capital gains tax when the option is exercised.

Segregated funds may add tremendous value in case of death, however, the investor need not die in order to benefit. While the investor is alive, segregated funds grow in the same way as conventional mutual funds. Segregated fund units are redeemable in whole or in part at any time at prevailing market prices.

Seniors holding individual stocks or equity mutual funds in RRSPs, RRIFs, or investment accounts may consider switching these investments to segregated funds. Moving into segregated funds provides the opportunity to maximize investment gains, while minimizing investment risk.

Guarantees on the principal and the ability to lock-in capital gains provide new opportunities for investment strategies:

- Spouses trying to grow their capital while alive may now protect the principal and growth for each other in case of death.
- Parents or grandparents that have allocated sums of money for children may now invest in equity funds and lock-in future growth without risk to the principal investment.
- Middle-aged children with a parent who is a senior may purchase a segregated fund in their own name but link the term of the investment to the parent's life.

Whether it is the potential for creditor proofing, avoiding probate fees and estate costs, or using the death benefit guarantee and freeze option as part of estate planning, segregated funds offer unique benefits that continue to attract a wide spectrum of investors.

A word to the wise: Many different Insurance companies offer segregated funds with varying features and benefits. One of the chief variables is the percentage of the principal and market gains that are guaranteed at maturity or death (ranging from 75% to 100%). It is important to ensure that the fund selected provides the most suitable terms available for the individual investor's objectives. Seeking professional assistance with this investment is strongly recommended.

Your window on the world

Lindan Toole founded the Travel & Leisure Show in 1986. Since then, she has seen it quadruple in size, to become Canada's largest travel show, and one of the largest in North America. An avid traveller herself, fond of out-of-the-way destinations, she started the Show because she wasn't getting the travel information she wanted.

There are 400 exhibitors from around the world. There are 50 from the US, 75 from Canada including many Southern Ontario destinations, 70 from Europe, 30 from the Caribbean, 5 from the Middle East, including Israel, about 15 from Asia, 10 from Africa, and about 20 from South and Central America.

There are 75 tour operators and 80 tourist boards, along with Visitor and Convention Bureaus which are branches of local Chambers of Commerce. Airlines, cruise lines, railways, larger hotels, museums and resorts are well represented.

The Travel & Leisure Show also hosts enterprises like small hotels, boating companies, restaurants, and bed-and-breakfast establishments. An Ottawa group of B&B's, for instance, has pooled resources in order to exhibit. Travel guide publishers Michelin and Moon are here; so is the Toronto travel book and map publisher and bookseller, Ulysses.

Africa is increasingly well represented. There are exhibitors from South Africa, Kenya, Tanzania and Malawi, and 5 from Zanzibar alone; northern Africa is represented by Tunisia, Morocco and Egypt. There are many exhibitors from Asia as well.

While the less rugged forms of tourism are as popular as ever, adventure travel and eco-tourism are on the rise in Africa, Central and South America, Northern Canada and Alaska. White water canoeing and backpack trekking are increasingly popular; so is whale watching.

Even for frequently visited places like Great Britain (or, nearer home, Southern Ontario), information on unconventional, out of the way attractions may not be easily available; but the Travel & Leisure Show fills this need. It's more than a place to meet people from far away: it's a new window on the world.

Did you know, for example, that the Dominican Republic has a fine National Park system? Within it are such extremes as Pico Duarte, 100 metres over 10,000 ft., with temperatures as low as -8 C. — and Isla Cabritos, a lake island park from 4-40 metres below sea level, with temperatures as high as 50 C., and a colony of American crocodiles.

There's no pressure to buy or sign anything. Some exhibitors, like tourist boards, don't sell at all, but only provide information; and even those with a service or product to market concentrate on enriching your knowledge.

Whatever you want to know about travel, whether as a professional or for your own pleasure, the Travel & Leisure Show is the best way to find it all in one place. Whether you're interested in business trips, group tours or setting out on a solitary trek, there's something here for you.

Do you want in-depth knowledge? There are seminars on travel photography, travel medicine, how to avoid scams perpetrated on tourists, and even how to pack efficiently. Foreign Affairs offers a seminar on safe travel to foreign countries, titled Traveling Wisely, dealing with precautions to take before you leave (inoculations, visas, etc.) and when you reach your destination.

There are destination seminars too, for places as far afield as Ohio's Amish country, Barbados, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Wales, China and the Himalayas. Whales and other marine mammals have a seminar of their own; so do Western Canadian rail travel and other fascinating subjects.

The Travel & Leisure Show runs from Thursday, April 23 to Sunday, April 26. Trade Night, on Thursday from 4:30-8:30 p.m., is open only to the industry; Ms. Toole estimates it will draw about 1,000 professionals.

The Travel & Leisure Show is open to the public Friday, April 24-Sunday, April 26. Ms Toole looks forward to seeing about 30,000 visitors. Regular adult admission is $9; admission for students aged 13-18, or for seniors (60+), is $6.

The location is the National Trade Centre in the CNE grounds, directly across from the Automotive Building. Hours are Fri. 2-9 p.m., Sat. 10 a.m.-6 p.m., and Sun. 10 a.m.-5 p.m. For information, call 418-535-4024.

For variety, pricing and service, visit Party City

Since Party City opened its first superstore in 1985, it has grown phenomenally. Today, it's the world's largest party supply retailer, with over 280 superstores in Canada, the U.S., Puerto Rico and Europe. The company has been so successful, it will open another 75 superstores in 1998.

In Canada, Party City has also met with great customer response. Party City President Michael Shneer identifies three reasons for this success: variety of merchandise, deep discounted prices and great service.

Shneer stated "the response from the Jewish community to our Vaughan superstore has been outstanding, but many Jewish customers in the York Mills/Bayview area and Forest Hill have been asking us to open a superstore further south." In response, Party City has just opened, a new, conveniently located North York superstore at 1448 Lawrence Ave. E., at Victoria Park, beside Toys R Us.

Shneer added "we're also opening several more stores in Ontario this year with one opening in London, Ont. next week." Things have been so positive that the company went public on the Alberta Stock Exchange (symbol PHL).

With over 20,000 items in every superstore, Party City offers Canada's largest selection of party merchandise, and a constant inflow of new products. No matter what you're planning, gala event or informal get-together, everything you need is here.

Looking forward to warm weather? There are pool and garden party supplies. Thinking ahead to your next big occasion — maybe even next Chanukah or Pesach? There's a huge range of plates, cups, napkins, table covers and other items with Chanukah or Pesach designs.

Everyday catering supplies include steam and roaster pans, platters, foil containers, trays, serving bowls, and cake decorating products. (You can take cake decorating lessons, too!). Paperware, plastic dishes, cutlery and accessories come in hundreds of patterns and colours.

There are thousands of items and accessories for weddings, showers, and anniversaries from the 1st to the 50th, including customized invitations and thank you cards. Bridal accessories range from confetti to place cards, car pompoms to garter belts.

Here's everything you need for Bar/Bat Mitzvahs, birthdays, sweet 16's and graduations, including a humungous loot bag and favour selection. There's a vast variety of hats, horns, banners, pinatas, candles, giftwrap, ribbons, bows, bags, centrepieces, balloon sandweights, inflatable guitars and glowsticks, along with many new party ideas.

Costumes, masks, wigs, makeup and accessories are in stock year-round, for every season, religious or secular. For example, Party City carries Canada's biggest Hallowe'en selection, much of which is suitable for Purim.

You can rent helium tanks to fill balloons, or have Party City fill them. "We sell a dozen helium-filled latex balloons for only $8.99," Shneer points out, "while others charge more than $13 per dozen."

By operating large-scale, Party City earns huge purchasing discounts which it passes on to you. With its lowest price guarantee policy, Party City promises to beat competitors' advertised prices by 15%.

Party City has become a destination point for buying greeting cards because they sell Carlton cards at 40% off the suggested retail price — lower than anywhere else in Canada. And while Party City stocks many of the same wedding or Bar/Bat Mitzvah invitation books as other stores, they discount quoted prices by 25%.

Staff are party mavens, eager to give you all the time and assistance you need. Free checklists help you choose and plan; shelves are kept fully stocked; every store carries the same huge inventory, and is constantly replenished through computerized tracking.

Party City's superstores are bright, clean and spacious, exuding a festive atmosphere. You'll enjoy shopping here. Shneer promises "You won't find a bigger selection at the guaranteed lowest prices anywhere else in Canada."

Fulfilling the Promise.

Na'amat is making a difference in the lives of tens of thousands of Israeli children and teens, and yet, for every one we help there are two we can't. With your help, we can secure the future for a disadvantaged child in Israel. Israel's children of today are her citizens of tomorrow. Please help us help them.

NA'AMAT TORONTO

80,000 Israeli pre-school children suffer physical or psychological abuse each year.

Case History: Leora is three years old. Her father was killed in the service. Her mother, unable to cope with the loss, had been neglecting and abusing her child.

$600 a year will provide a child with a loving home and psychological rehabilitation in a Na'amat full care residence.

In Israel, it is not illegal for parents to leave pre-school children alone and unsupervised. Many have no choice.

Case History: Uval is three years old. Left alone one day, he was nearly killed by a fall from a window. His parents had been desperately seeking subsidized daycare.

$400 a year will give a child loving care, nourishing meals and a pre school head-start in a Na'amat daycare centre.

Tens of thousands of Israeli teens need a refuge from problems at home. . . or within themselves.

Case History: Urit is fourteen. Her parents have never approved of anything she's ever done. . .so she ran away from home. She had been living on the street.

$500 a year will give a teen the opportunity to live in one of Na'amat's residential high schools where the youth will gain security and self-esteem along with university qualifications.

Family-run Furrier Provides 'Full-service' Care

Kahnert Furs on Avenue Road is a family-run business that has been serving the Greater Metropolitan Toronto area since 1957. For many women, owning a fur coat provides them with a feeling of warmth, and comfort and the fur requires special care in order to maintain its natural characteristics.

"We have always been known as a 'full service' furrier where customers can expect professional, knowledgeable, and personal advice on restyling, alterations, cleaning and repairs," says Dan Kahnert, the 4th generation of the family business.

During the hot summer months, he stresses that cold fur storage is essential to prevent the premature drying of the pelts and to preserve the natural oils in the skin. Cedar closets and air-conditioned homes simply lack the necessary cold temperatures, the proper humidity levels, and an adequate circulation of air.

At storage time, every fur is examined by one of the family, and should any repairs need attending to, free estimates are provided. It is important to look after any small repairs early on so that further damage is avoided.

Over the course of a dirty winter, furs can accumulate dust, grime, and dirt and therefore require a professional fur cleaning. Kahnert recommends that furs should be cleaned once a year or at least every 2 years. This special cleaning process is an effective, preventative measure that will add years of beauty and life to your furs while restoring their natural lustre and silkiness.

You may also take advantage of their trade-in policy. Kahnerts will allow you up to an additional 15% off the Spring Sales prices on any new purchase when you trade in your outdated fur.

They offer a quality selection of Canada Majestic Mink, Sheared Beaver, Canadian Lynx, Sable, as well as Raccoon, Beaver, and Muskrat, in a wide range of styles, lengths, and prices.

Their selection of top quality shearling lambs and fur lined Microfibres round out their very unique and diverse product mix.

Kahnert Furs is located at 1702 Avenue Road (north of Lawrence) and can be reached at (416) 781-8472.

Cuts to health care said hurting system

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The head of the Montreal Regional Health Board warned that the problems in the health system now will get worse if the Quebec government goes ahead with the $55-million cut its proposing to the city's budget.

Conrad Sauve, chair of its board of directors, said the region must have a two percent increase, or $60 million, in next year's allocation, and no cuts through to 2002, if it is to meet the needs of the population.

Without that raise, Sauve said, Montrealers can expect longer waiting lists for surgery and diagnostic procedures, and little improvement in home and long-term care.

"The quality of our health service is fragile but still good. We are at a critical point; if we do not get more money, we will suffer," he said.

Sauve gave an overview of the health and social services network as part of an all-day series of workshops on the changes taking place in the system at Direction 2000.

He said Montreal has just gone through an annual five percent budget cut in each of the last three years and had expected next year to be at least at the status quo. The board now administers a budget of $3.1 billion distributed among 160 institutions and 446 community organizations. The only major health expenditure it does not manage is doctors' salaries.

"The changes taking place in the system, with the shift to home and long-term care, are necessary, especially with the aging of the population, but have been done much too fast and under less than ideal conditions," he said.

The government's virage ambulatoire essentially means more day surgeries and shorter stays when hospitalization is required and more reliance on the CLSCs to provide more care at home after treatment at a hospital, he said. He admitted there is still a lack of coordination between the hospitals and CLSCs to make this work well.

Emphasis is being placed on long-term care because, Sauve said, much of the congestion in emergency rooms and delays for surgery are due to too many chronically ill patients staying in hospital because they have nowhere else to go.

"If the average hospital stay is seven days, and the average chronic patient stays one year in a hospital, he is taking the place of 52 people," he said. And at a cost of $500 a day.

Another means to ease emergency room crowding will be better coordination between doctors at CLSCs and clinics on the hours they are open. CLSCs are not open at night, so people tend to go to hospitals even for non-emergencies.

"We want to ensure that there is always walk-in access to medical services every day between 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. This can be done if the general practitioners in each neighborhood coordinate their opening hours," he said.

As far as surgery, the board has set a goal over the next three years of reducing waiting time specifically for cardiac bypass, hip and knee replacement, neurosurgery and cataract removal, he said. But that will only be possible if the budget is increased at least two percent.

Despite the hospital closings, Sauve noted that Montreal still has more beds per capita than anywhere else in Canada.

"The government has a responsibility to open up to the public the debate about what our resources are used for or slow down its debt [$200 million in Montreal] payment. Right now it is doing neither," Sauve said.

Avrum Orenstein, president of the Jewish Public Establishments Commission, said placement of the chronically ill Jewish elderly is a major concern for the community. The waiting list for the long-term care institutions has increased by 21 percent in the last three years, and is expected to get worse. "Something has to be done," he said.

The goal of Jewish community services is to supplement what the public system provides, not duplicate, he said.

"We will have to be more cost-effective but we will ensure that the services will be there."

At the same time, he vowed that "we will not let the [Health] Ministry off the hook. We believe the community has to help [the regional health board] in fighting the cuts."

Audience member, physician Harvey Sigman, said the problem is not only an aging population but a shortage of health professionals. "Unless we can make this an attractive place to work, we're in serious trouble. We'll have an aging system serving an aging population."

After hearing one optimistic presentation after the other, another audience member, Anna Gonshor, asked "If it's so good, why is it so bad?" She lamented how so many old people languish in hospital wards, how overburdened nurses are, how undignified care often is.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Can you settle a disagreement that I am having with a friend about dark and light chicken meat? I am under the impression that white meat is significantly lower in fat and calories than dark meat but she disagrees. Who is correct?

A. You are right. Both the fat and calories in dark meat are greater than those in white meat. The major difference, however, is in the fat. A 3.5 ounce piece of white meat, skinless, contains 173 calories and 4.5 grams of fat. An equal portion of skinless dark meat contains 205 calories and 9.7 grams of fat. I hope that helps to resolve your disagreement.

Q. I enjoy tomato juice and believe that it is full of vitamins, but I was wondering if its calories are as high as in other fruit juices?

A. Tomato juice is an excellent choice. It is full of vitamins and is much lower in calories than most fruit juices. A six ounce serving has only 30 to 40 calories (depending on the brand).

Q. I once read that the fresher artichokes become, the less calories they have. Is this true?

A. This is true, and a very interesting fact. The carbohydrate source in artichokes, called inulin, is a form that our bodies cannot digest. In storage, inulin converts to sugar, which we do digest, raising the caloric content. In both cases artichokes are still low in calories at approximately 60 calories per medium-sized artichoke, and have a healthful six grams of dietary fibre, so enjoy them in all forms.

Using stars to fight racism

By JOYCE SINGER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Just like the fabled Pied Piper, Lisa Cherniak has the magic touch. Since 1993, when she founded Artists Against Racism (AAR), a non-profit organization, and put out the call for celebrity endorsements, many stars have enlisted in the ongoing battle against racism.

Mendelson Joe designed the colorful poster, while other notable AAR members include Leonard Cohen, Eugene Levy, Karen Kain, Celine Dion, Oscar Peterson, Graham Green, Sarah McLachlan, Norman Jewison, Margaret Atwood, Atom Egoyan, Pierre Berton, Michelle Wright, k.d. lang and Kashtin.

"We're targeting youth, and these artists are their role models," Cherniak says.

She says their aim is to "combat racial and religious prejudice, which youth often learn from their family, friends and society in general. Particularly troubling are racist record labels that have mass mailings and numerous Web sites."

As a counter-attack, Cherniak put AAR on the Internet [www.vrx.net/aar], with informational material and celebrity endorsements. The Web site won the Point Survey Award for being one of the top five percent of Web sites worldwide.

"This organization is run full time by volunteers working their hearts out for a critically important issue. It's about a disease that impairs humanity immensely; and when people are spending much of their lives fighting it, we deserve more respect than the treatment we often receive.

"Also, it's very difficult to get corporate sponsors, because ours is not a cancer or a children's charity, but a cause to which many can't relate." Despite this, she said, corporations like McDonald's, Vistek and MuchMusic have sponsored some programs.

"Ours is an important message [that has] done much to reach and teach youth. It's about caring that your company can sell important messages to your community – not just sell products."

AAR continues to win awards locally and internationally, such as the Toronto Mayor's 1996 Anti-Racism Award and the Sassaby Cosmetics 1996 Internet Award.

There is a community program that provides posters, radio and television public service announcements, violet ribbons, information tables at concerts, newsletters, subway posters and outdoor billboards.

There is also a comprehensive school program, with educational material, an AAR video, posters, cassettes, an educational disk and the interactive Web site.

TORONTO — The annual Mizrachi concert had a new face this year – three new faces, in fact.

Instead of two or three internationally known chazzanim, as has been the case in the past, this year's concert, held at Shaarei Shomayim, featured 27-year-old tenor Chazzan Eliezer Kepecs, cantor of Kingsway Jewish Centre, and Shoresh, a new duo who are part of the popular Jewish religious music scene.

Kepecs' musical ability belied his youth. His Hallelu es HaShem showed off his truly rich voice, in a thrilling performance that sent shivers down the spine. Other selections, such as Eilu D'Varim, from an arrangement by the renowned cantor Moishe Koussevitsky, showed his self-confidence and command of his voice.

An interesting selection was a rollicking Mimcomcha, from the Shabbat Kedushah service, as it is frequently sung in shuls in Mexico.

One of the highlights of his performance was the frequently performed Chazzanim Oif Probe, by Sholom Secunda, which tells the story in Yiddish of three cantors auditioning for a position – a traditional one from Galicia, an operatic one who had studied at the opera in Vienna, and a third who used a jazz tempo.

Kepecs, in red bow tie and for part of the song a top hat, had the whole audience, even those who didn't understand the Yiddish, giggling and clapping. The jazz singer part, in which the davening was set to Yes, sir, that's my baby was accompanied by a hilarious soft shoe routine.

Shoresh is the union of two experienced musicians, Jeff Braverman and Jonathan Rimberg. They especially appealed to those with exposure to the type of music represented by such popular entertainers as Avraham Fried, Mendy Wald and the Miami Boys Choir, with hearkenings to the philosophical type of music of the '60s.

Most moving were Brothers, a dialogue between a man in Israel and his brother in America, and Together as One, a song about the bond between the State of Israel and people in the Diaspora. Their ability to harmonize was especially effective in Eishet Chayil, and Shirei Shalom, the main track from their CD, Songs of Peace, and the prayer for the State of Israel.

PRODUCER ATTEMPTING TO LURE JEWISH COMICS

Lou Eisen, the cigar-chomping Canadian comic responsible for the Jewish program Yids In The Hall at Yuk Yuk's Comedy Club, is devising plans for a four-day Jewish Comedy Festival slated for mid-October, intended to feature numerous acts from the big-name Borscht belt as well as up-and-coming comedians.

"I'm trying to line up some of my personal icons – Gary Shandling, Richard Lewis and Jackie Mason," Eisen says. "I'm also aiming for strong representation from the Canadian pool of talent. The festival atmosphere is a great way of attracting an audience to comedy."

Eisen hopes to announce a location and line-up in coming months.

New York's Jewish heritage museum paints evocative portrait of a people

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Located on Battery Park City on Manhattan's waterfront, opposite the Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island, the recently opened Museum of Jewish Heritage tells the story of 20th century Jewish life from the perspective of those who lived it.

Through personal experiences and world events, the exhibits paint an evocative portrait of a people, a catastrophe, and an indomitable spirit for survival.

The museum, a private, not-for-profit educational institution, is organized into three broad sections – Jewish Life a Century Ago, The War Against the Jews, and Jewish Renewal. The exhibitions include images, artifacts and 24 original films that feature testimonies from Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation as well as the Museum's own video archives.

Jewish Life a Century Ago answers the questions: Who were the Jews? What were their traditions and beliefs? Where did they live and what challenges did they face? What triumphs did they achieve? This exhibit is a journey through a world that has vanished. Despite diversity of a people who lived in many lands, observed different customs and spoke different languages, the exhibits of this century reflect the link of a people through common roots and shared values.

The War Against the Jews is filled with accounts of families struggling to comprehend the incomprehensible. Nevertheless, it remains a tale of hope – of the men and women who were determined to preserve their humanity and their heritage.

The third area, Jewish Renewal, highlights an era in which the Jews regain sovereignty in the Land of Israel, and it portrays post-war Jewish life in America.

The 30,000-square-foot museum's symbolic six-sided shape and tiered roof recalls the six million who perished in the Holocaust, as well as the Star of David.

"Like the hexagonal building, the six-tiered roof acts as a beacon of hope for the future of the Jewish people, built upon the rich legacy and culture of those who perished in the Holocaust," says Kevin Roche, the architect for the museum.

The pros and cons of Canada's slumping dollar

BY JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With 50 percent of Magnasonic Canada Corp.'s production going to the United States, Bernard Klein, like other Canadian businesspeople, is all too aware that the changing value of the Canadian dollar can dramatically affect the way he does business.

While a low dollar increases the market for Canadian goods, many businesspeople feel that in the long term, interest rates will rise, causing inflation.

Klein leaves no room for ambiguity: When the Canadian dollar is low, his competitive position in the American market is enhanced, he says. With half the company's production going stateside a 69 to 70 cent dollar is great.

But his holding company, which controls entities in the technology, communications and security sectors, will only remain competitive to about the 75 cent (US) level. Also, Klein must purchase about 10 percent of his goods from the United States with a Canadian dollar that has dropped below 70 cents US in recent weeks.

Another company, C.J. Rush Rovico, which manufactures revolving doors, can remain competitive with its American counterparts as long as the Canadian dollar remains below the 75 to 80 cent level. Company president Joe Rosenberg says the recent all-time low for the Canadian dollar has had a "big impact" on his sales.

And that seems to be the growing paradox with the low Canadian dollar and the gravy train of products going south at a price that American competitors can't beat.

Businesses are expanding on the back of a low Canadian dollar which is great for sales. But at times, the situation masks underlying industrial problems and a potential rebound effect.

Howard Frank, general manager of Centrac Inc., a manufacturer of high quality custom furnishings for the hospitality industry, feels that a low Canadian dollar and expanded sales to the United States give Canadians a badly needed boost in the furniture industry but also mask other problems for his sector.

"In our business, the dollar has some effect on increasing trade with the United States, but not as much as one would think. All it actually does is level the playing field somewhat," says Frank.

"The Canadian furniture industry was almost wiped out shortly after free trade came in. One of the main reasons for this is that Canadian furniture manufacturing companies failed for one reason or another to keep up with the technological automation necessary to remain competitive. We had a false sense of security," says Frank.

A low Canadian dollar can create other perils for Canadian businesses. For example, a low dollar often pushes up interest rates and costs companies more to operate.

The Conference Board of Canada pointed out in The Inside Edge that "with the Canadian dollar plumbing new depths, the Bank of Canada lifted the bank rate 50 basis points on January 30 to reach five per cent." This most recent rise erased all the declines occurring since April, 1996.

Klein acknowledges that raising interest rates to prop up a sagging Canadian dollar would certainly affect the current cost of doing business.

Danny Gordon, director of trading at Friedberg Mercantile, a currency trading company in Toronto, points out that while a low Canadian dollar will obviously boost exports in the short term, such benefits will be "eaten up" over time by wage demands and inflation.

Furthermore, such inflationary pressures could result in higher interest rates. "If the low dollar increases inflation, then it's a concern for interest rates," says Gordon.

Gordon believes a stronger Canadian dollar is probably best in the long run. "The best thing for any country is a strong currency. It's possible you can have a strong currency and interest rates go to one percent. Therefore, the guy who says he can hold out until 74 [cents US] maybe able to hold out until 85 [cents US] because interest costs him zero," says Gordon.

Canadian companies currently gloating about their ability to snag American contracts may attract the ire of a protectionist Congress. John McCallum, a professor of finance at the University of Manitoba writes in the Ivey Business Quarterly (Autumn 1997) that Canadian trade officials are expected to "become increasingly concerned that an excessively undervalued Canadian dollar will lead to a nasty trade retaliation from the U.S."

Also, as dependence grows on a low Canadian dollar, an appreciating dollar could cause disaster. "A newly successful exporter with a big ego will find it easy to confuse a low Canadian dollar with managerial genius," writes McCallum.

Israeli firm invests in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It's full steam ahead for Carvell Trading Ltd., a Tel Aviv-based import-export company that is building a multi-million dollar tourist resort in the community of Pinawa just northeast of Winnipeg.

On March 10, a $3.5-million lien filed against the property was dismissed. The lien was filed by a Winnipeg architect and business consultants firm, which claimed that the Carvell group had breached its contract and failed to pay fees for work done.

Lawyer Lyle Smordin, who is acting for the Israeli company, says the company refused to pay because it wasn't satisfied with the quality of the work.

The $85-million Pinawa Resort and Conference Centre project was announced last August. Smordin reports that construction of the first phase of the project should be underway almost immediately and will cost about $700,000. Despite the legal delay, the first phase should be completed by the long weekend in May.

The Carvell Group is also heading a consortium that is investing $20 million in a vacant former meat plant in Brandon, Manitoba's second largest city (pop. 38,000), which is located 200 kilometres west of Winnipeg on the Trans-Canada Highway. Carvell is planning to process 600 head of cattle a day into kosher and halal products for markets in Europe and Russia. The plant could be in operation toward the end of this year.

Waking up our youth

By ANDREA BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The much anticipated Wake-Up Tour has come and gone and what a long, strange trip it's been.

I say this because, having been in Israel for a year, I found that the recent concert here was like a surreal clip of a previously viewed movie.

The Wake-Up Tour featured the exciting Moshav Band, a group of transplanted Americans and young people raised in the peace-loving milieu of Shlomo Carlebach followers. All the way from Moshav Me'or Modi'im, the band is renowned for offering some of the sweetest niggunim around.

Playing the Concert Hall on March 26, the Moshav Band rocked the place apart.

The set fired off with a loud cry of the shofar and a rhythmic permeation of bongos, and the next three hours were an eclectic musical joyride.

Carlebach melodies such as Mizmor L' David and Y'hee Shalom were met with old favorites by the Grateful Dead, Neil Young and Pearl Jam. The band displayed a love for the stage as they pumped out juicy instrumentation and oozed tireless energy.

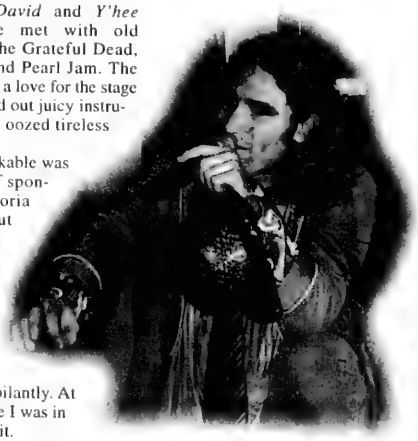
Most remarkable was the element of spontaneous euphoria felt throughout the room. As the band told entertaining stories and worked through songs, people formed circles and danced jubilantly. At times, I felt like I was in a giant mosh pit.

The tour was created to wake up Jewish youth in North America and evoke joy from within their souls. Toronto was no exception.

Included as part of the tour was Shabbat Unplugged, at various locations downtown. The Shabbaton featured tours of the old shuls around Chinatown, Shabbat services and various speakers who continued to convey the rousing message. Causes such as that of Jonathan Pollard and the four missing Israeli soldiers were recalled and we were all urged to awaken our own Jewish voice.

My enjoyment was heightened by the likeness of this experience to many of my own when I was a student in Jerusalem. The concert was an abstract journey into past sentiments, and the weekend a vehicle of self-motivation to advance a more meaningful future.

Andrea Bergman graduated from the University of Toronto and spent a year at the Overseas Program at Hebrew University in Israel.



The Moshav Band rock the joint apart.

Another side to Irving Berlin

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Tucked away in our piano bench at home is a curiosity, a piece of sheet music entitled Yascha Michaeloffsky's Melody, written and published in 1928 by Irving Berlin, the same man who composed such hits as White Christmas and Easter Parade.

Israel Balin, born in 1888 was the son of a cantor in Kirghizia, Russia. He was brought to New York in 1893 and when he grew up, totally changed his persona. As Irving Berlin, he became known to millions and his music reflecting the folkways of America was generally as far from his roots as Kirghizia is from New York.

In 1907 he wrote his first song, Marie From Sunny Italy. His second song, Dorendo, 1908, paid $25 and garnered him a job with a music company. He became a partner in the business and later established his own publishing house at 1607 Broadway.

Berlin had no musical training, never learned to read music and composed in only one key. His basic piano technique was aided by a special set of pedals for modulation. But somewhere inside, he heard melodies and words that touched a people.

He lived to the age of 103 and wrote over 1,000 songs!

Alexander's Ragtime Band, 1911, was Berlin's first major success, and he wrote for the films Top Hat, Holiday Inn, On the Avenue, Easter Parade, Call Me Madame and Annie Get Your Gun.

God Bless America earned him a special gold medal from then president Dwight Eisenhower.

Yascha Michaeloffsky's Melody was entirely different from his popular songs. Was this out of character or was the real Israel Balin still inhabiting his soul?

The words began, "Yascha Michaeloffsky Russian lad,/ He came over from Petrograd with a fiddle in his hand,/ Organized a first class band./ Right away he wrote a melody just as Russian as it could be./ Everybody hummed it soon,/ Yascha Michaeloffsky's Melody." The notes are simple, not particularly tuneful as in the familiar Berlin style, yet there they are inside a classical cover featuring a music stand, a vase of flowers and a violin.

Why did this man who wrote Alexander's Ragtime Band also give us Yascha Michaeloffsky's Melody? And who was Yascha Michaeloffsky?

Canadian chess whizzes share more than game

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Let's see now. Ron Livshits is 24 years old, Yan Teplitsky is 22.

Livshits was born in Israel and won the country's Cadet championship in 1988. Teplitsky was born in the former Soviet Union and won Israel's Cadet championship in 1991.

Livshits is a computer programmer who uses C++/MFC language to develop software for financial applications. Teplitsky is a computer programmer who uses C++/MFC language to develop software for financial applications.

Livshits loves to play the Sicilian opening. Teplitsky loves to play the Sicilian opening.

Livshits represented Canada in an international competition in 1996. Teplitsky represented Canada in that very same competition.

Both men got their "master" designations at the Canadian Closed tournament in 1996.

Before we go any further, let's make it clear that the two men are not long-lost brothers separated as babies. No, their parallel lives are much more interesting than that.

Both share a logical, rational mindset that makes them elite level chess players – among Canada's best. Teplitsky is ranked number 3 while Livshits is number 7. There's barely 40 points to differentiate their cumulative scores (2,540 versus 2,500) and as if all these similarities aren't enough, they live together and work for the same company.

They're together just enough to drive each other crazy, jokes Teplitsky, the more talkative of the two.

There's more. In the first round of the 1996 Canadian Closed tournament, they played each other in the first round and, can you believe it, they played to a draw.

It was as a result of that head-to-head confrontation that the two became fast friends. They went on to represent Canada at the 1996 Chess Olympics, and there's a good chance they will be on the Canadian team at this year's Olympics in Kalmykia, Russia, near the Caspian Sea.

Despite their many similarities, the two are anything but clones of one another. When it comes to chess, Livshits had to work hard and study chess books before he could excel. For Teplitsky, on the other hand, chess came easily, and he admits he never applied himself as much as he should.

"I'm a lazy dog when it comes to chess," he says.

A native of Tashkent in the former Soviet Union, Teplitsky was introduced to the game by his parents, Boris and Mira. When he was about 8 years old, he joined a school chess club. By age 10, he was already displaying the gift for the game that is so prized in the chess-mad former Soviet Union.

He was invited to attend a special chess school, the Dvoretsky-Yusopov academy, for gifted players and he competed in national tournaments in Moscow and Latvia. In 1991, the family left for Israel, but before leaving, he captured the Cadet title for youths under 16.

In Israel he continued to develop, playing in the national chess league for Maccabi Ra'anana. He won the country's Cadet title his first year in the Jewish state and was second in the Under-18 tournament two years later. He then represented Israel at the Volmac Junior Invitational in Antwerp, Belgium.

In 1994, the family moved to Vancouver, where his parents still reside.

Livshits is a sabra whose parents, Gennady and Isabel, moved to Kfar Saba from Riga, Latvia. He picked up the game at about nine years of age. "It was very popular in the neighborhood, so I started to play."

He improved his level of play at the local chess club, but determination as much as innate talent figured in his rise to excellence.

"I don't consider myself very talented compared to Yan. He's a natural talent. I have to work at it."

By about 11, his study of Bobby Fischer's chess books began to pay off. He liked the way Fischer played the game, particularly "his positional approach to chess. It is a very cold, logical approach to the game, rather than an attacking style."

Another coincidence: Teplitsky is also a fan of Fischer's style. "When you look at it, every move makes sense. One move leads to another and towards the ultimate goal."

Little competition

In 1989, a year after Livshits became Cadet champion of Israel, the family moved to Toronto.

"In Canada I continued to play, but I was discouraged here because chess in Canada is amateurish compared to Israel. The competition wasn't very strong, but it's getting better."

Teplitsky said that while still in Tashkent, he had planned on becoming a professional chess player, but after he moved to Israel, he started to develop other interests, particularly in electronics and computers.

Both men agree there is a correlation between their aptitude for chess and their talent with computers.

"Chess is two things," said Livshits. "Calculation for the first part, and second, the ability to see patterns and realize that one position is good and another is bad."

With their intimate knowledge of both chess and computers, they say they were shocked by world champion Gary Kasparov's loss to Big Blue, the top chess-playing computer.

They had expected Kasparov to handle Big Blue easily.

"Kasparov played far below his ability and in the last game he made a blunder that's in every book. Every kid knows it. I think he was over-psyched," Teplinsky said.

"He changed his style" for the matches," Livshits adds. "He supposedly thought that if he played positional chess, the computer wouldn't beat him. But he usually plays an aggressive, attack style."

As for the two of them, their chess goals are set. Both want to become grandmasters of the game and move up the world rankings.

Who knows, for the computer mavens there may be a confrontation with Big Blue on the horizon as well.

Midget Flyers' teamwork leads to victory on ice

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you were to speak to Bryan Friedman, Jeff Grad, Ryan Goldsilver or Stacey Britstone about their contributions to the Don Mills Flyers, chances are you'll hear something like "the party line."

"There is no number 1 line on the team," "everybody is expected to play both ends of the ice," "everybody is expected to work hard," yadda, yadda, yadda.

Speak to the Flyers' assistant coach, Gregory Peck, and you'll hear a very different story. All four are leaders in their own right and all are key players on the team, he said recently following a team practice at Fenside Arena.

Friedman is the team captain; Britstone is the team's scoring leader; Grad's got the lowest goals against average on the team and Goldsilver is an inspiration to his teammates for battling back from an early season broken ankle. "They're all leaders in one way or another," Peck said.

Not exactly a bunch of fourth line pluggers.

Modest to a fault, the four were key members of the Flyers' recent victory in the Air Canada Ontario midget championship in Renfrew, Ont.

The Flyers, winners of the MTHL Midget AAA title, represented Toronto in the five-team round robin tournament.

They defeated New Liskeard Cubs 2-1 in the gold medal game, with Goldsilver getting an assist on one of the goals.

The Flyers will move on to the national midget championships, the Air Canada Cup, to be held in Sudbury from April 21-26.

A typically Canadian team, the Flyers play a 2-1-2 forechecking system that pressure the opponents and looks for turnovers. The coaches stress hard work and finishing the check, Peck said.

If their practice is any indication, these boys can motor and there aren't too many players on the small side. Friedman, 18 and the most outspoken of the four, said the Flyers are very good at a physical style of play.

"Contact is a big part of the game at this age level. It's clean, but it's physical."

A member of the Flyers organization since he was a peewee, Friedman said he considers himself a well-rounded player who's capable in any situation. Peck said Friedman gets time on the power play and he and Britstone are two of five skaters the coach calls on for penalty killing duties.

Grad, who attends CHAT and backstops that team in high school competition, stands 6 foot 4 and is 210 pounds.

With that kind of size, "I like to play standup and take away the angles," he said. "I'm big and I take up a lot of the net."

"He's averse to moving," pipes in Friedman.

Ignoring the jibe, Grad, 17, said he likes to show shooters some open space on the glove hand and then take it away when they shoot. So far this season, his tactics have worked. He's sporting an ultra-low 1.7 goals-against average for the Flyers.

Goldsilver, 17, played only 17 games early in the season before he broke his ankle. Asked how the injury occurred, he said he got his skate caught in a rut, but when encouraged by his teammates to embellish the tale, he said his legs were kicked out from under him and at that point, his skate hit a rut.

Despite the injury, Goldsilver remained a key member of the team, attending all the Flyers' games and practices, Peck pointed out. He returned in time for the MTHL finals against Wexford, which the Flyers won four games to none.

Seventeen-year-old Britstone, 6 foot 1, 180 lbs., was Goldsilver's linemate until the ankle injury. Now he plays on "the crash line. I guess I play with one of the guys considered a goon on the team. We play a physical style, dump and chase," he said.

For the Flyers, the Renfrew tourney signals the beginning of the final stages of a long season that kicked off with a tournament in August. The Flyers won a bronze medal at the Young National Midget Showcase and followed that up with a victory in the Rochester Americans Tournament. In October, they played in the Sudbury Big Nickel event and they also participated in the Joe Maire Tournament.

Other than Grad, all are students at York Mills Collegiate.

Friedman, whose mother is Israeli, played for the Israeli junior team in a tournament in Lithuania several years ago, an event he considers a highlight in his hockey career.

Despite the four players' success playing with the Flyers – the top level of hockey for their ages – none are expecting to continue on in the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), the province's top junior level league, next season.

To a man, they agreed they put their education first. All four are looking south of the border with NCAA hockey scholarships on their minds.

Peck believes they're on the right track. They're all good students and all are good enough to play college hockey in the United States, he said.

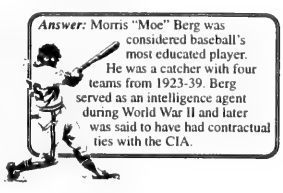
Last week we asked you to name the most educated man to play baseball. The New Yorker spoke 12 languages and served as a U.S. counterintelligence agent.



Answer: Morris "Moe" Berg was considered baseball's most educated player. He was a catcher with four teams from 1923-39. Berg served as an intelligence agent during World War II and later was said to have had contractual ties with the CIA.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

נבלות מאת: יורם קניוק והגדרת הסיפורת הפוסטמודרניסטית

א.

כיום, ניתן לתת הגדרה לכמה מאפיינים פוסטמודרניסטים תרבותיים-ספרותיים. הספרות הפוסטמודרניסטית איננה נותנת אמונה בתפיסת עולם אופטימית וגואלת; יש בה מימד הרבה יותר אפוקליפטי. אין בספרות זו שאיפה להומוגניות או לחשיפת "האמת", אין אידיאולוגיה, לא שמאל ולא ימין. יש כאלה האומרים שהפוסטמודרניזם ידרדר אותנו חזרה לחשכת ימי הביניים, ויש האומרים שחשיבה פוסטמודרנית מובילה קדימה בהתרעתה על פשיעה של החשיבה המודרנית והקידום הטכנולוגי שהולידו את אושוויץ. בהקשר הישראלי, ספרות זו בוחנת ומנפצת את מיתוס "הזהות הישראלית" ובמקום, מתארת חברה רב-זהותית וחסרת הומוגניות (וולק,קרת, גרוסמן, קסטל-בלום). ביצירות הגל החדש נעלם המספר הכל-יודע; במקומו מופיעות דמויות מספרות בעלות ראייה מוגבלת ומעוותת. הנרעין האישיותי, הנפשי אינו קובע. רק יחסי הגומלין עם הסביבה הם הקובעים. הסגנון "עובדתי" כביכול, בשילוב עם יסודות פנטסטיים (קסטל-בלום). חוויית הקריאה פונה יותר אל האינטלקט מאשר אל הרגש (מה שמסביר את מיעוט קוראיה של סיפנרת חדשה זו.) הקנון של הסיפורת הישראלית של שנות הששים והשבעים (יהושע, עוז, שחר, כהנא-כרמון) חדל מלהיות מוקד התייחסות בלעדי לספרות זו, ומרגע שהמרכז מתפורר, תספרות חשופה לרווחה להשפעות זרות, הזיכרון הקולקטיבי-ממלכתי מופקע, ועמה מתערערת הסמכה ההומניסטית. קיים אמנם הנסיון לגלות "מי אנחנו" אך בעת ובעונה אחת מערערים ונלחמים בגילוי זה.

יצירתו החדשה והחשובה של יורם קניוק שייכת לזרם המודרני והן לזרם הפוסטמודרני. הרעיונות הקודרים והאפלים שקניוק חושף בנבלות מוצגים באור מנוכר ו"עובדתי", אך מתוך ההלם הכיאוטי עולות שאלות יסוד על המצב הישראלי והאנושי. ועל כל זאת, במדורנו הבא.

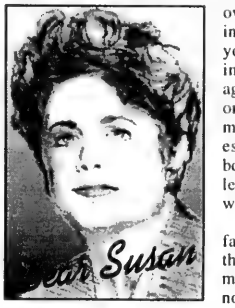
About families



Dear Susan,

I have an 8-year-old son who seems to be having trouble relating to boys his own age. He is very bright and creative; however, he seems to want to spend all of his time dreaming rather than interacting with others. When he does interact, he prefers the company of girls to boys. Do you have any suggestions?

Dear Reader,

You seem to be agonizing over your son's ability to fit in. You make no mention of your son's father. It is very important for boys of this age to connect with a father, or some other significant male role. Adult males are essential in helping young boys find their identities and learn how to deal with the world.

The more absent the father, the more connected the boy will become to his mother. It would, therefore, not be surprising for a boy to feel safer in the company of girls, as this would mirror his over involvement with his mother and the absence of a strong male role model. Your son may experience a greater sense of isolation and separation when he reaches that inevitable stage where girls and boys go their separate ways. At this point, your son may choose to connect with boys or he may become even more isolated from others.

Don't forget, as well, that young boys can be both aggressive and cruel, and it is easy for a sensitive, non-athletic outsider to be victimized. You must watch out for signs that your son is being rejected and/or victimized, and make sure he does not fall into the trap of internalizing his feelings.

To address this problem, I would recommend an integrative approach that includes family and individual therapy. You may want to explore gender issues in order to fully understand how your son perceives himself and his place in the world. A psychological assessment may also come in handy in order to fully understand his apparent isolation and lack of interest in those around him.

Above all, proceed with equal parts of caution and speed. Remember, there is nothing inherently wrong with simply being different.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 19 years.

IN 1948 UJA/UIA CAMPAIGNS helped rescue Jews in Europe who had nowhere to go. Over the next fifty years, the dollars raised throughout Canada continued to help redeem Jews from countries of persecution and bring them to Israel.

In the last decade alone, UJA/UIA Federation campaigns helped close to 900,000 Jews from the Former Soviet Union, Ethiopia and other countries begin new lives of freedom in Israel.

U.K. to host peace conference

Netanyahu, Arafat and Albright to meet Blair

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The United Kingdom will host an Israeli-Palestinian peace conference next month, a senior diplomatic source said in Jerusalem Sunday.

Attending will be Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat, as well as U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Political observers say the United States is unequivocally in favor of the summit, mainly because of the positive impact it could have in revitalizing the peace process and the high-profile status it would give the European Union (EU) as an effective partner in the peacemaking effort.

Topping the agenda will be the American proposals to end the deadlock between Israel and the PA on the depth of the IDF's next redeployment in the West Bank. The State Department reportedly favors an Israeli withdrawal from 13 percent of the territory under military control – four percent more than the government is willing to give up.

"I am prepared to go anywhere, at any time, and specifically in the next month to go to any location and possibly to London to try to advance the process," Netanyahu said at a joint news conference held immediately after the two prime ministers met.

"I hope to advance the process while, at the same time, safeguarding Israel's interests," he said.

Blair voiced unequivocal support for Netanyahu's stand: "That's why I said I welcomed the fact that the Israeli prime minister said he was willing to go and discuss the proposals the Americans have made."

At the same time, Blair made it clear that he intends to continue synchronizing his government's and the EU's Middle East policy with that of U.S. President Bill Clinton.

Bearing in mind that the U.K. holds the EU's rotating presidency, Blair said, "It is not our purpose to do anything that cuts across the U.S. proposals and diplomatic effort."

Netanyahu repeatedly expressed his confidence that peace between Israel and the Palestinians can be achieved. He gave his personal commitment to seek an end to the conflict.

"I believe that with goodwill on both sides, we can advance the negotiations and achieve a breakthrough to peace and a better future" in which Israelis and Palestinians can live as neighbors, he said.

Although Blair's role as a peacemaker was enhanced by the recent agreement to end the strife in Northern Ireland, he dismissed the notion that there can be an instant carryover of the spirit of Belfast to Jerusalem and Gaza or that he personally can do a repeat performance in the Middle East.

New books celebrate Singer's life

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Seven years after the death of Isaac Bashevis Singer, and 20 years after he won the Nobel Prize for literature, the literary world has produced three significant new books by and about the man who is one of the most important and popular Jewish writers of modern times. The last few months have seen the appearance of a new critical biography of Singer, a new memoir by one of his closest associates, and a novel, Shadows On The Hudson (Farrar Straus & Giroux.), Singer's fourth novel to be published posthumously.

Originally serialized in the Jewish Daily Forward in 1957, Shadows On The Hudson was Singer's first book about America – a country, he once famously proclaimed, that could never be the setting for a Yiddish novel. Written on the heels of his two masterworks, his 1950 novel The Family Moskat and his 1956 memoir In My Father's Court, both of which are set in Polish-Jewish locales before the Holocaust, Shadows On The Hudson takes place in Manhattan and Miami Beach in the decade after the European cataclysm.

Perhaps not unexpectedly, the book "is long on shadows, short on the Hudson," according to the English-language Forward. Since its main characters are drawn together primarily by their shared memories of prewar Warsaw, "New York City thus becomes a kind of palimpsest, which just barely conceals the sights, smells and sensibilities of another time and place," reviewer David Roskies noted.

As Janet Hadda points out in her psycho-literary biography Isaac Bashevis Singer: A Life (Oxford University Press), the main problem "for the Eastern-European Jewish writer transplanted onto American soil was that he could not use his native language to describe his new life."

Singer, of course, ultimately managed to overcome this difficulty by writing about transplanted Holocaust survivors and other Eastern European-Jewish exiles in such novels as Shadows On The Hudson, Enemies: A Love Story and Shosha. Many of his short stories set in America utilize a first-person narrator, a successful Yiddish writer in New York who receives a zany assortment of characters – just as Singer's father, a rabbi, held "court" in the family's humble apartment on Krochmalna Street in prewar Warsaw.

After the Shoah, Singer became a writer in turmoil, caught between "a dead past and an impossible future," as Hadda puts it. In an article in the Yiddish journal Tsukunft, Singer compared his native Yiddish to an Old World grandmother transplanted to America, who cannot adapt to modernity and becomes confused and forgetful. "When she starts talking about the past (through the mouth of a true talent), pearls drop from her lips. She remembers what happened 50 years ago better and more clearly than what happened this morning."

While millions of readers would agree that Singer produced pearls no matter what he was writing about, it is clear from Dvorah Telushkin's Master of Dreams: A Memoir of Isaac Bashevis Singer (William Morrow & Co.) that he never lost his sense of displacement after leaving Warsaw for America in 1935.

However, at least part of Singer's perpetual sense of dislocation, as described by Telushkin, must have come from advanced age. Telushkin approached him in 1975, offering him a weekly ride to Bard College in the Hudson Valley, where Singer was giving a course, in exchange for the privilege of auditing his lectures. She was only 21 at the time and he was already 71; she served as his personal assistant for the next 14 years, almost until his death in 1991 at the age of 87. ("You are the blessing of my old age," he told her.)

Through a series of well-drawn and highly revealing vignettes, Telushkin paints a portrait of a man who was perpetually losing manuscripts, speeches, cheques, bank accounts – and himself, on the streets of the Manhattan through which he often walked great distances at his usual speedy clip. One room of his 86th Street apartment, which Telushkin calls the "chaos room," was entirely given over to heaps of books, papers, old newspapers, letters and galleys of Yiddish manuscripts which often became impossibly entangled. He sometimes became frantic over the loss of an important cheque or speech, and would call Telushkin late at night in a panic.

Newspaper accounts about terrorism or riots sometimes filled Singer with fear. "I vill have to run. Vone day it vill come to it," he would say. "Humanity vill no longer have the power to reverse all this. I vill have to run avay to a faravay island and tell no one vhere I go."

Support group begun to help deal with eating disorders

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) is launching a support group for parents of children with eating disorders. The group is very likely the first of its kind in Canada to operate under Jewish auspices.

JF&CS credits CJN series

The eight-week Tuesday evening series, which begins April 28, will consist of 90-minute sessions facilitated by social worker Mindy Handler at the Lipa Green Building.

In Montreal, a similar group is "something we would be interested in offering," said Roz Friend, coordinator of the education and development centre at Jewish Family Services, "but we have not had sufficient registration."

The Toronto group was set up in part "to help parents feel supported by other parents," said Pat Lieberman, coordinator of the family life education program at JF&CS. "When someone else shares your grief and agony, it helps."

The support group is open to parents of children (including adult children) suffering from anorexia, bulimia and obesity.

Lieberman credited The CJN series on eating disorders, which

Survivors' affirmation

(A remembrance for Yom Hashoah)

At the age of 18, he was drafted into the Polish army where he served with honor in its cavalry for almost four years, until the first few days of September 1939, when, like Poland itself, the army was crushed under the steel tracks of the relentlessly forward-driving hordes of the German Panzer tanks.

He was the youngest of five children, an apprentice tailor, taken into the army ahead of his older brother, because his parents had registered their two boys as twins.

The day of his conscription was a sad one. He clipped his hair and shaved off his beard, forever casting aside with a forlorn melancholy, a way of life that his forebears had lived for hundreds of years, a way of life in which he took comfort in familiar habits and found shelter in the all-embracing love of his parents.

His family saw him only occasionally after that day. They couldn't know then and did not know, that when they kissed goodbye at the last, bittersweet meeting with their youngest child and brother, they would never see him again.

When the Germans marched into the village early in September in 1939, he was the sole member of his family not at home.

At that precise moment, in fact, along with thousands upon thousands of other Polish Jews, the young soldier had no home.

The Polish army did not withstand the might of the German invaders. Even the finest horses of the Polish cavalry were no match for the guns and the hot metal of the heavy German armor. Thus, after merely days of fighting, the army surrendered. But there was no shame in their surrender for, as events were to prove, all of continental Europe would soon surrender to the advancing German war and murder machine.

It is important to note, however, that the starved and starving Jews of the Warsaw ghetto, fighting primarily with hand-made weapons, hiding in sewers and running from one bunker to another, fought the Germans longer than did the armies of the Polish and other European peoples.

With the defeat of the army and the collapse of the government, confusion filled the temporal void; despair, fear, anarchy reigned.

The roads in the eastern part of Poland were all clogged with a mass of people fleeing for their lives. They were heading east towards Russia. Some were lucky to have wagons, which they loaded with whatever possessions they could tie together in their panic and their haste.

Very few had cars.

Most "travelled" on foot, men, women and children, stateless people all, running for their lives as fast as they could, trying to escape a pursuer, whose malevolent obsession to destroy all Jews was as unimaginable as it was nearly successful.

Once the army surrendered, the young soldier joined the desperate melee of human beings heading eastward on the roads and highways that brought life to some, but death to most.

Eventually, he escaped Poland and ended up in a labor camp in Siberia.

He survived the war by dint of his courage, his determination, his will to live, but mostly by sheer luck, by the quirks of fate that included conscripting him into the Polish cavalry, and taking him far from his home town of Byzeczin as the Nazis rolled in.

Nine out of every 10 Polish Jews who were alive when he entered the army would be killed during the 10 years that ensued.

At war's end, the stateless Jewish, former Polish soldier, now married, became also a displaced person along with 300,000 other Jews of Poland. And in the final, cruel irony of the war, the new, temporal authorities sent him and his wife, and all the other Jews displaced from their homes, to live in camps in Germany.

Three years later, at the age of 32, he undertook the daunting challenge of building a new life in a new land, Canada, about whose geography, language and culture he knew absolutely nothing.

Fifty years less a month after the stateless, displaced Jew from Poland arrived in Canada with his wife and baby daughter, he died quietly in an intensive care bed, entubed to the machines and the inexact sciences that tried in vain to prolong his life, his children and his wife at his side.

Like all the other displaced persons who came to a new land after the war, the memory of the family and the home he lost was the force that drove his spirit for the rest of his life. In later days, even when he reached for his children, he was also reaching for his murdered family. He sought them in the familiar corners of memory, and found them more and more in the details of his daily life.

All children of survivors understand that there are, or were, unique spaces in their parents' frequent silences that they could never enter.

They also understand and it is important on Yom Hashoah to remember and to remind the world that they are and were the proof of their parents' personal testimony against the Nazi murderers. They are the affirmation of the survivors' that forces for goodness must always strive to vanquish forces of evil, that however inconsolable the grief and immeasurable the loss, the imperative of life is to live and to move always forward, caring for one's fellow man and planting only the seeds of love even into a soil that has been cruelly scorched and made bitter by the tears of death.

Canada continues to accept 'refugees' from Israel

Numbers down for third year

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is still accepting refugees from Israel, although in much lower numbers than in previous years.

The continuing drop in Canada's acceptance rate indicates that Jerusalem's repeated pleas to Ottawa that there's no such thing as an Israeli refugee may be getting through.

Israel continues to deny that it produces refugees, and says claimants' stories of persecution in Israel are spurious.

The number of Israeli citizens granted refugee status in Canada in 1997 was down dramatically for the third consecutive year.

But again last year, almost all those granted asylum from Israel were accepted in Montreal, where panels of the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) are known to be less favorable to Israel than those in the rest of Canada.

According to figures released recently, the IRB in 1997 accepted just 46 refugee claimants from Israel, all of whom are believed to originate from the former Soviet Union. It's the lowest acceptance total since 1990.

The IRB last year rejected 827 claims of refugee status from Israel, based on 1,195 cases finalized. A further 1,014 claims from Israel are pending.

The national acceptance rate from Israel fell to four percent last year, from 7.5 percent the year before.

By contrast, the acceptance rate from Israel peaked in 1994 at 50 percent of all claims.

Again last year, the vast majority of asylum-seekers from Israel argued their cases in Montreal, where traditionally, IRB panels are more likely to believe allegations that the Jewish state persecutes its immigrants.

A total of 1,053 claims were made in Montreal and 40 were approved.

In Toronto, the figures were the lowest in recent memory. Only 117 claims were heard, and just four of them were accepted.

The latest figures and falling acceptance rates may go some way toward patching up an old dispute between Canada and Israel.

Since 1989, when the first wave of Jews were allowed to leave the Soviet Union, Israel has been trying to persuade Canada that ex-Soviets are taking advantage of the Law of Return to springboard to this country.

Typically, former Soviet Jews who come here as Israeli citizens claim that while in the Jewish state, they were harassed, denied jobs and housing, and even beaten because of mixed marriages or questionable Jewish status.

To qualify as refugees here, they must prove they have a well-founded fear of persecution should they be returned to Israel.

In a statement, Israel's embassy in Ottawa says it doesn't see any reason for Canada to grant refugee status to Israelis.

"Israel is a democratic state, an open society, in which citizens' rights are protected by basic laws, and [it has] a judicial system that is well-regarded worldwide," the embassy said.

CLARIFICATION

In last week's article on the Media Human Rights Awards given by B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, reference was made to "three volunteers" who were recognized for their efforts on an anti-racism poster series used in subway stations and bus shelters.

The award winners, whose names were not available at press time, were Jerry Rose, national chair of communications for the league, Murray Sye of White Space, and Bernie Moscovitch of BGR Graphics, who donated their professional services.

Doctor becomes Canada's second Reform mohelet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Rochelle Schwartz

TORONTO – For years Rochelle Schwartz heard the same question over and over again. Why, if she was performing dozens of circumcisions on the children of her gentile patients, couldn't she perform a brit milah for her Jewish patients' kids as well?

A doctor in a family practice for 13 years, Schwartz was hard-pressed to come up with a good reason.

She attended synagogue services regularly, she came from a traditional Jewish home and she had been enrolled in a Jewish school in her native Winnipeg; so she had a good knowledge of Jewish law and tradition. She knew that in the Bible, Moses' wife Zipporah had circumcised her own son.

Medically, the procedure was almost identical to what she'd been doing for so long, although generally mohelim (ritual circumcisers) favor the Mogen clamp over the Gomco clamp when performing the procedure. So, why not?

Always open to trying something different, Schwartz got in touch with Nancy Wechsler, a Reform rabbi, who now resides in New York.

"She encouraged me to pursue this," Schwartz said, "and now my parents (Harry and Freda Schwartz) are shepping naches – and my father comes from an Orthodox background."

After a period of intense study, the U.S.-based Brit Milah Board of Reform Judaism (BMBRJ) certified Schwartz as a Reform mohelet in November. She performed her first brit milah on Feb. 4. Since then, she's been averaging about one a week, six in all.

Now "the word is getting around about this female mohel," she said.

Though a pioneer in her own right, Schwartz isn't the first female mohel in Canada. That distinction belongs to Dr. Rhonda Wilansky, also of Toronto.

The two Canadian women are among 24 female mohelim in North America, a group that includes doctors and certified nurse midwives, according to the BMBRJ in Los Angeles.

Schwartz is one of nine Reform mohelim serving Toronto.

Right now, Schwartz readily concedes, she's something of a curiosity to the friends and family. But there's an upside to that. Instead of the noise and commotion you sometimes get at a bris, "I get the people's attention," she said.

"The last time, the baby barely cried. A lot of people said it must be a woman's touch, but I give a local anesthetic (zylocaine). That's my secret," she said.

For Helen Goodman, the brit milah performed by Schwartz on her grandson, Lyall Harrison, was a delightful experience.

"She performed the ceremony most adequately and she included my grandchildren, my son and his wife," she said.

To become accredited as a mohelet, Schwartz needed more than her medical training and a good bedside manner.

She trained for a year with Rabbi Daniel Komito-Gottlieb at Temple Kol Ami, studying the Halachah, Jewish custom and the background to the biblical injunction to circumcise a boy. "It was truly the most interesting and fascinating study I have ever done," she said.

She completed an extensive take-home exam on the religious elements of the brit, and the BMBRJ passed her with flying colors. Schwartz won't speculate how she'd be accepted in the Orthodox community, but she believes that based on her reading of Jewish law and tradition, particularly the Shulchan Aruch, there is no reason why a woman can't be a mohel.

"I do realize that as a pioneer, there will be barriers and obstacles to overcome in order to be accepted as a mohel, even in the most liberal Jewish communities. I, however, am a very determined but patient person," she said.

ran in February, for creating a "heightened awareness" in the lay community and among professionals. "We felt we should respond."

Handler, who deals mainly with body image, sexual abuse and women's issues in her private practice, sees the parents' support group "exploring issues that are coming up for them – how to parent, how to deal with family, stress management, treatment options, what people are finding useful and not useful.

"I will structure it loosely...but I'm very committed to being open to what people want. My position is in empowering them to find out what they need."

BGU launches health project with PA

TORONTO — Ben-Gurion University (BGU) experts recently presented Palestinian Authority (PA) officials with an innovative new health project aimed at encouraging cooperation between the university and the Palestinian community.

The project includes establishing a postgraduate training centre for health care professionals in the border region as well as special outpatient clinics at the Karni checkpoint leading to Gaza. Palestinian medical officials would undergo subspecialty training in various fields at Soroka Medical Centre and in the research departments of the Faculty of Health Sciences at BGU. Research programs in health services would be initiated as part of the World Health Organization's initiative for Health and Development in Border Areas.

To succeed, the project needs funding from the Health Ministry of Israel and the U.S. government.

Yom Hashoah

As a people, we have vowed before the entire world: "never again." It is a vow that entails constant vigilance against the appalling evil of oppression, racism and genocide.

But as individuals, as single sentient, perceptive, human beings, remembering is really the only human response possible.

Despite the mountain of literature that grows ever higher on the subject, the Shoah, at its core, is incomprehensible and ineffable, defying both understanding and even the beginning of expression.

The candle we light tonight in memory of the victims is not a device to help us remember. For we have never forgotten. Rather, we light the flame as a marker separating time from present to past, from ordinary to special, from secular to hallowed, for the 24 hours in which the flame will flicker. We stare into the flame – imagining a single soul – at the tiny filament of blue that burns at the very heart of the gold and orange light that draws upward, transparent-to-opaque, in the layered, triangulated, feathery glow. And as we stare into that flame and imagine and remember, we recite the age-old memorial prayer K'El Maleh Rachamim:

"O merciful God who dwells high above in the heavens,
Grant perfect rest 'neath the shelter of Your expansive divine presence,
And from within those lofty spaces, cause the holy and pure to shine with the splendor and the radiance of the deep firmament,
Upon the souls of the six million, men, women and children,
All of them holy and pure,
Who were killed, slaughtered, burned, asphyxiated and buried alive
In sanctification of Your Name,
By the nazis and their accomplices…
May their resting place be in Your garden.
And thus, Master of compassion,
Shelter the departed for all time in the shelter of Your divine expanse
Entwine their souls in the bond of everlasting life.
For God is their heritage.
And may they forever find peace in their resting places.
And let us say: Amen."

Is this leadership?

A leader must always respect the community. This is what Nachman ben Jacob, one of our early teachers in Babylon, taught his pupils. Rav Nachman's maxim expresses the minimal standard we expect of our public figures. Its origins however, precede Rav Nachman by more than a thousand years. It stems from the exhortations of our ancient prophets against callous and indifferent rulers.

In its simplicity, Rav Jacob's maxim conveys a profound, double-sided truth: that disdain for and ridicule of the public are inappropriate instruments of governance; and that every individual is of equal merit and thus worthy of respect.

It is a lesson we wish Premier Mike Harris of Ontario had learned.

Last week he cancelled a $37 a month allowance for pregnant women on welfare saying, "We're making sure that those dollars don't go to beer…"

It was a regrettable decision and an objectionable remark, one that betrays an obvious lack of respect for women who are pregnant, poor and receive public assistance.

Poor people are not less worthy people.

Poverty is onerous enough without the Premier, of all people, adding to its burden by perpetuating harmful stereotypes and stigmatizing the individuals who must cope with it. Indeed, there is a saying that poverty outweighs all other burdens. That is why we learn from a very young age in the book of Leviticus: "If your fellow human being becomes poor, and his means and abilities fail, you must uphold and maintain him."

We hope the premier will take Rav Jacob's maxim to heart: Respect the community. It is, after all, the minimal standard we require of our leaders.

Keep eye on Ottawa's role in war crimes

Re: Stephen Bindman's admonition to Bill Hobson and Arnold Fradkin, under the heading, "Arnie and Bill, give it up" (CJN, April 9).

Bindman warns Hobson and Fradkin against persisting in their "obsessive" allegations of anti-Semitism within the Canadian Justice Department.

During the 1980s, I was involved, as a co-founder and chair of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association, in that organization's efforts to bring to justice Nazi war criminals in Canada.

We applauded the federal government's move in setting up the investigative Deschenes Commission, and we had high expectations that with the Justice Department's appointment of a War Crimes Unit headed by Hobson, the Canadian government was at last prepared to deal with the long-neglected issue of Nazi war criminals living in our midst.

Sadly, however, as Hobson was replaced by Peter Kremer in the War Crimes Unit and the Justice Department's foot-dragging became more and more obvious, it appeared that our government still had no real interest in bringing Nazi war criminals to justice.

Rather than summarily dismissing what may be legitimate concerns of Hobson and Fradkin, our attention should be directed to the tactics of a government that enabled so many Nazi war criminals to enter Canada following World War II, and consequently is not disposed to be seriously concerned by their continuing presence here.

Israel justified in keeping West Bank land

Various articles over the last few weeks have been critical of Israel for not withdrawing further from portions of the West Bank. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu predicated the relinquishing of any land on the basis that the Palestinian Authority must take specific steps to eliminate terrorist activity. The discovery in a bomb-making factory of the remains of Mohiedeen Sharif, the most wanted man in Israel, provides vivid evidence of the correctness of Netanyahu's position. Sharif, the mastermind behind suicide bombings in Jerusalem last year that killed more than 20 people and injured hundreds more, was apparently provided safe haven in Ramallah just a few miles from Jerusalem.

Whether or not Israel was responsible for his death – and this Israel denies – is irrelevant to the fact that here was a terrorist engaged in a large bomb-making factory in an industrial zone that contained large amounts of home-made explosives. Obviously, no steps had been taken to shut it down or to arrest this prime suspect. Furthermore, it is indicated that he had a father and two brothers living in the area. Is one to reasonably believe that, if the Palestinian authorities had wanted to arrest him or shut down his murderous operation, he could not have been traced through his family.

Predictably, Hamas vows revenge and more bombings, and yet the only pressure being exerted is for Israel to give up more and more territory. As long as the Palestinian Authority provides safe haven for such madmen as Sharif, no reasonable person should anticipate any change in Israel's position of self preservation.

Suggests non-stop flights for El Al

Re: "El Al faces predicament in Canadian market (CJN, April 9).

I think El Al Canadian manager Moshe Shamai has missed the boat (or is it the plane?) on this one. The reason why Canadian Jews are not loyal to El Al is that Air Canada offers non-stop flights from Toronto to Tel Aviv, whereas El Al's flights all stop in Montreal or New York. The flying time, not to mention check-in and arrival procedures, between these two cities is long enough as it is, without an extra two hours added on; so it is not unreasonable for people to fly the airline offering non-stops.

El Al could have rectified this situation a long time ago by offering non-stop flights between Tel Aviv and Toronto. As passenger volume would not be high enough to justify such a route alone, the routing could be Tel Aviv-Toronto-Chicago or Tel Aviv-Toronto-Los Angeles. That way, Toronto passengers would have their non-stop flight and El Al would be carrying U.S. passengers through Toronto as Air Canada does, which was one of Shamai's other complaints.

The Montreal El Al flight could likewise be routed through to one of El Al's U.S. destinations. If necessary, Israel should insist on an amendment of the bilateral air agreement with Canada to allow for such routings.

Another reason that Canadian passengers fly with Air Canada is because of their frequent flyer program. A minimum of 15,000 miles brings a free ticket to any Air Canada short-haul destination. With El Al, the only logical free ticket for a Canadian is from Toronto to Tel Aviv, and as a result of El Al's complicated system, it takes much longer to attain. El Al's frequent flyer program is far more restrictive than Air Canada's, it isn't partners with other airlines and until recently, it charged flyers to be a member!

Addressing these two issues will bring El Al far more business from the Canadian Jewish community.

Remembering...

By LEON KRYM

More than 50 years have passed, yet hardly a day goes by without the memories, as I relive the horrors, nightmares and helplessness of the darkest time of my life.

Before reaching my 17th birthday, I found myself in the midst of the Holocaust. The extermination of Jews, young and old. Men, women and children.

Shortly after the occupation of Poland by the German army in 1939, all the Jews of Warsaw were ordered to leave their homes to be relocated into a small section of the city, some three to four square kilometres, which later came to be known as the Warsaw Ghetto.

My parents, my two brothers, my sister, Luba (the youngest), and I (the second oldest) were forced to leave our house in Czerniakow, a suburb of Warsaw, and move into the ghetto.

Our new home consisted of a single room on St. Jerska St., N., 30, which my father had rented. This room served the six of us as a bedroom, kitchen and everything else. We shared a toilet in the hallway with the other tenants on that floor. Yet we considered ourselves lucky that we were not living on the streets like so many others.

The ghetto eventually swelled to more than 500,000 people.

Expulsion and transportation to the death camps continued steadily, but vacant rooms were immediately filled with new arrivals. They would be brought in by trucks or marched in through the guarded gates, escorted by the Nazi SS men, often accompanied by vicious dogs.

Food became very scarce. Epidemics of typhus and other diseases broke out and people died on the streets. The first to die this way were the homeless and the abandoned children whose parents had been murdered or taken away to the death camps.

Dead bodies of children and adults, skeleton-like, lay in the streets, covered with old newspapers or rags, until they were picked up and disposed of somewhere by two-wheeled wagons criss-crossing the ghetto.

Two men would pull and service the wagon, one in front and one behind. They didn't look much better than the dead corpses piled one on top of the other on the cart.

Arms and legs hung out over the sides like broken branches of a dry tree. Sometimes a body would drop grotesquely from an overloaded cart along the way.

Life was very hard. Medication and other necessities were not allowed into the ghetto, which was surrounded by a tall brick wall and guarded by heavily armed gendarmes and other military units.

Big signs posted in front of the gates warned people not to enter, as the area was infected with typhus.

On a bright summer day in 1942, sometime in the afternoon — I remember because my mother was peeling potatoes for our one meal of the day — all hell suddenly broke loose as we heard military trucks pulling up in front of the apartment building. The news bad. Very bad.

The march to the Umschlagplatz. Below left, defenders of the ghetto are led to their execution.
[photos from The Holocaust, G. Schoenberner, Hurtig, 1969]

The day we feared the most, but refused to believe in or even think of, had finally arrived.

The building was surrounded by SS troops. We were trapped like animals in a cage. There was no escape. I knew from talking to people that the trucks would take us to the Umshlagplatz, a transit facility, and then to the railroad station, where we would be placed in sealed freight cars and taken to the concentration camp. It turned out to be the now infamous extermination camp, Treblinka.

The courtyard was full of German soldiers. From the third floor, we could hear their voices screaming. Jewish policemen assisting them translated their orders into Polish. The orders were simple. We were to get down to the courtyard immediately, no luggage, nothing at all. Anyone caught remaining in the building would be shot on the spot. We left our room as we were.

My older brother Abraham was not home, but my parents, my younger brother Yankel, my sister Luba and I walked down the stairs with all the other tenants of the apartment building.

Now the courtyard was crowded with people, some wearing heavy coats, despite the warm weather. Weeping mothers clutched their babies tightly in their arms. Terrified children held on to their parents in desperation. Screams could be heard from time to time. It was a horrible sight, an unforgettable scene.

One of the tenants – I remember his name was Mr. Lot – jumped to his death from the rooftop of the building to the pavement below. I guess he was better off.

As lines of people were forming to be led out to the trucks parked on the street, my father told me to get out of the line and show the German officer in front of us my worker's card. I had been employed in a factory that manufactured toothbrushes and razors, and I had been issued a work permit which identified me as a machine operator.

"Maybe you'll be saved." were the last words my father said to me.

I hesitated momentarily. I didn't want to be separated from my family, but time was running out. I stepped out of the line as my father told me and approached the officer with the card in my hand.

He stared at me briefly, then pointed his finger towards the entrance to the apartment building, motioning me to go back inside.

The message was clear. I was saved, thanks to my father.

As soon as I reached my third floor room, I was struck by the sight of the pot of unpeeled potatoes my mother had left on the stove. I cried bitterly, knowing that I would never see her or the others again. I never did.

The author in 1945.

That night, I cried myself to sleep in the room all alone. As my eyes cleared, I could see my parents' pictures on the wall above. My heart was bleeding. Yesterday I had a family. I had a home. We were all together. Suddenly I was alone, broken and tortured.

The next morning, I was back working in the factory. I can remember choking back the tears as I operated the toothbrush machine.

I told myself, "I must not cry, I must be strong and still produce my daily quota of toothbrushes as if nothing has happened."

Israel's relationship with the Diaspora

As communities across North America prepare to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary, it is appropriate to pause and take stock of the current state of their relationship with Israel. Common wisdom is that American Jewish support for Israel has weakened over the last two decades. Two phenomena are usually cited as evidence for this: the diminishing contributions to UJA and the reduced share of allocations to Israel as a percentage of total donations; and the vocal political disagreement with policies of the Israeli government from opponents on both left and right. But this analysis is overly facile and simplistic, while the reality is complex and nuanced.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

In fact, American Jewish attachment to Israel has not declined. Annual public opinion polls taken by the American Jewish Committee since 1983 show consistent, strong support for Israel among a majority of American Jews. This has persisted even in the face of stated disagreements with government policy, and even when it is accompanied by a shocking degree of ignorance about some basic facts, such as the date of the establishment of the state or of the Six Day War. What have changed are the motivations and forms of expression of this attachment. Just as Israeli society is at a crossroads in terms of its identity and sense of common purpose, so too is American Jewry.

In a changed Israeli reality, in the absence of one national, ideological agenda, a clear external threat and a simple, existential need for their support, American Jews ask themselves not "whether" to support, but "how" to support. This question is further complicated by several inherent frustrations and tensions in their perception and understanding of Israel.

First, how does a Jew living outside of Israel express his or her political views in the absence of the ability to vote – or should he or she be able to express such views? Perhaps more than any other, this question highlights the inherent contradiction in the familiar slogan, "We are one." By definition, American Jews are not full participants in the country's decision-making process, nor do they directly live with its consequences. Because of this, they have been expected to support the government's policies, which are identified with the interest of the state. When the policy changes – sometimes significantly – with the change of party in government, American Jewry is expected to adjust to the shift, literally overnight.

The second is the difficulty of understanding the complexity, diversity and nuances of Israeli life and politics. American Jews are exposed to the government's message, the loudest voices of opposition who spend time and money to garner support, and what CNN chooses to broadcast. But they don't speak Hebrew and they don't speak to ordinary Israelis.

The third tension stems from the different political culture internalized by the majority of American Jews. Today, they are Americans first in their political instincts and normative expectations of the relationship of the state to its citizens. They believe in the values of a secular democracy, in which religion is a private matter and in which citizenship is not linked to ethnicity. Over the last 50 years, Israel has defined itself, in practice, as an ethnic democracy in which there is no separation of state and religion and in which citizenship is closely linked to ethnicity and religion. For most American Jews, there is a dissonance between their natural, American liberalism and their Jewish connection to Israel.

The fourth tension stems from the disenchantment with the historic institutions of organized Jewish life – the "public sphere," to quote Prof. Steven Cohen, and the parallel strengthening of the "private sphere" – the family, the synagogue and more personalized forms of observance. Historically, support for Israel was expressed in the public sphere. As it has weakened, American Jews find it difficult to develop alternative connections to Israel from within the private sphere.

In this complex picture, it is, indeed, more difficult to "sell" Israel as the unifying symbol it was in the past. But I am not pessimistic. Rather, I believe we have to adjust our expectations to the complexity of the new reality. It may well be that the apparent Balkanization of Israeli society will be reflected in American Jewry, and that Jews will align more and more with those Israelis who best reflect their values. This is not necessarily bad. As individuals actively determine the nature of their involvement they will need to become more educated and engaged. These can be positive developments.

But the great challenge for American Jewry is virtually the same as that faced by Israelis. Will we still be able to speak of a shared destiny in spite of differences in politics and values? Will Israel continue to be a value that provides a focus for Jewish identity and participation, or will the slogan "support for Israel" become a forum for political disagreement and posturing? These are the existential questions for my generation of Israelis and Jews. Let's think about them as we celebrate 50 years of Israel reborn in our day.

Diaspora perspectives on Israel

Israel's ties to Diaspora Jewish communities remain strong and multi-dimensional. A 1990 survey showed that two-thirds of Canadian Jews have visited Israel, with 39 percent going twice or more, and that 70 percent talk about Israel. About 87 percent feel Israel is important to their being Jewish, and 85 percent think it would be a personal tragedy if Israel were destroyed. A full 42 percent consider themselves to be "Zionists" and 21 percent admit to having considered aliyah.

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Canadian Jews know a fair bit about Israel: 79 percent know the year of independence and 72 percent know the date of the Six Day War. All these figures are much higher than the numbers for American Jews. And they are much deeper ties than the ones Canadians have to other homelands.

Israel has had a major impact on the quality of American Jewish life. Israelis have played important roles as professionals in Jewish education, Jewish summer camps and Jewish organizations. More and more Jews are able to speak Hebrew. No Jewish simchah is complete without the band playing a medley of Israeli songs. Jewish teens are encouraged to spend summers – or longer – in Israel.

But there are several danger signs on the horizon as the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora evolves.

If assimilation continues in North America – as reflected in rates of mixed marriage – this can only weaken the ties with Israel. Similarly, as the generations pass, the ties of kinship will also weaken. Many of our relatives in Israel reflect families that were torn apart early in this century or after the war: a brother going to Israel, a sister going to Canada. The migration of Israelis to Canada, and of Canadians to Israel, can re-establish some of those ties, but not all.

Fifty years ago, Reform Jews and other liberal Jews were ambivalent about Zionism, Hebrew and Israel. Eventually that changed, spurred on by the Six Day War, as these movements embraced more of the tradition. But of late there may be an estrangement, caused not so much by Jewish nationalism as in the past, as by the dominance of Orthodoxy in Israeli Jewish religious life.

This is sometimes expressed by sentiments regarding Jerusalem that include statements such as, "I just don't feel comfortable in Jerusalem anymore." This divide is also heard more and more in Israel, among non-dati Jerusalemites. As a result, more and more Diaspora Jews are targeting their giving to specific Israeli institutions, some devoted to pluralism, education, health or social action, as opposed to giving CJA or UJA blank cheques. Liberal Jews do not want to support settlements on the West Bank or yeshivot.

And indeed it is liberal Jews who are most conflicted by the evolution of Israeli society. They recognize that Israel is a liberal democracy in form, albeit with major exceptions such as the role of Orthodox Judaism as the official religion. There is an elected multi-party Knesset, a vigorous free press and an independent judiciary. Yet some wonder whether the underlying political culture of the culture is firmly liberal democratic. The socialist traditions of Labor, the militant nationalism of Herut and then Likud, the political traditions of Sephardim from Morocco to Iraq, and the religious fervor of the Haredim, all have one thing in common. They are not rooted in the basic ethos of liberal democracy.

Israel has accomplished magnificent and indeed unparalleled things in her first half-century. But as in most countries, Israel has unfinished business on her agenda. Two key items would enhance the quality of Israeli society: First is the eventual weakening of the religion-state tie in Israel. This would not only strengthen Israeli-Diaspora relations, but might well be the best thing that ever happened for Judaism in Israel as well. Secondly, it is time to try to eliminate or reduce the second class status that is the lot of Israeli Arabs. This is more difficult, given the political context of the region. But it is possible. The more Israel embraces liberal democracy, the greater the potential ties to Jews in the West.

It happened in Munich

Just before Pesach, Metulla Mayor Yossi Goldberg and his wife Dalia, were in Toronto, where the mayor of Israel's northernmost city spoke about the projected withdrawal of Israeli troops from Southern Lebanon and the impact it would have both on his city and on the country at large.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

After the meeting, Goldberg was kind enough to hand me a booklet that I began to scrutinize after I got home. It is a memento that for me has strong historical overtones.

Entitled Musaf L'Haggadah Shel Pesach, it was, literally, an addition to the Passover Haggadah. It was created by Rabbi Abraham J. Klausner, who was then a chaplain with the U.S. armed forces in post-war Germany. The booklet was written and printed for a seder to take place in Munich, in the spring of 1946.

Written in three languages – Hebrew, Yiddish and English – it was meant first and foremost for the Soldiers of the Allied Occupation Force. Its first page has the following introductory text:

"Just beyond the sounds of the seder, in the wreckage of the city, the former slave sat in company with the tantalizing memories and celebrated his first Passover since the liberation. He fumbled his life-giving gift, trying as best he could to understand this miracle of freedom. It was not all that he had dreamed of. He was still imprisoned in the conflict which raged among those who could grant him complete liberty. This the khaki-clad sons of Israel felt and in their words, their feelings found expression.

"But they knew more. They knew that freedom could not be given to one people and withheld from another. They knew that freedom could not be qualified. Now, more than ever, they understood what God had meant when He said to Moses, 'They are my slaves and they dare not be enslaved to slaves.' These words now sounded a warning to the world at large, for in the slavery of a single human being the world would find itself enslaved."

The participants in the seder were soldiers and civilians, coming from all over.

The Haggadah begins its central recollection of the past with the words: "We were slaves to Pharaoh in Egypt." In the Munich edition of 1946, the text reads: "We were slaves to Hitler in Germany…"

After that, the Haggadah turns to the traditional text, but I was moved particularly deeply by its opening. Somehow, Pesach and the little book we read have a capacity of creating for us something that we ourselves can feel: the overarching power of Divine love for the people of Israel and for all who struggle to be truly free.

And it also brought to mind the seder I myself celebrated the year before, when the war was still raging. My division had taken Bonn and we looked for a place where we could celebrate. We found it at the university, and the Jewish soldiers assembled with great expectations. But no sooner had we started, than an orderly burst in: "Everyone to his post! We're crossing the Rhine." The Remagen Bridge had been conquered and the end of the war was in sight. We had no seder in 1945, but we had defeated the modern Pharaoh.

The Kirshner File

The silence of Canadian Protestant churches

Irving Abella and Harold Troper, in their landmark book None is Too Many, claimed that Canadian churches practised silence as Canada callously closed its doors to Jewish refugees during the 1930s and 1940s.

By Sheldon Kirshner

How true is this accusation? In How Silent were the Churches? Canadian Protestantism and the Jewish Plight During the Nazi Era (Wilfred Laurier University Press), Alan Davies and Marilyn Nefsky sift through the evidence and reach similar conclusions.

Davies, an ordained United Church minister, is a professor of religion at the University of Toronto, while Nefsky teaches sociology and religion at the University of Lethbridge.

Their book, a fair and balanced examination of Canada's Protestant sects, is based on official documents, sermons and letters.

The United Church, the largest Protestant denomination, deplored anti-Semitism in Germany, and its leaders attended rallies to protest Nazi outrages, particularly Kristallnacht.

But as a "religious community," the United Church was not only silent, but condoned conversionary efforts aimed at Jews. And one of its leading liberals, Claris Silcox, a champion of Jewish refugees, favored Jewish quotas in Canadian medical schools.

As for the Anglicans, Davies and Nefsky conclude that too many of its clergy harbored anti-Jewish ideas "far longer than either conscience or historical sensitivity should have allowed."

One such figure, Bishop A.C. Headlam, chair of the church's Council of Foreign Relations, condemned the "folly and violence" of Nazi attacks upon Jews. But in the same breath, he blamed Jews for "the violence of the Russian Communists" and accused Jewish freethinkers of using Judaism to defame Christianity.

Like their United Church brethren, Anglicans believed that conversion was the ultimate cure for anti-Semitism.

Anglican ministers and publications, notably The Canadian Churchman, condemned anti-Semitism and Kristallnacht. But when it came to immigration, the church preferred immigrants of British stock.

The Presbyterian church, of which Canada's prime minister, William Lyon Mackenzie King, was a member, does not get off lightly either. While it raised issues concerning Jews, it was less vocal and less involved than the United and Anglican churches.

At times, Presbyterian ministers could be remarkably insensitive. In the wake of Kristallnacht, John Inkster, the minister of Knox Presbyterian Church in Toronto, the largest congregation in the denomination, suggested that Jews were not blameless because they had failed to embrace Christianity.

As Nazi persecution of the Jews intensified, one of the church's most passionate voices speaking out against it on a regular basis was Morris Zeidman. Born in Czestochowa, Poland, he was a convert to Christianity whose mother, brother and sisters perished in Treblinka.

Turning to the Baptists, Davies and Nefsky claim that they were "no worse and no better" than other Canadian Protestants vis-a-vis Jews and Judaism. However, Watson Kirkconnell, the pre-eminent Baptist intellectual, adopted a strong pro-refugee position.

Canadian Lutherans, a good many of whom were of German and Scandinavian origin, "did not say much" as the long night of barbarity descended on Germany. As Davies and Nefsky bluntly put it: "Of the Holocaust one can find no mention in the...Lutheran church press, nor in any other ecclesiastical sources during the war years. Only silence."

Mennonites, who were largely of German and Russian descent, compiled a decidedly mixed record. In the main, they lambasted Nazi anti-Semitism as wrong and cruel, while complaining that it interfered with missionizing attempts to convert German Jews.

According to Davies and Nefsky, anti-Semitism contaminated segments of the Mennonite community. Anti-Jewish sentiments were kindled by the fascination with Hitler and Nazism, and by a belief that Jews were responsible for the ills of the world, especially Communism.

Quakers, in principle, opposed racism and nationalism. But strangely enough, they had a myopic attitude to Nazi anti-Semitism, at least before Kristallnacht.

Following Kristallnacht, there was a sharp upsurge of Quaker anti-Nazi fervor, and Quakers pressed for the admission of European refugee children – Jewish and Christian – to Canada.

The Quaker press, though, published little about Nazi atrocities, in part because Quakers preferred action to words, Davies and Nefsky add.

Summarizing their findings, they conclude that anti-Semitism formed "a subterranean current" in Canadian Protestantism, occasionally rising to the surface to nourish nativism.

Few Protestants in Canada, even in German communities, succumbed to Nazi-style anti-Semitism. By the same token, few understood the true dimensions of the National Socialist revolution in Germany.

Beyond that, Protestants never addressed the "profound negativity" toward Jews which lay at the core of their theology, say Davies and Nefsky.

"It took the Holocaust to awaken the Christian mind from its dogmatic slumbers, and only today, half a century later, are the effects of the awakening slowly becoming visible in the writings of Catholic and Protestant theologians, as well as in the sermonic and teaching materials used in the parishes and congregations."

Quite an indictment.

Internal exile

In the pantheon of modern Russian literature, Vasily Grossman is a dominant force. But a decade ago, he was still out of favor with the Communist authorities, a so-called "non-person" whose books were banned and reviled.

Grossman, who died in 1964, had the distinction of being the first writer, in any language, to publish stories about a catastrophic event which would be known as the Holocaust. The pieces, written in 1943, were called Ukraine Without Jews and The Old School Teacher. By the end of 1940s, however, neither these short stories, nor indeed Grossman, were deemed politically correct. Not till the late 1980s, when glasnost was in full swing, was he finally rehabilitated.

Grossman's career as novelist was hardly unique. Like numerous Jewish intellectuals, he was driven into internal exile. As an iconoclast in a country which valued conformity above all else, his fate was sealed when the Soviet regime decreed that he was a political dissident.

Grossman's fall from grace, as well as his achievements, are skillfully recounted by John and Carol Garrard in their sympathetic biography, The Bones of Berdichev (The Free Press). It is not by chance that they begin their narrative in Berdichev, a shtetl near Kiev where Grossman was born and where Sholem Aleichem once lived. There, with cold blood efficiency, the Nazis killed 30,000 Jews – including Grossman's mother – who comprised 50 percent of Berdichev's population.

The slaughter forced Grossman to confront his own Jewishness and the horror of the Holocaust.

Grossman, whose parents were non-practising Jews, was heavily influenced by his birthplace. In 1934, Literaturnya gazeta published his short story, In the Town of Berdichev. It launched him, a chemical engineer by training, on a short-lived literary career.

During World War II, when he was a correspondent for the newspapers Red Star and Pravda, his reputation grew. With the publication of his two short stories about the Final Solution, he was invited to contribute an article to The Black Book on the destruction of the Jews of Berdichev. But The Black Book, a collection of Holocaust survivors' accounts, was never published, at least during Josef Stalin's reign.

Grossman's association with The Black Book blighted his chances of advancement, while his novel, Life and Fate, a thinly-veiled critique of Communism which was not published until the Gorbachev era, made him into a virtual outcast in Soviet society. In 1960, the secret police confiscated Life and Fate. And during the 1970s, his books were removed from library shelves.

Life and Fate was published in Switzerland in 1980. But eight years would elapse before the novel saw the light of day in the Soviet Union itself. As for The Black Book, it was published only in 1993. Tragically, Grossman did not live long enough to savor these triumphs.

Medicine and biology

Western Medicine*, edited by Irvine Loudon (Oxford Press, $68.95).

This handsome and beautifully illustrated volume contains 20 essays by distinguished medical historians.

There is a considerable amount of information about Jews. An eye-opening essay reveals that Jews, "had a special claim to intellectual autonomy in the world of late medieval and Renaissance medicine, based largely on the familiarity of some, particularly in Spain, with the Arabic language and the Arabic medical tradition, which served as the core of learned European medicine. Mainly privately trained, in the late 13th and 14th centuries, Jews were regularly licensed in the cities of Italy, Spain and southern France, and often admitted into medical guilds."

However, as a result of a rising tide of anti-Semitism, Jews in many parts of Europe were accused of a conspiracy to spread plague during the Black Death, and a number of Jewish communities in Germany were massacred or exiled. Despite widespread prohibitions against Jews treating Christians, Jews were sometimes salaried as municipal doctors and employed as personal physicians by members of royalty and popes.

In the great London plague of 1665, close to 70,000 perished. Religious groups, Jews and social outcasts were blamed and punished for bringing pestilence on the world. In many places Jews were tortured and murdered and accused of poisoning Christian wells.

The copious illustrations form an integral part of each chapter and the book, as a whole, is a fascinating introduction to medicine in the Western world from its early beginning to our own time.

The Handicap Principle*, by Amotz & Avisag Zahavi (Oxford Press, $34.95).

Animals as diverse as ants, peacocks, gazelles, monkeys and dogs know how to exchange signals. Human beings also possess a variety of signal techniques – some of them unconscious or involuntary.

These signals, according to the Israeli authors of this provocative and controversial book, impose a cost or handicap on the signaller. For example, "when a gazelle sights a wolf and jumps high into the air several times before fleeing, it is signalling in a reliable way, that it is in tip-top condition and able to outrun the wolf. As a result the wolf wisely decides against a chase."

What is the gazelle's handicap? It comes from the time and energy it must expend in impressing the wolf, but in so doing, underscores the truthfulness of its signal.

This Handicap Principle is demonstrated when one animal helps or sacrifices for another. But by so doing, it signals its importance as a rival or partner within the animal group.

This principle helps to explain some of the questions that troubled Darwin: Why the extravagant animal mating rituals? Why the complex bird songs and calls? Why protracted animal dances?

The authors seem on less firm ground when they apply their principle to human social behavior. The taboo against incest, the ambivalent attitude towards strangers, the human body and its decorations, altruism and mutual behavior, all, suggest the authors, involve some form of signalling and the burden of handicap.

A man with a beard, for example, becomes vulnerable in a fight. His facial hair is a handicap but it signals confidence and other dominant aspects of male personality. Clothing is often confining and burdensome, but it signals or accentuates parts of the body that are distinctive or attractive.

This study in behavioral biology is accessible to the average reader. It expands our knowledge of animal life and of human behavior with a broad principle that enhances our sense of the wondrous order of nature.

Visiting our parents' past

By SHARON and AARON JESIN

It is difficult to summarize the 10 emotion filled days we spent with our parents last summer visiting their roots.

Our feelings varied from sadness and horror, when we saw the concentration camps and the mass graves, to gratitude, when we met the righteous gentiles who saved the family of one of our parents. The ghosts of our heritage still haunt such places as Radom, Krakow, Lublin, Vilna and Lodz, to name just a few.

Poland has very few Jewish residents but has nevertheless developed an industry that caters to people like us, who visit, or to others like our parents, who return to seek out something from their Jewish past.

Both Krakow and Warsaw have glatt kosher restaurants. In Krakow, the restaurant is located in a small square in which there is also a kosher-style night club restaurant, as well as the synagogue of the Rema. On the side of the square is a small monument in memory of a small group of murdered "Polish citizens." On both occasions that we visited the restaurant, we noted at least five large tour buses parked in this square.

We also encountered anti-Semitism, both blatant and subtle. For example, in Krakow, our tour guide told us that the lack of help offered to the Jews during the war was probably a result of the fact that the city "was owned by the Jews or the Church." In Radom, a hooligan harassed us and might have done us harm if another man had not come to our aid.

It was remarkable to see our parents' former homes and schools, our grandparents' workplaces and the places where synagogues once stood.

From Poland we went to Minsk, and its surrounding areas in Belarus, which was part of Poland before the war. The way of life in these towns, it appears, has remained unchanged for hundreds of years. The houses are nothing more than small shacks. Most do not have running water, though they do seem to have electricity.

Most of the people still get around by horse and buggy. They usually grow their own produce, raise their own livestock, gather their own eggs and milk, churn their own butter and use outhouses. We actually saw one woman using a loom to weave her own fabrics. Our parents said that when the towns were full of Jews, the style of life was much the same but seemed livelier and more spirited.

Unlike in Poland, the houses in which Jews had once lived were now mostly destroyed. We could still identify the Jewish cemeteries, however, and most of the towns also had a memorial to the Holocaust victims.

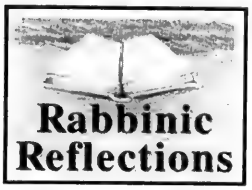
It was interesting to note the differences in the history of these towns compared to those in southern Poland. Whereas in Poland most of the Jews were deported to ghettos and subsequently to death camps, the Jews in these rural areas were mostly rounded up in the village centre and shot.

Despite this awful history, we found two Jewish sisters and their families still living in Dykshitze, the home town of one of our parents. We also found one Jewish family in the village of Glubok.

It is difficult to imagine the true horror of the concentration camps. In the same way, it is difficult to convey our true feelings at visiting them.

The experience was intensely personal, especially when a parent pointed out her barracks in Auschwitz, or when we visited Belzacz, the concentration camp in eastern Poland where many of our parents' relatives were murdered, or when we were able to identify the particular mass graves in Bergen Belsen where other family members were buried.

It was an important trip for us, but not one we will soon repeat.



Measure quality of time

By RABBI CHARLES H. FREUNDLICH

Time is the measure of life – and the Torah teaches us to measure time not in quantity but in quality.

Shabbat is not simply the seventh day; it is the experience of eternity, of Gan Eden. The Jubilee is not simply the 50th year; it is the experience of the family reborn.

Consider this paradox. Methuselah, according to the Bible, lived 969 years – longer than any other person. Yet what do we know of his life? Absolutely nothing. He left no enduring monuments. But Moses Maimonides lived only 67 years, and even the moment of his birth is recorded. He was the most productive religious figure in the history of Judaism and his works are still studied today throughout the world.

When scholars throughout the world celebrated Maimonides' 750th yahrzeit, the anniversary of his death in 1204, there was great debate. What were his greatest achievements?

Maimonides had written an important work on logic at the age of 19. By 23, he was completing his great commentary in Arabic on the Mishnah, the main code of Jewish law. At age 45, he had written his 14-volume code of Jewish law, the Mishneh Torah. And 10 years later at age 55, he completed the most admired philosophical work of the middle ages – The Guide For The Perplexed. After this work was translated into Latin, the great Catholic theologian Thomas Aquinas quoted it as authoritative.

Furthermore, during this time Maimonides wrote many medical treatises which were so admired that he was chosen by Saladin, the conqueror of Jerusalem, to be his personal physician.

And thus the scholars began debating the issue – what was Maimonides greatest contribution to the world?

The secular scholars pointed to his great Hebrew knowledge. The theologians and rabbis insisted that his Code Of Law was most important. Philosophers argued for his Guide For The Perplexed. And physicians chose his medical works.

Indeed they were all correct.

But Maimonides had a human side that they had forgotten.

In addition to his work for society, he was also a family man. He had a son, Abraham, who was also a great philosopher and rabbi and succeeded his father as the most authoritative rabbi of Egypt. The Maimonides dynasty continued in Egypt for 400 years.

If Maimonides had not had a son to study his works and perpetuate his teachings and traditions, who knows? Perhaps Maimonides and all his literary works would have been forgotten.

In the final analysis, great works and great ideas need a vehicle in which to be cultivated. The family enables religious life to flourish and time to be enjoyed.

The great simchahs of our life – the seder gathering, the bar mitzvah celebration and the wedding ceremony – unfold on the stage of the family. Family solidarity provides time and continuity with life and energy.

May we use our time and our fortune wisely to strengthen our families for our sake and for the sake of future generations.

Rabbi Freundlich is the spiritual leader of Beth Torah Congregation in Toronto.

Honoring forgotten heroes

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Knud Dyby, Varian Fry, Josef and Jozefa Paygert.

Their names are not as familiar as those of Oskar Schindler or Raoul Wallenberg but Dyby [http://www.rongreene.com/dyby.html], Fry [http://www.almondseed.com/vfry/] and the Paygerts [http://www.freep.com/news/local/qaward27.htm] are also heroes who risked their lives during the Holocaust to save Jews from Nazi oppression. Now, to coincide with Yom Hashoah, the Israeli government and Yad Vashem are honoring 50 delegates representing thousands of Righteous Gentiles [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/israel50/rightgen.html]. Many of their stories are told on the Jewish Highway.

Ironically, these heroes were often punished for their efforts by their own governments. In 1940, Chiune Sugihara was a Japanese consul posted in Lithuania. He ignored instructions from Tokyo and distributed thousands of visas to desperate Jews [http://www.remember.org/imagine/sugihara.html]. Sugihara was punished for his actions and returned to Japan in disgrace.

You can hear the incredible events described by his wife Yukiko Sugihara when she spoke to the Simon Wiesenthal Centre [http://www.audionet.com/events/swc/sugihara/]. JewishGen: The Home of Jewish Genealogy has established the Sugihara Database and has documented over 2,000 people rescued [http://www1.jewishgen.org/databases/sugihara.htm].

Aristedes de Sousa Mendes was the Portuguese consul general to France and a devout Catholic. In 1940, French Jews and Jewish refugees from all parts of Europe fled to France, where they found themselves trapped.

Against the orders of his government, de Sousa Mendes issued thousands of visas to allow them passage into Portugal. For his efforts, de Sousa Mendes was fired from the Portuguese foreign service.

He died poverty-stricken in 1954 [http://www.w-angle.galil.k12.il/red/landmark/holocaust/AMENDES.htm].

There are other Righteous Gentiles, thankfully far too many to acknowledge in an article such as this. For more biographies, I recommend the following sites: Righteous Gentiles from the PBS Shtetl site [http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shtetl/righteous], The Other Schindlers from U.S. News and World Report [http://www.usnews.com/usnews/news/othersc.htm] and A Teacher's Guide to the Holocaust-Rescuers and Resisters [http://fcit.coedu.usf.edu/holocaust/people/rescuer.htm].

But why did they do it? What motivates someone to risk his or her own life while others stand in silence?

According to Eva Fogelman, "From the earliest ages, rescuers were taught by their parents that people are inextricably linked to one another. No one person or group was better than any other." Fogelman is the daughter of a Holocaust survivor and founder of the Jewish Foundation for Christian Rescuers [http://www.ushmm.org/organizations/60.html]. Nechama Tec is a professor of sociology and a survivor of the Shoah. She found that the rescuers were "individualists" who pursued personal values.

Most were extremely modest people who had a long-term commitment to aiding the needy. They didn't look at Jews as dehumanized symbols but as people in need [http://www.tulane.edu/~so-inst/slguid7.html].

Perhaps Miep Gies explained the actions of Righteous Gentiles best. Gies is the woman who sheltered Anne Frank [http://orion.csuchico.edu/Archives/Volume35/Issue11/News/WsolwAFran.html]:

"Jan (my husband) and I had no choice. We did foresee many sleepless nights and a miserable life if we would refuse to help and that was not the kind of future we were looking forward to. Remorse can be worse than losing your life." [http://www.standard.net/kids_seek/in/SEEKKids/Potpourri/6.html].

According to the Mishna in Sanhedrin 4:5 [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/mishna/snhd04.html], "Whoever destroys a single life is as though he destroyed an entire universe; and whoever saves a single life is as though he saved an entire universe."

Rabbi Harold Lerner dies at 72

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Harold Lerner

TORONTO — Rabbi Harold Lerner, spiritual leader of the Pride of Israel Synagogue for almost 20 years until his retirement in 1992, died last week in Florida after a brief illness. He was 72.

Born and educated in Liverpool, England – where his father was also a rabbi – Rabbi Lerner came to Canada in 1961 to serve as a rabbi and educational director in Guelph. He was rabbi of Toronto's Beth Am Synagogue (which has since merged with Beth David) for eight years before joining the Pride of Israel in 1973.

"He was a mentsh, one of the most giving, caring human beings that ever walked this earth," said Cantor Chuck Weinberg, who worked with him for 13 years at the Pride of Israel and was a family friend.

Prior to immigrating, he served as a spiritual leader in England for 12 years. A former chaplain to the Royal Air Force and later to the United States Air Force, he served in England and Germany with the rank of major.

In Guelph, he wrote a newspaper column, and in Toronto was involved in a Jewish radio show on CFRB. He also served as chaplain to the Don Jail.

At a retirement dinner in his honor five years ago, Rabbi Lerner's daughter Eve Kreindler recalled him "running out at the last minute to visit someone in the hospital before Shabbes" and walking a long distance to the Baycrest Centre to officiate at a bar mitzvah so that an aged grandparent could participate. She also noted his work teaching bar mitzvah portions to children with behavioral problems and physical disabilities, whom he affectionately referred to as "my kids."

A past president of the Guelph Community Workers' Association and also of the Toronto Fairbank Rotary Club, Rabbi Lerner was active in B'nai Brith, Rotary Club, Masonic organizations and the Shrine.

He is a past president and past Canadian chair of the American Association of Rabbis. He was involved in interfaith work in Toronto and more recently in Florida, where he and his wife spent winters and where he served as rabbi of Temple Beth El in Bradenton following his retirement from Pride of Israel.

His philosophy was "taking the Jewish world and the secular world and making them compatible," said Kreindler. "He was a very progressive guy. He liked to keep up with the modern world and make Judaism relevant."

Rabbi Lerner leaves Yvette, his wife of 45 years; daughter Eve and son Simon, and two grandchildren.

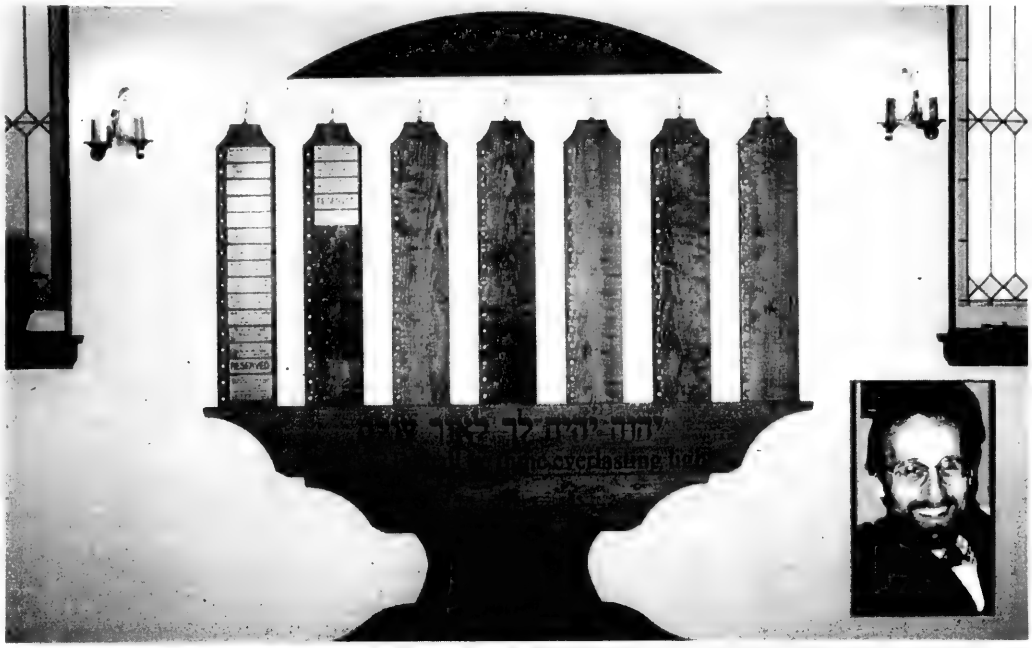
Menorah-shaped memorial created for shul

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter



Cabinet-maker Henry Rose (inset) crafted the menorah-shaped memorial wall plaque, above, for the Beach Hebrew Institute. The menorah is flanked by restored stained-glass windows in the historic building.

TORONTO — Cabinet maker Henry Rose sometimes finds it hard to part with a work he's spent hours and hours crafting.

Not so, however, in the case of the menorah-shaped memorial wall plaque the 41-year-old Toronto native designed last year for the Beach Hebrew Institute. "This was more of a fulfilment," he said. "It really only has function in a public place."

The place, in this case, is the synagogue on Kenilworth Avenue just south of Queen Street in Toronto's Beach area. The designated historical site boasts a sanctuary with an ornately carved dark wood ark, original light fixtures and wood benches, and faithfully restored, softly tinted stained glass windows.

In the 1890s, the building was a Baptist church facing Queen Street. It was used in the early part of this century as a warehouse, then a community centre.

When Jewish residents purchased it to use as an Orthodox synagogue in 1920, the building was moved so that worshippers would face east.

Although the synagogue never closed its doors, it was revitalized in the '70s when the area became a trendy place to live.

There are now 150 households counted in the synagogue's membership, said Arie Nerman, president. "Our shul appeals to a very eclectic congregation. It has a very warm feel. You can call us liberal Conservative. We're not officially affiliated."

Rose, who is the son of CJN reporter Ben Rose, took his four-year-old son to the egalitarian service on the second day of Rosh Hashanah.

"It was nice to look over and see [the menorah] with the lights on," he said.

The memorial, which Rose installed just before Rosh Hashanah, is his third synagogue project. He also made a portable Torah ark for Kehillat Ahavat Hesed and a cabinet for tallitot at Holy Blossom Temple.

It was by chance, however, that the Beach synagogue member who initiated and paid for the project, came to Rose last summer.

As the cabinetmaker tells it, the donor, who wishes to remain anonymous, "just wandered in" to Dupont Woodworking Co-op, which houses Rose's business and six others. Rose credits him for his generosity to the shul, which never had a memorial plaque, and the active role he took as the project evolved.

Rose came up with the final design after researching old menorahs and getting input from wood carver Siggi Buhler, who had worked with him on the Torah ark. Buhler was unable to take on this project, but the donor scouted out a company that engraves Jewish monuments to do the lettering.

To complete the project by the Rosh Hashanah deadline, Rose worked from 7 p.m. to 7 a.m. the night before he installed it. "I didn't do any work on this on Shabbes," he said, "because I didn't feel it was the right thing to do."

Neatly wired so that each branch can be removed and serviced on its own, the 7-foot by 7-foot oiled wood menorah, with its 102 small memorial lights, is mounted on the right wall as you enter the sanctuary.

Rose selected cherry, a favorite of his, for the project. He likes hand-rubbed finishes on woods "that have beautiful coloring and texture," reflecting factors such as the effects of wind and even location on a hill, on the tree's development.

Often when he's finishing the wood, Rose listens to jazz. (He's also a musician who plays in four ensembles including a Jewish wedding band.)

It's "magical" for him to combine his two art forms, he says, and "be in both worlds at the same time."

New Singer books

On a few occasions Singer made large withdrawals from his bank accounts, just in case. "I am always jittery about the Jews," he told Telushkin. "Vee can never really be sure. The truth is, I live in deadly fear of another Hitler. I must be able to have ready a little cash."

Ultimately, Singer did flee – to Miami Beach, which supposedly was for him the equivalent of the "faraway island." The comic irony was that the world avidly followed him into each of his hideaways, usually at his own invitation.

After the Nobel Prize turned his life into a media circus in 1978, he would book hotel rooms in Manhattan under assumed names to escape the mad crush. Yet he would often give out his secret locations and phone numbers freely to people eager to see him. He seemed to thrive on chaos; he also knew that each person holds at least one important story, and he was always an avid listener.

Telushkin reports her observations about Singer's meetings with celebrities such as Barbra Streisand, who visited him in 1982 in regard to her plan to write the screenplay, direct and star in a musical film version of his short story, Yentl.

Singer, who had sold the film rights to Yentl years earlier, thought the whole scheme egocentric and "meshige", and was disappointed to get nothing more than a kind note and a gift of chocolates, fruits and candies from Streisand. Singer later outlined his complaints regarding Streisand's project in a famous self-interview that appeared in the New York Times.

Singer was less outspoken when he met Menachem Begin in New York at the latter's request, shortly after winning the Nobel Prize. When he complained meekly to Israel's then-prime minister that the Jewish state had resurrected Hebrew while allowing Yiddish to slide into mortal decline, Begin reacted forcefully, pounding a fist on the glass table for emphasis.

"With Yiddish," Begin exclaimed, "we could have not created any navy; with Yiddish, we could have no army; with Yiddish, we could not defend ourselves with powerful jet planes; with Yiddish we would be nothing. We would be like animals!"

"Nu," Singer shrugged. "Since I am a vegetarian, for me to be like an animal is not such a terrible thing."

In marked contrast to the chaos that often seemed to swirl around him and which he often blamed on demons, Singer was completely punctilious about his work. He always completed his weekly quota for the Forward on time: he never missed a deadline nor took off sick.

His dealings with New Yorker editors Rachel MacKenzie and Charles McGrath are well chronicled in Master of Dreams. Singer adored Mackenzie's editing skills and her sensitivity to his work; yet that didn't stop him from proclaiming on The Dick Cavett Show that he did all his own English-language editing.

Though at times his ego knew no bounds, he could also be exceedingly shy and humble. After MacKenzie became ill, the New Yorker assigned McGrath to work with Singer. The Nobel laureate would often take new manuscripts or corrected galleys to the New Yorker building in person, accompanied by Telushkin, then wait nervously in a coffee shop while Telushkin went up to the magazine's offices. When, after five years, Telushkin finally admitted that Singer was sitting downstairs, McGrath "flew out of his office" and hurried down to meet him. "As we entered the coffee shop, Isaac jumped up with enthusiasm. He and Charles rushed toward one another and shook hands vigorously."

Through many such vignettes, Telushkin paints a loving, vivid and fascinating portrait, capturing Singer's many engaging qualities, his impish humor and wit, his catalogue of eccentricities and, sadly, the paranoia and helplessness that seemed to overtake him in his last few years when he became so mistrusting and ambivalent towards her that he called her "the curse of my old age."

Serious readers owe Telushkin a debt of gratitude for paying such particular attention to Singer's pure-minded philosophy of literature.

Singer believed that a writer was "an entertainer in the highest sense of the word" who had no business preaching or delivering timely social messages; and whose mission consisted entirely in telling a good story. (Once asked if he had a message for the leaders of the world, he replied: "I would tell them you don't need my message – there are Ten Commandments somewhere. You read them and if you can keep them, then you don't need my message. And I will continue to write stories without messages forever.")

While I thoroughly enjoyed the directness and depth of Master of Dreams, regretting only that Telushkin hadn't met Singer a few decades earlier, I had some qualms with the Hadda biography.

Hadda, an American psychoanalyst and Yiddishist, applies a psychoanalytic magnifying glass to Singer's life, examining and assessing such problematic areas as the sexual relationship of the author's parents.

Although the book presents many useful insights and biographical information, its analytical tone is unnerving at times, and one senses that Singer would have abhorred this somewhat clinical treatment of his life.

What one cause should you also support to guarantee the survival of all these causes into the next generation?

Jewish Day School Education.

Jewish ignorance and apathy in the next generation could cause the demise of these institutions, as well as many others which have characterized the life of our organized community. Without Jewish knowledge, our young people will not grow up to support the Jewish future.

Today, the most powerful influence upon the commitment of the next generation is a Jewish Day School education.

However, quality Jewish Day Schools require well-designed modern facilities, trained and experienced educators, sophisticated computers and laboratories, sports facilities, and many other features which make day schools a costly proposition. Also, day school tuition is unaffordable to many.

Throughout our history, the funding of Jewish schools was always a communal responsibility. It must now be the number one funding priority.

AVI CHAI, a private foundation established for the purpose of encouraging initiatives in Jewish education, urges you to consider being a funder of Jewish Day School education. For more information about opportunities in your area or across the country, please call: 1-800-300-1150.

Hospital receives $25,000 donation

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Audey Stanleigh Leukemia Research Foundation has donated $25,000 to the Hospital for Sick Children.

The money will be used to fund research into Schwachman Diamond Syndrome, a pancreatic disorder that, among other things, causes defective bone marrow functioning.

Since the body cannot produce neutrophil white cells, the person develops leukemia.

Dr. Yigal Dror, working on a special project headed by Dr. Melvin Freedman, is studying the development of neutrophils in the bone marrow itself, in the hope of finding a cure.

Audey Stanleigh, a popular Thornhill man, died in 1996 at the age of 21, from acute lymphocytic cancer. His family and friends have organized several very successful fundraising projects in his memory.

Before his death, he was active in supporting bone marrow drives, among them the international screening on behalf of Jay Feinberg.

The money for Dror and Freedman's research comes from last year's bowlathon and Hoops for Hope, a basketball tournament, as well as several smaller projects.

Audey's father, Jerome Stanleigh, said in a recent telephone interview that working on fundraising projects and donating money in his son's memory is a kind of healing for the family.

Cancer research serves that purpose particularly well, since its goal is that "young men and women won't have to go through such a test – and parents through such pain," Stanleigh said.

The day-long conference will take place May 3, from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., at Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz Congregation (147 Overbrook Pl., Downsview).

It will feature leading authorities on the relationship between Halachah and secular law. Speakers will include Rabbi Michael Broyde, a law professor at Emory University in the United States and director of the Beit Din of the Rabbinical Council of America; Marvin Huberman, a law professor at Toronto's Osgoode Hall Law School; and Rabbi Moshe Shulman of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Local lawyers will serve as session moderators.

The conference will be hosted by Beth Jacob and Kedma, an international university student organization based in Israel.

Shaping the Future

Building rapidly takes shape

Work is progressing on schedule and the new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders is quickly taking shape. The west end of the building is at third-storey height... and rising. The east section will start going up now that the former hospital building has been demolished.

The end of an era

On February 16, the wrecking crew began demolition of the original Jewish Home for the Aged and Baycrest Hospital to make way for the new 7-storey facility. A small group of staff members who worked in the old building gathered to commemorate the end of an era.

"We are taking down a building, but we are building better services on its foundation," said Sam Ruth, Baycrest's executive director from 1956 to 1980 who is now president emeritus of the Baycrest Centre Foundation.

"The idea in 1954 was to take care of older people in the Jewish community... those who were poor, without family or in need of a protective environment. Forty-four years later, we have grown to become an internationally-respected caring and curative organization in geriatric health care. We are taking what we've learned through our care, education and research programs and helping older people from all religious and ethnic groups."

Progress report

With the demolition complete, work has now begun on the foundation for the east section of the new Home. A third crane has been erected at the west side of Baycrest Hospital, Ben & Hilda Katz Building, and the framework will soon be visible.

New group helps Jews rediscover lost values

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An organization new to Toronto is aimed at helping Jews enmeshed with cults, involved with messianic groups or who have, as executive director Rena Schochet described it, "gone off the derech" of Jewish values.

Torah Life & Living is a branch of a Miami-based organization that has worked in the field for over a decade.

"Aaron Schwarzbaum [founder of Torah Life & Living] comes to Toronto every year to raise funds, and every time he comes, he is approached by people in trouble. Finally, there were so many cases that he decided we should have a branch here," Schochet explained.

The five cases she started out with in August, since it started, have grown to 50, with, she said, a considerable amount of success, considering the delicacy and complicated nature of the issues involved.

While she is a teacher, a facilitator for Jewish Family & Child Service (JF & CS) and a popular lecturer on religious subjects, she considers her main qualifications for this service to be more simple; she is a rebbitzen, who can act as "a wall with a listening ear." If she feels the person needs help from a professional, such as a social worker or psychiatrist, or from Jewish Vocational Services or JF & CS, for instance, she will make the appropriate referral.

"I simply deal in shalom bayit (peace in the home)," she said. "I help in building relationships, and make sure that the rest of the family is strong, so that the person in trouble can't play one off against the other."

Schochet told The CJN that she works first with whichever member of the family asks for help, and can be discrete about it, so as not to frighten off the person in trouble, and then has a meeting with the whole family.

"That way, we can pinpoint the person able to be most effective in getting the person out [of the cult or messianic group]."

As well, "we make the family safe, so they will have someplace to go." Realizing that many feel embarrassed by being taken in by cults or missionary groups, Schochet said that "we build a network of family and friends so they won't feel that way. We also build a network to get them jobs, and integrate them back into society so that they don't slip back."

"We sow seeds of ideas," she went on, "recalling warm memories, and letting them germinate slowly."

Another goal is to "bring Jews back to a stable Jewish identity – back to Yiddishkeit."

This is not necessarily back to Orthodoxy, she stressed. "If their roots are Conservative, for instance, that's fine, so long as those roots are stable."

Sometime in the future, she would like to establish support groups, for instance, for those with eating disorders, those with relatives in cults, those who have left cults, parents of children who have left Jewish observance, or "any other that is needed."

Another group she would like to target is people who are new to the community and have no particular roots here. "They need someone to listen."

The philosophy of Torah Life & Living is simple, according to Schochet: "We are the safety net under the cracks people fall through."

While there is no charge for her services, funds are needed to rent an office, for office expenses and for phone bills.

On June 7, there will be a fund-raising brunch. One of the honoree couples, she said, is Ehud and Sarah Estreicher.

For more information, or to contact Schochet, call 905-709-6183.

Canada-Israel Children's Centres marks 21 years

TORONTO — Canada-Israel Children's Centres will celebrate its 21st anniversary with a tribute evening at Inn on the Park, on June 2.

Guest speaker will be Leah Rabin, wife of the late Israeli prime minister.

To mark the occasion, the Children's Peace Prize will be awarded to 19 couples "for their outstanding support of Israeli children," a media release announced.

Those being honored are Tom and Marny Beck; Eddie and Edie Creed; Alex and Cecile Fisher; Lloyd and Gladys Fogler; Joe and Budgie Frieberg; Irving and Toddy Granovsky; Harold and Miriam Green; Ralph and Roz Halbert; Manny and Candice Kimel; Don and Gitte Kirsch; Murray and Marvelle Koffler; David and Colleen Kosoy; Murray and Pauline Menkes; Gerry and Nancy Pencer; Issy and Rosalie Sharp; Barry and Honey Sherman; Milton and Joyce Shier; Gilda Tanz and Marty Kelman; and Lionel and Sandy Waldman.

Master of ceremonies will be Monty Hall.

The 13 centres located throughout Israel provide programs which combine physical fitness, education and counselling. Special programs are offered for children who are hearing impaired, autistic or in wheelchairs.

The release says that the organization is "particularly proud of its success in the absorption and integration of Ethiopian and Russian immigrants, and an innovative peace program that brings Arab and Jewish children together."

Proceeds from this year's gala will establish a $1 million endowment fund, which will be used to support five special programs "focusing on Arab-Jewish coexistence, handicapped children, computer learning, science museum and art learning."

CORRECTION

In our Passover literary supplement (April 9), a typographical error was made in the sixth stanza of the poem Remembering Tel Aviv by Palomba Paves-Yashinsky. The stanza should read:

I remember Tel Aviv city of dark-haired soldiers boys and girls parading on Dizengoff radiant and strong chanting a song of peace

The CJN regrets the error.

Teens launch Web site with Holocaust links

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Researchers, schoolteachers and young people studying the Holocaust can thank two Toronto-area high school students for compiling one of the most useful Internet resources in the field.

Westmount Collegiate students Jeff Gottesman, 17, and Elliott Altberg, 16, are the masterminds behind a new addition to the World Wide Web that brings together between 40 and 50 Internet sites that touch on various aspects of the Holocaust. The two teens, who've known each other since they were in nursery school at Associated Hebrew Schools, developed the Web site as a school project for a course in Holocaust studies.

Instead of writing a ho-hum essay that would never see the light of day after its completion, they decided to produce something that would have more impact, Altberg said.

So far, their Web site, known as "Jeff and Elliott's Holocaust Page," has recorded more than 1,500 "hits," or visits from Internet surfers around the world.

"I really wanted to do something different for a school project. Our teacher, Stephen Bloom, told us to let everybody know what happened in the Holocaust, so no one would forget it," Altberg said.

Though neither of the two were particularly adept at computers — "neither one of us is a computer nerd," Gottesman said — once they received Bloom's approval for their unusual project, they delved into the subject with a passion.

Working at lunch time and after school with the school's Pentium-powered PC and a T1 modem that provided nearly instantaneous Internet connections, they devoted many hours to surfing the Web and locating relevant sites. "We put on the ones that we felt were really well done and could help people," Gottesman said.

After about a month, they were satisfied they had found enough interesting and informative sites. Then, with the help of a friend who taught them HTML, the computer language for Internet programming, they began to format the information they'd gathered.

A month-and-a-half later they were finished. The result is fairly simple in appearance, as Web sites go. Accessible at [www.geocities.com/athens/olympus/9581], it consists primarily of a list of various relevant sites with hyperlinks to them. Double click on the link and you'll find yourself at the new Web site.

Among the areas of study and linked sites are: the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum; Anne Frank; Yad Vashem; the Holocaust Gold Study; the Nazi persecution of homosexuals; a Holocaust Teacher Resource Centre; and a warning to surfers to beware of Holocaust denial sites.

Jeff and Elliott's Holocaust Page is dedicated to the memory of the six million Jews killed by the Nazis, and the millions of other victims. It is also dedicated to their grandparents, Herman and Carol Gottesman, Simcha and Shoshana Rotenberg, Helen and Lazer Altberg, Abraham and Sally Ernst, all of whom, except Carol Gottesman, are survivors. Their grandparents' experiences piqued their interest in the Holocaust and prompted them to take the course, they said.

"I've always been interested in the Holocaust," said Gottesman, who will participate in the March of the Living beginning on April 19. He will join other young people who will travel to Poland to see the Auschwitz death camp for themselves and follow that up with a visit to Israel.

Oh, and as for the school project. They got 98 or 99, they can't remember which, and ended up finishing the course with the top two marks.

Community Matters

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION TACKLES TOUGH ISSUES

Encouraging more young women to get involved with community is a top priority for the new President of Jewish Women's Federation.

"The only way to guarantee our community's future is to have the younger generation play a bigger part," says Janice Langer.

JWF, working in conjunction with more than 50 affiliated groups and organizations representing over 20,000 Jewish women, is one of the leading advocates for the rights of Jewish women in the Greater Toronto Area.

In 1997/98, under the presidency of Jill Reitman, JWF activities were motivated by the need to alleviate poverty and woman abuse. Last spring, JWF's Social and Political Action Program, chaired by Robin Kachuck and Miriam Rosenberg, under the leadership of JWF Vice President Susan Michaels, sponsored a public forum on woman abuse which drew an audience of more than 200. The candid and open discussion, moderated by TV host Jane Hawtin, provided prevention strategies and information on where women suffering abuse can get help.

This year's spring program Creating a Healthier Home Environment, featuring environmental health expert Nita Chaudhury, The Lung Association's Ian Morton, Dr. Lynn Marshall from Women's College Hospital, and Jewish educator Rachael Turkienicz, will be held Monday May 11. For more information, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 135.

JWF also organized a community quilting project and an art auction which raised $5,000 for Jewish Family and Child Service's Woman Abuse Program, and jointly sponsored the 5th annual Community Vigil for Agunot – women whose husbands refuse to grant a get (Jewish Divorce).

JWF Vice-Presidents Ellen Kachuck Rosenbluth (left) and Danita Dubinsky Aziza co-chair the Community Response Project.

The first comprehensive Speakers' Registry which includes the names of more than 250 qualified lecturers is now available, and JWF's Shalom Toronto program for newcomers welcomed over 100 arrivals to the community. Langer hopes to expand the program's reach by recruiting more young people to be Shalom Toronto greeters.

The fall series of the Timeless Treasures Women's Learning Series, organized with UJA Federation's Women's Campaign, was a huge success, attracting close to 100 women. The study series, now in its third year, explores biblical texts, by relating their lessons to the modern world.

'The program is outstanding," notes Frances Goldstein, who chairs Timeless Treasures with Susan Mogil." "Women love to learn and we're providing them with the opportunity to share their experiences with others."

It was a busy year for JWF's Community Response Project (CRP), headed by Danita Dubinsky Aziza and Ellen Kachuk Rosenbluth. CRP coordinated ongoing clothing drives with several Jewish day schools through their parents associations, providing thousands of new and used items to Just A Second, the second hand clothing store operated by Jewish Family and Child Service. CRP will be initiating the Simcha Basket program, enabling individuals to donate their party table centerpieces, made up of non-perishable food products, to the needy.

In April and May, JWF is co-sponsoring the Healthy Living Series, together with the Bathurst Jewish Centre, and Mount Sinai Hospital. The next of three lectures will explore osteoporosis, on May 4. For more information call (416) 586-8338.

WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN CULTIVATES CONNECTION

Hundreds of women are leading by example so that others will share their commitment to helping people in need, through UJA Federation.

Personal relationships between veteran volunteers and new recruits have a lot to do with the achievements of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign, which raises nearly $4 million annually from more than 7,000 donors.

"Our mentoring teams have been one of the success stories of Women's Campaign," said past chair Agi Mandel, who was recently succeeded by Judy Engel. "The telethon participation level of these teams has simply been outstanding," Mandel adds.

Engel, who became involved with UJA Federation shortly after moving to Toronto from Montreal, says she hopes her leadership example will "touch someone the way others touched me."

Claudette Edghill said her mentoring experience was so "beautiful" that she looks forward to becoming a mentoring team leader herself for the 1999 Campaign. "I now have the opportunity to encourage others to become more involved just like I was."

The Women's Campaign also enjoyed success in bringing more than 350 new supporters on board last year and expanding its outreach efforts, through programs for young couples and women of all ages. The Create a New Reality leadership development day held at Above and Beyond, the Centre for Adventurous Learning, attracted more than 30 women.

"Even though many women in our community are full-time workers and mothers, we are still making time for community," notes Mandel.

Engel, the incoming Chair, says the upcoming campaign, with a new three year vision, will help more than 22,000 community members living in poverty. "We have to make people aware of the plight of the poor so that we can find funding for increased services."

Ontario Place Hosts Israel Festival

Some 1300 children representing more than 18 Jewish day and supplementary schools, affiliated with UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, will share the stage on May 24 in a giant, musical Salute to Israel at 50.

It's all part of the Israel at 50 Festival at Ontario Place, Sunday, May 24, 12 – 5 pm, following the UJA Federation Israel 50 Fun Walk from City Hall. Admission to the Festival is free for all Walk participants who raise at least $25 in sponsorships. In fact, walkers will receive free Festival admission tickets for every $25 they raise (up to a maximum of four). Non-walkers are welcome as well, for just $10 a person.

Artistic director Shula Saltzman says she couldn't believe how many students wanted to join the troupe, sponsored by the BJE in conjunction with the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Each year, the BJE sponsors a Zimriya song festival and a Rikudiya dance recital, that attract 600 young performers. "This year we hoped to get as many students involved as possible, and the response has been amazing," explains Joyce Levine , the BJE's director of Interschool Programming.

Twenty choirs and 16 dance groups will perform throughout the two-hour show, at the Molson Ampitheatre from 2:00 pm – 4:00 pm. The performers will incorporate Jewish, Israeli, Chassidic, Russian and contemporary music and dance, characterizing the different phases of immigration to Israel.

Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto high schools students will also perform drama skits, written by Gary Levine and Sam Kapustin, and a flag presentation by students from Uplanat Orot and Netivot Hatorah will open the show. Teme Kernerman is choreographing the dance segments and Nella Koren is in charge of the choirs.

Other Festival performers in different theatres include Gypsy Jive Klezmer Band, Ahuva with the Toronto Klezmer band, Limore Twena and Maytal Golan, Sing-a-long Randy and the Tree Top Kids. The performances will complement other unique attractions such as a Time Tunnel exhibit, transporting visitors through Israel's history.

LET'S STEP TOGETHER
UJA FEDERATION

Talking the talk about walking the walk....

If you haven't received your UJA Federation Israel 50 Fun Walk sponsorship kit yet, you can be sure it's coming soon. That's because the largest recruitment drive in the Walk's history is underway.

Scores of volunteers are making their way into dozens of schools, community centres, youth groups, synagogues and other Jewish organizations across the city to bring thousands of community members to the Walk, Sunday, May 24, from City Hall to Ontario Place.

"We want to get the word out to everyone," explains Arlyn Zimmerman, who is chairing this year's walk recruitment with Naomi Lasky. "We've never had so many excited partners to help us along," adds Lasky.

A video, produced by Corey Mandell and D.M.S. Video Productions is being shown this week at 30 Jewish day and supplementary schools to thousands of students, many of whom will carry their own colourful banners on the Walk.

Adults are also encouraged to collect sponsors to help raise money for Jews in need. Last year the Walk raised close to $150,000.

Registration for the Israel 50 Fun Walk begins at 9:15 am, rain or shine, at Nathan Phillips Square. The Walk continues on a downtown route all the way to Ontario Place where the Israel at 50 Festival will be held from 12 – 5 pm.

If you would like to pick up an Israel 50 Fun Walk sponsorship kit, which includes a list of subway stations where you can park for free, call (416) 631-5700. If you hand in a minimum sponsorship of $25 before Friday, May 15, you will receive a free Roots Fun Walk T-shirt.

CJC region organizes PD day for teachers

Mat Peters of the Kitchener Waterloo Day School and Eileen Krevetsky of Beth Jacob Talmud Torah in Kitchener were among the Ontario Jewish teachers attending a PD Day in Toronto.

TORONTO — Jewish teachers in Ontario small communities had a recent opportunity to meet with colleagues working in other provincial centres, at a professional development day (PD) organized by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario Region's educational department.

The full-day program took place at Lipa Green Building for Jewish Communal Services.

Deborah Winters, a Grade 3 teacher and school secretary at Hamilton's Temple Anshe Shalom, called the program "an invaluable experience in enabling me to further my ability to teach school."

The temple operates a supplementary school with 140 students from pre-kindergarten to Grade 10.

Winters, who brought home for her class a Pesach board game and Wheel of Fortune-type educational aid to teach brachot, also enjoyed the opportunity to talk to her fellow teachers.

She was also pleased to learn about CJC projects such as the High School Outreach and Family Education programs, available to Jews living in Ontario small communities .

Winters says she hopes that Congress will organize future PD days on a Sunday to give an opportunity for greater attendance by part-time teachers.

Shula Saltzman, CJC's senior education consultant, said that another PD day is being planned for the fall. She said that she had organized the day to give teachers the opportunity to utilize resources that they do not have access to in their home communities, and to allow them to share ideas and experiences with others in similar circumstances.

Eric Petersiel, director of education for Shaarei Beth El in Oakville, found his day highlighted "by the chance to get first-hand exposure to some educational aids that I might purchase for my school. I got to take a look at 15 CD-ROMs, only one of which we will be able to afford." The school at Shaarei Beth-El has 130 students, aged 4 to 16, with a staff of 14 teachers.

Winnipeg grade 8 students to visit Holocaust Museum

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Thanks to the Asper Foundation, Grade 8 students at Simkin Middle School, are travelling to Washington on May 17 to see the Holocaust Museum.

The Asper Foundation, created by media mogul I.H. Asper in 1983, promotes a wide range of charitable activities within the Jewish community and the community at large.

Gail Asper, who spoke on behalf of the foundation said, "Dad has been talking about a trip like this ever since the Holocaust Museum opened.

"The museum had a strong impact on him. He thought it would be fabulous if others, especially teens, could share his experience.

"We know how difficult it is for a school to afford to give students this kind of experience. Sponsoring this trip is one of his ways of celebrating the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel."

'Very exciting'

"This is very exciting," says Shelley Hasinoff, principal of Simkin Middle School. "It is more than just a trip to another city. We have been able to create a curriculum around the trip as part of our Holocaust education program."

The students are required to provide $100 each for the trip – the Asper Foundation is paying $93,000 – and put in five hours of chesed (volunteer work).

On the four-day trip, students will visit the Smithsonian museums and the Israeli and Canadian embassies, take a walking tour of Washington, and possibly attend a Baltimore Orioles game.

They will be required to create a portfolio about their experiences which they will share with their parents, the Asper family and other students.

While this is a one-time project, the Asper family hopes that there will be support in the community for similar trips in the future. "A visit to the museum is a dramatic experience which [people] remember for the rest of [their] lives," Gail Asper says.

Yiddish committee hopes to promote language at CJC Plenary Assembly

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's Committee for Yiddish would like to see the Yiddish sessions of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) 25th Plenary Assembly here publicized across Canada.

That was one of three resolutions passed at the committee's recent annual meeting at the Bnay Abraham Synagogue in north Winnipeg. The second major resolution was that there should be a North American conference of Yiddish speakers.

"We thought, for example, that Yiddish in San Francisco was dead," said Noach Witman, Winnipeg's best known Yiddishist. "Now we have heard that there are quite a number of Yiddish speakers in towns around San Francisco."

The committee also resolved to continue promoting Yiddish in Winnipeg.

Witman reported that 55 people attended this year's annual meeting, including representatives from the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, the Yiddish-speaking H. Leivick B'nai Brith Lodge and the WJCC, and the president of the reborn Jewish Public Library and Roz Usiskin, the president of the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada and a member of the Yiddishist United Jewish Peoples Order.

Over the past year, Yiddishists have gathered weekly at the Gwen Secter Centre. There was also a lacht nacht (laugh night) at the Asper Jewish Community Campus that attracted 125 people. On April 20, the Committee for Yiddish celebrated its annual Third Seder with a concert by the Yiddish Choir led by Aviva Katz.

Despite having recently spent nine weeks in the hospital and having celebrated his 94th birthday on April 15, the indefatigable Witman continues to be the underpinning for most of the Yiddish activities in Winnipeg. He also writes his weekly Yiddish column in the Jewish Post and News, broadcasts his weekly radio show and has resumed his television show. He continues to sing, tell jokes and read his poems at Yiddish gatherings.

Witman said he is looking forward to the CJC Plenary to be held May 24 to 26. He has missed very few of them over the past 68 years.

Everything is truly relative

By BLAKE LAMBERT
Correspondent

Rule number 1 to a southerner, Jewish or otherwise: When you head north, everything is relative. Winter weather may be intolerable in Yellowknife, where the temperatures can hover around -40 for a couple of weeks, but that's nothing compared to Iqaluit, where -40 with an Arctic wind rips through the most durable of parkas like a scythe.

Using the same logic, one Jew in the Northwest Territories can practically resemble a synagogue, including a congregation. After all, you can probably count all of us on two hands and still have room for a thumb war.

I learned this lesson of religious relativity explicitly when I first came north to Iqaluit last November. It was a Thursday, my third day of work with CBC Eastern Arctic, and I was determined to start producing stories for the morning show.

I decided that a conference at the local hall dealing with the future of justice in Nunavut would be as good a place as any to produce my first "northern" story. (On April 1, 1999, Nunavut will become a government jurisdiction of Canada, similar to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.)

Fortunately, after I had wrangled the necessary gear, one of my Inuit colleagues had reserved the always-popular CBC truck and offered me a ride.

Simionie Akavak, the host of the Inuktitut portion of Qulliq (CBC's morning show for the Eastern Arctic), was going to interview some people about a new construction development.

As we drove, we started talking the way most people do who don't know much about each other. Where are you from? How do you like it up here? The usual cliches.

Then Simionie asked me about Christmas. It was a hardly shocking question when you consider the time of year, but an inquiry nonetheless that launched me into an elaborate routine of mental gymnastics.

Not having known many Inuks in the course of my life, I wasn't exactly sure what to say. After all, I didn't think there was a massive drive afoot to foster better relations between Inuit and Jews, since we tend not to move in the same circles, Arctic or otherwise.

'You're the first Jew I've ever met'

Harking back to our primary northern rule, in some ways, Iqaluit was the big city to Simionie and his family. He grew up in the community of Kimmirut, previously known as Lake Harbour, with a population of fewer than 500 people, most of them Inuit.

Nevertheless, I told Simionie the truth: I don't celebrate Christmas because I'm Jewish. His reaction was somewhat unexpected in that he didn't grill me about what the heck a Jew was doing in Iqaluit.

Instead, he expressed his admiration for the history of the Jewish people, how we've struggled for centuries, but managed to stick together. Then he told me, "You're the first Jew I've ever met."

Outwardly, I responded in a similar style, "Well Simionie, you're the first Inuk I've ever met."

Our conversation continued for a few more minutes, but like all conversations in cars, it ended abruptly. I thanked him for the ride and went off in search of a story, while he did the same.

Afterwards, Simionie never forgot that I was Jewish. Whether it was a couple of questions he asked me once or twice about Chanukah or the fact he remembered that I didn't celebrate Christmas, I always appreciated his simple but thoughtful gestures.

In the cosmic fabric of the universe, small conversations like ours don't amount to much. But for one meagre moment in time, an Inuk and a Jew sat next to one another, trying to gain a better understanding of each other's world. With the impending creation of Nunavut next April and an excitement from Inuit that Jews can only understand by comparing it to the creation of Israel, that's not such a bad thing.

Ten years from now, I'm hoping it's moments like these I'll remember about the north, the ones that seem almost profound mixed in with the dizzying array of stories and experiences that are equal parts frustration and fascination. After all, this is the north and everything is truly relative.

Kronicks chronicle their family history in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — When Liz and Skip Kronick's first child was born, she was given a baby book with a family tree inside.

Most people would have been content to list a few names and dates, but Liz just kept adding and adding. "I just couldn't stop," she says.

The pictorial history of five generations now forms an entire wall in the Kronicks' dining room.

Kronick marvels at how much she has learned, after collecting artifacts, photographs and stories. "These were people who came from Europe at the turn of the century looking for a better life. They were sponsored by relatives and they arrived with nothing. They married here, raised their families here, contributed to their community, and then died here. I want my children to know their heritage and who these people were."

Kronick's late grandfather, Harry Rosenes, served as councillor and mayor of Deschenes, Quebec from 1932 to 1946. There is a street named after him in the village. She has his calling card, Harry Rosenes, Justice of the Peace, as well as a letter he received from William Lyon MacKenzie King.

On the back of each photograph is a clear plastic envelope with a description of the picture. In addition, Kronick has photographed every cemetery stone and listed detailed directions to the grave site.

Kronick says, "I have climbed walls, taken a knife and a brush to clear away grass and debris, and taken pictures in four cemeteries."

While trying to locate her grandfather's brother, Soll Rosenes, Kronick learned that he had died in April, 1917 during WWI, was buried and then re-interred in Bois Carre in the north of France. Her research led her to the Canadian War Commission where she was surprised to find that for a $12 fee and a relatively short wait she could obtain a picture of his gravestone.

"It is heartwarming," says Kronick, "to see how beautifully the Canadian War Commission cares for these graves."

When she later located a first cousin of her father living in Dallas, Texas, Kronick contacted him. The Dallas family later visited the Kronicks and got to know more of their family history.

The family tree is built around the Kronicks' two daughters, Abby and Alex, whose pictures are in the centre. The Rosenes relatives are on the left, the Kronicks on the right and, except for the centre photos, all of the pictures are black and white, dating back to sepia photographs from 1866. There are photographs of every family member for all five generations except for four great-great-grandparents who never left Europe and perhaps were never photographed.

In addition to the photographs (and there are 300 more in Kronick's filing cabinet), the collection contains ketubot dating back to 1909, wedding and bar mitzvah invitations, and bits and pieces of clothing and jewellery.

Kronick urges everyone to chronicle their family history. "Even if you don't know where to start, at least start with your parents," she advises. "They will remember their parents and you will then be the third generation. It's a wonderful gift."

U of T political science student finishes first in debating contest

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although he's always enjoyed a good argument, national debating award-winner Jacob Glick, 21, says a good arguer doesn't necessarily make a good debater.

"Sometimes an arguer doesn't have the patience to sit through another person's speech," said the third-year political science student in an interview at the University of Toronto's Hart House, where he is a member of the debating club.

Born in Toronto and raised in Waterloo, Glick is a veteran of two international competitions – this winter in Athens and the previous year in Stellenbosch, outside Capetown, South Africa.

Last month, he and his debating partner, first-year dental student Grant Yiu, placed first in the Canadian National Debating Championship held in Edmonton. The other Hart House team (Mike Shore and Aidan Johnson) placed third.

Posing with the hefty silver trophy that Hart House has won four times in the past eight years, Glick noted that all the teams had one Jewish partner and one non-Jewish partner.

Glick attributes his love of debating in large part to his upbringing. "I don't know if it has to do with the fact that I'm Jewish, or that my parents are from New York [they've been here since graduate school], or a combination. We certainly have a verbally spirited household. Not having any siblings, I was never talked to like a little kid. I started talking very young, and my dad likes to say I never stopped."

Jacob's father Bernie Glick is a professor of molecular biology at the University of Waterloo and his mother, Marcia, is an accountant.

"We're an argumentative bunch," said Jacob. "We argue about all the things you're not supposed to argue about – politics, religion, where to go for dinner."

When Jacob first joined the debating club as a Grade 10 student at Kitchener-Waterloo Collegiate and Vocational School, he found it wasn't as much fun as he'd expected.

"I had to do prepared debates," he recalls. "I like speaking off the cuff. I like the extemporaneous style."

He stuck it out with encouragement from his coach, who told him he had the potential to be a successful debater. He said his first debate was "atrocious, but I got better."

At the competition in Edmonton, Glick and Yiu participated in eight debates, proceeding from preliminary rounds to quarter-finals, semi-finals and finals. They competed against 42 teams from eight provinces.

The winning debate concerned freezing the assets of the families of kidnapping victims so that they would not be able to pay ransom – a subject Glick had never considered.

Current events

As a member of the opposing team, he had to prepare an eight-minute rebuttal based on the first speaker's five-minute argument.

"It's challenging. It's interesting. It forces you to think and analyse, to be logical," said Glick.

To keep in good form, it's essential for a debater to stay up on current events, Glick said. "A subscription to the Economist is key to keep up on world politics." His other interests include baseball, computers and technology.

A benefit of debating, said Glick, is that he has learned to focus his thoughts – a boon in writing essays and opinion pieces for campus newspapers, and in public speaking, which he does as a member of the university's governing council. "The skills I get from debating help me argue clearly and passionately for things I believe in."

Dear Grace,

This letter is to formally express my gratitude to you and your staff at The Canadian Jewish News. As you know, I have been consistently advertising in the CJN for the past five years, with both display and classified ads. The response to these ads has always been great, and seeing, as we at The Jewish Singles Registry track our advertising response rate, I can honestly say that your paper is one of the best mediums out there for reaching the Jewish community.

In 1990 we started out in a small office, with big hopes. In time we have grown into the largest Jewish dating service in Toronto. The Canadian Jewish News has played an important part in helping us reach our goals. Many people come up to me and tell me how they continue to read about the progress of our service in the CJN, and check out our classified ads on a weekly basis; be it for our web site address, or to find out what Jewish singles events will be happening throughout Toronto. We also featured one of our engaged couples in our advertorials for about a year, and people would come up to them on the street and recognize them from their picture being in the CJN. It is this kind of positive feedback, that assures us, that advertising in The Canadian Jewish News is money well spent.

Thanks again for the great service...

Sincerely,

Rob Singer

"Just Between Us"

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

הצפון היפה:
מסעותי הביאו אותי לסו- סנט מרי שבצפון אונטריו. בטורונטו כבר היו 20 מעלות ושם עדיין שלג עבה. זוהי קהילה של ב- 80 אלף איש, מן העתיקות בקנדה, שהתחילה בכפר קטן לפני כמאתיים חמישים שנה. שאלתי את אחד ממארחי מה הם עושים שם, לאן הם הולכים כשרוצים תיאטרון או קונצרט, הוא הביט עלי בתימהון ואמר: מה קרה לך, יש פה יותר תיאטרון לגולגולת מכל עיר אחרת בקנדה. רובו תיאטרון מקומי. ויש תזמורת סמפונית ויש כל דבר אחר. הינה, הערב אנחנו יוצאים לקונצרט. דוגמא מרגשת לאיך קהילה כזו עובדת הוא "תיאטרון המעגל המשפחתי" שקיים כבר כשש שנים והופיע אלפי פעמים בכעשר הצגות שונות שעוסקות באלימות במשפחה, גלוי עריות, סמים, או כל בעיה אחרת. אחרי ההצגה משתתף הקהל בדיון עם השחקנים. ההצגה שראיתי אני עסקה באלכוהוליזם בזמן ההריון והפגיעה בעובר. הסיפור סופר על ידי הילד הפגוע. הצגה מרגשת, כמו כל הרעיון כולו, שכמו כל הרעיונות מסוג זה התחיל עם משוגע לדבר שהוא גם נביא: מורה לדרמה בשם מייקל הנסי. מה שיפה הוא שהממשלה מממנת את העבודה שלו. אני מתכוון להביא אותם לטורונטו ואזמין אתכם לבוא. אבל שיישאר בינינו.

מה אפשר להגיד על עמוס עוז ולא נאמר! מאז ספר הסיפורים הראשון שלו "ארצות התן" בשנות הששים, שהיכה בתדהמה את ציבור קוראי הספרים במקוריות שלו, הפך עוז למרכז הקונצנזוס. כמעט כל ספר שלו הפך לקריאת חובה ונמכר היטב. הכתיבה הנקיה, החכמה, שאיננה נסחפת לסנסאציות או רגשנות יתר גרמה לו גם להצליח יותר מכל סופר ישראלי בתרגומים לשפות זרות. אם אתם רוצים לשמח חבר קנדי במשהו מהתרבות שלכם (טוב, לא שירי "הבה נגילה" שממש לא מעניינים את מי שלא קשור לתרבות שלנו), תיכנסו לחנות ספרים בכל עיר גדולה ותמצאו ספרים מתורגמים לאנגלית של עמוס עוז. עשיתי את זה מספר פעמים והתוצאות היו מצויינות.

מחשבה קטנה:
התקשורת הקנדית חוגגת את נצחונו של הבמאי הקנדי, קמרון באוסקר על "טיטאניק". סיפרו שהוא מניאגרה אונטריו.רק אחרי הטקס, לתמהוני, התברר לי שהוריו עברו לקליפורניה כשהיה ילד צעיר, לפני הרבה הרבה שנים, ומאז הוא אמריקני לכל דבר. איזה פירגון קנדי! לא יכולתי שלא להרהר שאילו היה זוכה באוסקר איש שעזב את ישראל עם הוריו בגיל עשר ומאז הוא אמריקני לכל דבר, קרוב לודאי שהתקשורת הישראלית היתה מכנה אותו "בן הישראלים" או "בן היורדים", וללא ספק שלא היה נקרא ישראלי. בניגוד לישראלים, שעדיין מתארים הגירה לארץ אחרת במושגים של בגידה ונטישה, הקנדים נטולים כמעט לחלוטין תחושת לאומנות . יד על הלב, אינני כותב את הדברים כדי להביע דיעה לטוב או לרע, רק לציין עובדות. מעניין אותי מה דעתכם בעניין. כתבו לפקס: 416-633-6557

Exhibit will benefit York U's scholarship fund

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A recent exhibition of pastels and oils by York University visual arts student Amir Pichhadze revealed a telling transition from the style of his at-home study with his Soviet trained artist father Jacob, to the scope fostered by his current professors.

An enthusiastic crowd at the opening reception in the Samuel J. Zacks Gallery at Stong College heard York Visual Arts Department chair Ken Carpenter exclaim, "In the history of the Visual Arts Department we have not previously had an occasion like this where a student has shown the particular kind of ability that Amir has shown. We are very proud of Amir!"

Part of the proceeds from the sale of the artworks, which include originals, limited edition reproductions and posters, will go to a York University scholarship fund. The majority of the works are abstracts, but there are some florals and allegorical pieces.

Although Pichhadze is studying and exploring in the university milieu, he relies very much on the "secret" pastel technique taught to him by Jacob, a master of the medium, who continues to pass down his specific knowledge only from father to son.

Amir's abstracts have burst onto the scene in bold form, yet they are controlled by the finely honed colors which he is making his own.

He has already proven himself capable of fine representational art. Now he is reaching deep inside for the inspiration to express himself in abstractions.

Often exuberant, they demand involvement.

What do they mean? For Amir, they are personal. For the viewer, they are whatever he or she sees and feels.

This, Amir maintains, is the essence of abstract. "It's the play of color and shape. It's not supposed to represent anything. Color has a power of its own. You don't have to represent the natural world. Color and composition have enough in themselves. With representational, it's there for you but in abstract you shouldn't expect to have everything there. You have to get over relying on visual recognition; then you'll be able to extract from color and composition the power to invoke an emotion."

For this reason he uses such titles as Abstraction #4 – reds, oranges, yellows, zooming lines projecting motion; Abstract #6 – warm colors, flowing shapes; Portrait #1 – abstracted yet almost cubic form, sombre greens, turquoise.

Pichhadze reaches deep inside for inspiration.

An exception is Old City, which is Jerusalem simplified to abstraction.

Pichhadze touches the viewer, and as he carries on with his studies, he is determined to probe and grow. "I could not continue as an artist if I were not always learning," he insists.

Cohen receives arms 'shopping list'

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The government gave U.S. Secretary of Defence William Cohen a shopping list of weapons and other modernization needs for the IDF, when he was here on a day-long visit.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai held strategic consultations with Cohen at his Tel Aviv office, where the secretary was received with full military honors.

Defence officials said the working meeting focused on Israel's long-term modernization plans. High on the agenda was American funding for the acquisition of a third Arrow anti-ballistic missile battery in light of the growing missile threat in the region.

Cohen had already promised funding in principle during Mordechai's visit to Washington last month, but defence officials said Israel is trying to put that commitment into action. The cost of the third battery is reportedly about $150 million (US), not including funds already approved for manufacturing the missiles.

Mordechai was also expected to push for U.S. commitments to widen strategic cooperation between the two countries, defence sources said. This includes a continued U.S. commitment to maintaining Israel's qualitative edge in weaponry.

Most of the weaponry Israel is seeking from the United States is for the IAF. The United States recently approved the sale to Israel of a Longbow upgrade for its fleet of Apache helicopters. Among the items Israel is seeking are replacements for its aging Boeing 707 passenger and special-mission aircraft.

The IAF has also begun its search for its next generation of fighter jets and they will no doubt be American made.

Cohen was accompanied by his wife, Janet, as well as top Pentagon and administration officials. Cohen also visited Jerusalem and lay a wreath at the grave of Yitzhak Rabin, and visited Yad Vashem.

This was the fifth time that Mordechai and Cohen met, but Cohen's first visit as defence secretary.

Cohen's sweep of the Middle East has brought him to Turkey, Jordan and Egypt. In Amman, Cohen said, Jordan asked Washington to supply A-10 jets to bolster its air force.

The heavily armored A-10 "Warthog" jets operate mainly on low-flying missions and were used to destroy large numbers of Iraqi tanks in the 1991 Gulf War. They are no longer built and are in the process of being phased out of the U.S. Air Force inventory.

Jordan is due to receive three more F-16s this month in an aid package worth $320 million. It has already taken delivery of 16 used F-16 jets. Cohen did not say if the United States would be able to meet Jordan's request.

"We have indicated our willingness to cooperate in whatever fashion we can, taking into account Jordan's needs and our own assessment of what would be required and the most cost-effective and efficient way of meeting those requirements," he said.

He added that the United States is "responsive to the security needs of Jordan." Jordanian Prime Minister Abdul Majali said his country, which has distanced itself from its ally and major trading partner Iraq, is hoping for further military and economic aid from the United States.

"Last year, we were given $75 million in military assistance, and this year the same. We hope next year it will go on and possibly will be increasing according to the needs," said Majali, who is also defence minister.

Cohen reiterated a call he made in Turkey for international pressure to be maintained on President Saddam Hussein to meet UN resolutions calling for Iraq to prove it had dismantled all its weapons of mass destruction. But he denied the United States was pressing hard on Iraq while going soft on Israel.

A MEMENTO FROM YAD VASHEM

During his visit to Jerusalem, British Prime Minister Tony Blair made a point of visiting Yad Vashem where he received a memorial memento. Earlier in the month, his foreign secretary Robin Cook avoided visiting the Holocaust Museum, a decision which was viewed by officials in Jerusalem to have been, at worst, a deliberate snub, or at the least, an unfortunate oversight. Former PM urged Mossad to hunt for Nazi war criminals

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime minister Menachem Begin had proposed that the Mossad search for major Nazi war criminals, but scaled down his plan to a hunt for Auschwitz doctor Josef Mengele, a former Mossad chief said last weekend.

Nahum Admoni, who served as Mossad head under prime ministers Begin, Yitzhak Shamir and Shimon Peres, said Begin had proposed a plan to revive Mossad Nazi-hunting efforts around the globe.

Admoni said the Mossad had been active in such efforts until 1961, when it captured Adolf Eichmann, considered the architect of the Final Solution.

"I told prime minister Begin that his plan would take away much-needed resources from the Mossad," Admoni recalled, during a conference on intelligence held in memory of president Chaim Herzog, at the intelligence memorial museum at Glilot. "In the end he compromised and we decided the only target would be Mengele."

Menachem Begin

Indeed, the Mossad searched for Mengele for several years until his reported death in the mid-1980s in Paraguay.

Admoni said that Begin's proposal was unusual in that most prime ministers did not present specific plans of action to Mossad chiefs.

Instead, he said, the prime ministers would make general recommendations, such as intensifying the war on terrorism.

At the conference, Herzog's son, Col. Michael Herzog, a senior intelligence officer, announced a fund in memory of his father that would help sponsor studies and conferences on intelligence issues.

Leading intelligence officers attended the conference, in which Chaim Herzog was praised as the founder of the IDF's Intelligence Branch.

Labor party chair Ehud Barak, a former military intelligence chief, said he bemoaned that today's policymakers – a reference to the Netanyahu government – do not have an intimate relationship with Israel's intelligence heads.

British paper publishes 'interview' with jailed spy

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prison authorities are investigating how nuclear spy Mordechai Vanunu succeeded in relaying answers to questions posed by the Sunday Times, which published an interview with him.

Vanunu was jailed after he sold Israeli nuclear secrets to that paper in 1986. He had been held in solitary confinement since 1987 and only recently received permission to mix with other inmates.

Vanunu could face punishment following the most recent interview with the Sunday Times, which did not receive official sanction. A Prisons Service spokesperson said last Sunday night that "if our investigation finds him guilty, he will face disciplinary steps, including stripping him of some of his privileges."

Prison officials speculated that Vanunu may have answered questions posed by his brother Asher, who met him recently in Shikma Prison near Ashkelon.

Two British politicians who went to the prison last Sunday in the hope of meeting Vanunu were not granted entry, despite an hour-long wait outside the prison gates. However, they later were able to leave a petition asking for a presidential pardon at Beit Hanassi for President Ezer Weizman. They gave the petition, signed by 700 international figures, to Weizman's director-general Aryeh Shumer during a meeting with him.

The joint vice-chairs of the Human Rights Groups of the British Parliament and House of Lords, Labor MP Jeremy Corbyn and Lord Avebury, made a special whirlwind trip here in the hope of securing Vanunu's release. They were accompanied by actress Susannah York, who has been in the vanguard of the fight for the spy's release.

"It would be an extraordinary gesture on the part of Israel to release Vanunu now," said Corbyn to reporters, outside Beit Hanassi.

He said the request was tied to Israel's 50th anniversary and to the visit of British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Vanunu's case is due to come up before the prison parole board this week, as he has served two-thirds of his 18-year sentence. The British activists have written to the board as well.

In the Sunday Times interview, Vanunu said he wants to leave Israel as soon as he is released. He said he decided to betray Israel's nuclear secrets from "deep internal conviction, and I would do it all again."

"I think I was brave," he said. "I was the only individual who ever stood up to the entire Israeli establishment to say what I believed. I acted out of concern for this society, even though Israel likes to portray me as public enemy No. 1."

Vanunu portrayed himself as a dedicated, but deeply misunderstood and abused patriot.

"I wanted to save the population of Israel from the disaster of a nuclear war, and they turned me into a traitor and a spy. There was no proportion between my act and my punishment."

Vanunu said Shin Bet officials had offered to end his isolation in jail five years ago if he agreed not to discuss nuclear weapons or the circumstances of his capture.

"Get out of this cell," Vanunu said he told them. "I am not interested. Do what you want, because I shall have no dealings with you. You have put me in here and you can take me out. But I will not forgo my right to say that I was kidnapped and that you broke the law."

Blair's spokesperson said the subject of Vanunu's release would not be raised during Blair's visit here.

Shas rabbi blasts NRP, schools

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — State-religious education "is worthless" and its religion is "a sham," Shas mentor Rabbi Ovadia Yosef proclaimed last weekend while addressing a Shas gathering.

The former chief rabbi's hitherto unprecedented onslaught against the state-sponsored religious education system, closely associated with the National Religious party (NRP), stunned the NRP.

"They are not truly religious at all," Rabbi Yosef said of the religious-Zionist schools. "They don't educate children to religion. Their religion is skin deep and lip service only."

Rabbi Yosef underscored his message by offering a new meaning to the NRP's Hebrew acronym. "What the letters Mafdal stand for is the party of the fools who will believe anything," he said.

Most of the NRP's upper echelon refused to comment on Rabbi Yosef's words.

The exception was party secretary-general Zevulun Orlev, who said that "if anything, we are proud of a school system which has contributed so much and which continues to contribute so much to this country. I suggest Rabbi Yosef check among his own party's leaders, and he will discover that many of them are graduates of our fine educational institutions. This is a wholly undeserved attack."

But off the record, the word in the NRP is that Rabbi Yosef's remarks were not a slip of the tongue, but had a dual purpose.

The first is to drum up business for his own El Hama'ayan school system by putting down the competing state-religious schools.

But beyond that, the consensus in the NRP is that Rabbi Yosef is fearful of the competition he now faces from another former Sephardi chief rabbi, Mordechai Eliahu, who is rapidly gaining a reputation as the NRP's spiritual leader.

Rabbi Eliahu recently stepped down from the Rabbinical Court of Appeals and is thus more free now to involve himself in political affairs.

There is also considerable personal animosity between Rabbi Yosef and Rabbi Eliahu.

Rabbi Yosef did not want to step down as chief rabbi in the early 1980s and resented the legalities which forced him to do so after 10 years. He was succeeded by Rabbi Eliahu and, ever since, regarded him as a usurper.

It was after he left the chief rabbi's post that Rabbi Yosef founded Shas.

Cabinet briefed on summit

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The inner cabinet received a detailed report from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on his secret summit in Eilat last week with Jordan's King Hussein.

According to Jordanian Prime Minister Abdul-Salam Majali, Hussein alerted Netanyahu to the consequences that could result from "obstructing" the peace process.

The Jordanian monarch met Netanyahu at Eilat's Orchidea Hotel for two hours in the company of senior Israeli and Jordanian officials.

Among those present was the Mossad's new director, Ephraim Halevy, who was credited with having arranged the rendezvous.

Majali said the peace process was "alive" and showing signs of momentum. He was quoted by Reuters as rejecting the notion harbored by various Arab leaders that it has been killed off by Israeli intransigence.

He expressed hope that U.S. envoy Dennis Ross, who is due to return to the region this week, will present American proposals designed to move the process forward.

Papal visit to Israel downplayed by Vatican

By LISA PALMIERI-BILLIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

ROME — The Vatican's Secretary of Relations between States, Msgr. Jean Louis Tauran, dampened expectations of a papal visit to Israel in the near future.

He told reporters that in the present "political context the conditions" necessary for a papal visit, "do not exist..."

While ruling out a visit "at this moment," he left the future open.

"Let's see what happens in two years. The great dilemma of the Holy Father, said Msgr. Tauran, is that if he makes a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, instead of being "a symbol of peace" it would "legitimize, consecrate, situations of international injustice."

Msgr. Tauran, considered the Vatican's "foreign minister," said there was great "frustration among both the Palestinian and Israeli populations regarding the peace process begun in Madrid. They ask what fruits has it brought, and the reply is none."

He said there was "danger that we are moving toward dramatic developments...that the frustration will lead to irrational reactions. I think that those responsible politically for the region, from whichever side, and the international community, must be aware of the risks of such deep frustration."

On April 30, Msgr. Tauran will receive a facsimile copy of the Declaration of Independence at a celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary organized by Israel's Embassy to the Holy See.

Britain to host peace conference

[Cont'd. from page 1]

"The British position is different here," Blair said.

But he stressed the importance of maintaining momentum and activity in the negotiating effort.

"If progress isn't made, the situation tends to move backward," he said. "But if there is a willingness, progress will be made, which must be followed up by concrete steps."

Speaking at a state dinner Sunday night, Blair said, "Peace requires a degree of trust. When people don't trust one another they must overcome the mistrust to reach a settlement. Ohev shalom, verodef shalom" (He who loves peace, and pursues peace), he said in Hebrew. He then toasted the 50th anniversary of Israel.

Asked whether he endorsed Arafat's intention to declare an independent Palestinian state in May 1999, Blair produced a diplomatic rejoinder.

"It is better that the process work as it was envisaged," he said. However, in his remarks, Blair referred to the PA chairman as "President Arafat."

Blair also fended off a query about the omission of Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert from the list of local leaders on his official itinerary. He denied that a visit to Jerusalem was de rigeur, saying "protocol is made up as we go" on visits like his.

Netanyahu and Blair were to have a second round of talks this week before the British leader's departure.

Israel's formidable foe

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Hamas, founded a decade ago during the early phase of the intifadah, was reeling last week as the Palestine Authority (PA) detained scores of its leaders following the murder of one of its leading activists, the bomb-maker Muhyiaddin Sharif, who is said to have caused the deaths of 65 Israelis since 1995.

Cracking down on Hamas after it had accused Israel and the PA of complicity in Sharif's death, PA forces rounded up such prominent Hamas figures as Abdul Aziz Rantisi, its chief spokesman in the Gaza Strip; Ibrahim Makadmeh, who is believed to have planned several suicide bombings in Israel; and Nezar Rayan, dean of Gaza's Islamic University.

The arrests came on the heels of two additional blows sustained by Hamas. Israel announced it had broken up major Hamas cells in Ramallah, Nablus and the Jerusalem area suspected of having masterminded two bombings in Jerusalem in 1997 which claimed the lives of 22 civilians. Israel also disclosed it had thwarted some 100 attacks Hamas intended to carry out in Israeli cities and the territories.

Despite these setbacks, Hamas – which has taken credit for about a dozen suicide bombings since April 1994 – remains a formidable force.

According to Ami Ayalon, head of the Shin Bet, Hamas has in fact drawn strength from three unrelated developments in the past year.

• Hamas, which is unreconciled to Israel's very existence, benefits from the current impasse in the Oslo peace process, as well as from the widespread perception that Benjamin Netanyahu's right-wing government is responsible for the deadlock in negotiations between Israel and the PA.

• Israel's decision not to extradite Mousa Abu Marzook – a Hamas leader who was deported to Jordan after being held by the United States for 21 months – was a psychological victory for the Islamic fundamentalist group. Israel feared that putting Marzook on trial would touch off another round of terrorist attacks.

• Israel's bungled attempt on the life of Hamas operative Khaled Mashal in Amman, Jordan, led to the release of Hamas' spiritual leader, Sheik Ahmed Yassin, who had been imprisoned in Israel since 1989.

Since his return to Gaza six months ago, Yassin has vacillated between railing against "the Zionist occupation" and holding out the prospect of a sulha, or truce, with Israel.

On the one hand, he has urged his followers to "continue our holy war against the enemy," and demanded that PA president Yasser Arafat cut off all ties with Israel. On the other hand, he has offered to "cool down" Hamas' struggle if Israel pulls out of East Jerusalem and parts of the West Bank and Gaza it still controls.

Yassin's olive branch, his offer to stop Hamas' campaign of terror in exchange for sweeping Israeli concessions, should not be mistaken as a change in strategy.

In line with Hamas' 1988 charter, which states that "Palestine is an Islamic land," Yassin fervently believes that Muslims are forbidden to make peace with Israel.

Yet, within the context of Islamic fundamentalist politics, Yassin's views are considered relatively moderate. Like many Palestinians living in the territories, Yassin favors a ceasefire with Israel so that Hamas can convert a secular Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza into an Islamic one for the purpose of ultimately confronting Israel.

Yassin's piecemeal philosophy is belittled by Palestinians who demand an unceasing armed struggle to destroy Israel. This view is embraced mainly by radicals in the so-called Diaspora, firebrands like Ibrahim Ghosheh, Hamas' spokesman in Jordan, who recently called on Palestinians to keep "the gun directed" toward Israel.

But even in the territories, identical sentiments are often heard. Shortly after Yassin was allowed to go back to his home in Gaza, Rantisi threatened Israel with more suicide bombings. And in the wake of Sharif's death, Hamas' military wing issued a leaflet calling on Arabs to attack "Zionist and Jewish interests" throughout the world.

S. African aliyah pushed

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Urgent steps must be taken to make the option of immigrating here more attractive to South African Jewry, Jewish Agency Chair Avraham Burg said Sunday.

Speaking at an agency meeting discussing a recent campaign aimed at improving the immigration rate from South Africa, Burg said the South African community had been blessed with an educational infrastructure that was highly Zionist and Israel-oriented.

But "the most advanced Hebrew schools around the world" had not resulted in [more South Africans making] aliyah, Burg said.

He said too many Jews around the world still regard Israel as simply a refuge for refugees.

"If a real change in the pattern of immigration from South Africa to Israel occurs, it will be a role model for the rest of the western world," Burg added.

The Week in Israel

April 13

• The shekel depreciated 1.8 percent against the U.S. dollar, falling to an all-time low value of 3.758 NIS per dollar.

• Abnormally high temperatures scorched Israel and were expected to last until the end of the week.

April 14

• The government announced it would no longer buy cigars for the prime minister or for visiting dignitaries. Yediot Achronot reported that the government spends $40,000 a year on cigar purchases.

April 15

• Water supplies to tens of thousands of people in the northern Negev were disrupted for nearly 15 hours because of sabotage to the main supply line.

April 16

• The Central Bureau of Statistics reported that inflation for the first quarter was 0.1 percent compared to 2.6 percent in the same period last year.

April 19

• Dov Driben, 29, was shot to death by Bedouin shepherds on a ranch situated on agricultural land belonging to Moshav Maon in the southern Hebron Hills. Yehoshafat Tor, 28, and Ephraim Pearl were both wounded in the attack, which started as an argument in a continuing land dispute.

50 Years Ago

FLUSHING MEADOWS, N.Y., April 16 — In an atmosphere of undisguised pessimism, the special General Assembly session on Palestine opened here today to reconsider the partition decision and decide the future of Palestine. Emphasizing that this is the third time the Palestine question is being considered by the UN Assembly, Ambassador Joao Carlos Muniz of Brazil, who presided, said: "The first condition for the success of the discussions which are to take place here is the full assent of Arabs and Jews to the Security Council resolution."

Drummer shows love for music

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Take a little bit of the blues, a dash of New Age, a spoonful of '70s progressive rock, a pinch of samba and top it off with a healthy-sprinkling of jazz and you'll get Howard Moskoff's debut album Global Villages.

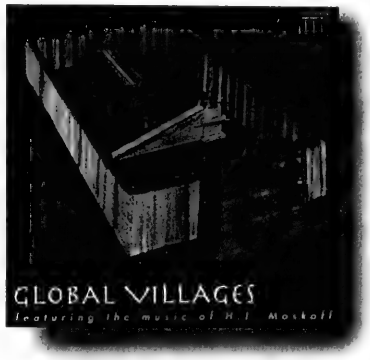
Listening to it gives me the impression that composer/drummer Moskoff loves music. It contains 11, mostly instrumental, songs of a rich, diverse field of jazz music.

"Global Villages is a compilation of compositions I've had for over 10 years," Moskoff said recently. "I wanted to make it appeal to as wide an audience as possible. My music is influenced by what contemporary pop music is influenced by: blues, Latin music and jazz. There's even a couple of solo, New Age pieces."

His influences run the gamut from jazz legend Miles Davis, to '70s rockers Steely Dan and contemporary bands like Rush and Sting. (Toronto rockers Rush get acknowledged in the liner notes.)

From the opening number, the soprano sax-filled, samba-inspired Los Pulgos Freeway, Moskoff treats jazz in a very contemporary style, mixing and matching it with other musical genres.

The Jews Harp, one of two songs with vocals, blends traditional jazz with a reggae rhythm that gives it a very progressive sound.



Warren Hill's soprano sax is also featured on the award-winning jazz composition in 7/4 time, A Vision of Elegance. The whole album is filled with wonderful performances from musicians from three different bands. Their improvised solos are tightly kept in place by Moskoff's innovative drum and percussion playing.

When composing, Moskoff allows the soloist freedom to improvise. "I usually just say how long I want the solo to be," he said. Commercial restrictions tend to dictate how long songs can be.

Ten of the 11 songs on this album were written by Moskoff. "I love music and to express myself," he said. "It's more fulfilling to play the music you wrote. There are many great drummers who compose and I just want to follow in their footsteps."

Moskoff, 31, an Orthodox Jew living in Toronto, started playing classical piano at age 12, but switched to drums a few years later. He graduated from the Berkeley College of Music and earned the Berkeley Jazz Masters Award.

Global Villages, Moskoff says, is selling well in all major record stores and Judaica stores. The single Wherever I Go is getting regular airplay in 45 stations across Canada. His fresh, innovative approach to composition and jazz music makes this a very enjoyable album to listen to.

Moskoff is hoping to perform this summer and is excited about composing for his next album. He is expecting to play at this year's Jazz Music Festival in Toronto.

Shaw, Stratford open '98 seasons

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Theatre addicts can start planning their summer now that Shaw and Stratford have announced strong seasons for 1998.

The Shaw at Niagara-on-the-Lake opens April 16 with previews of George Bernard Shaw's famous Major Barbara.

Other plays by the master include John Bull's Other Island and the comedy Passion, Poison and Petrifaction.

The Stratford season begins with previews May 11, and runs until Nov. 8. It has a diverse program to attract not only followers of Shakespeare but those who like modern drama classics such as Waiting for Godot by Samuel Beckett and The Night of the Iguana by Tennessee Williams.

For Shakespeare addicts, artistic director Richard Monette is playing a strong hand with Julius Caesar, The Two Gentlemen of Verona, Much Ado About Nothing and The Winter's Tale.

The musical Man of La Mancha, A Man For All Seasons, The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie and The Miracle Worker are also on the bill.

Two classics, The Miser by Molière and The Cherry Orchard by Anton Chekhov, round out the season.

Artistic director Christopher Newton's bill at Shaw includes the Kaufman and Hart family comedy You Can't Take It With You and Oscar Wilde's witty melodrama Lady Windermere's Fan.

There will be a lot of world attention focused on Shaw when it hosts the world premiere of the musical Foggy Day by George and Ira Gershwin, with previews May 3, opening May 23, and running to Nov. 1. It features such Gershwin favorites as Nice Work If You Can Get It and Let's Call the Whole Thing Off. It is based on the 1919 P.G. Wodehouse novel A Damsel in Distress.

The Court House Theatre, in Niagara-on-the-Lake, will play host to Christopher Fry's whimsical fable The Lady's Not for Burning, and the touching drama Joy by John Galsworthy. The annual mystery play is The Shop at Sly Corner, an intriguing suspense story by Edward Percy.

OPENING NIGHT – THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1998 at 7:30 p.m.
REPEAT SCREENING FRIDAY, MAY 8 at 3:00 p.m.

In Our Own Hands: The Hidden Story of the Jewish Brigade in WWII – True life exploits of some 5,500 Palestinian Jews who prevailed upon Churchill to let them fight the Nazis in their own unit during the war. Afterwards, they defied their commanders by doing their utmost to help the Jewish refugees and secretly ferried them to Palestine. These modern day Maccabees truly defined what it meant to be courageous.

Chester, Jones & I – Three youngsters find their swimming hole invaded by a beautiful girl, who changes the dynamics of their friendship forever.

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1998 at 9:15 p.m.
REPEAT SCREENING MONDAY, MAY 11 at 1:00 p.m.

K – An elderly German man enters the Parisian shop of art dealer Joseph Katz. Katz shoots him dead. An open and shut case of a Holocaust survivor killing the Nazi who had tortured him? Not quite. K contains enough plot for three thrillers and moves as fast as a James Bond adventure.

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1998 at 11:45 p.m.

Dogs: The Rise and Fall of an All-Girl Bookie Joint – The adventures of a motley group of roommates and their illegal but highly profitable endeavour as bookies in New York. A hip, raw comedy.

Weisman and the Devil – A fable, tinged with poison, about the dissatisfied Weisman and his encounter with you know who.

Yankele – So just why was Jacob L. ten minutes late for work?

SUNDAY, MAY 10, 1998 at 1:00 p.m.

A Jewish Wedding – She's Jewish, he's not. Their impending nuptials provide a quirky window on one couple's intermarriage experiences. An off-beat and touching comedy. The most fun you'll ever have under a chupa.

The Critic – Everyone's a critic but not everyone is as funny as Mel Brooks who is a voice in the audience with something to say about everything.

Mehane Yehuda: The Market of Jerusalem – Toronto filmmaker Jack Kuper captures the indelible images of the market.

Yiddish Karaoke (Part 1) – Haymishe music and some lovely film footage of times past. (Part 2 at 3 p.m.)

SUNDAY, MAY 10, 1998 at 3:00 p.m.

His Wife's Lover — An hilarious Yiddish comedy, starring the legendary Ludwig Satz as a self-satisfied actor who impersonates an obnoxious old — and rich — man to test the loyalty of his potential girlfriend. It's a real hoot!

Cohen on the Telephone – This comic sound short, made six years before the release of the first talkie, stars Monroe Silver as Cohen, who just can't get the knack of this new fangled device called a telephone.

Yiddish Karaoke (Part 2) – Sing along with such classic tunes as Belz and My Yiddishe Mama. (Part 1 at 1:00 p.m.)

SUNDAY, MAY 10, 1998 at 5:30 p.m.

The Road to Rabin Square – This hard hitting film traces the linkages between Jewish fundamentalists, key political leaders in the Likud party and the settler movement in Israel, which created the conditions which led to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's murder.

SUNDAY, MAY 10, 1998 at 7:30 p.m.

Out for Love... Be Back Shortly – Twenty-four year old Dan Katzir's search for a girlfriend, recorded with a video camera, is a probing portrait of Israel under siege in the days leading to the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

SUNDAY, MAY 10, 1998 at 9:30 p.m.

The Truce (La Tregua) – The early post war experiences of the late Italian philosopher/writer Primo Levi form the basis of this beautifully shot and quietly powerful drama. Directed by the great Italian filmmaker Francesco Rosi, The Truce captures a time of confusion and pandemonium.

MONDAY, MAY 11, 1998 at 5:30 p.m.

Sabbath in Paradise – Klezmer music, its influences and relevance to modern times are examined in this probing look at the musicians who create the sounds. Featuring Michael Alpert, Andy Statman and John Zorn, et al.

Needle and "Tread"– An impressionistic account of the filmmaker's grandmother and her experience as a seamstress in Canada is delicately interwoven with dramatic shots of a woman doing the same job today.

MONDAY, MAY 11, 1998 at 7:30 p.m.

Beep – A young couple are at a crossroads in their relationship. He wants to emigrate from Israel; she wants to stay put. An odd film about crossed connections, miscommunication and pickpockets, Beep is unlike any Israeli feature you've seen before.

In Broad Daylight – A blind man and a vivacious young woman form an unlikely relationship while waiting for the same bus each day.

MONDAY, MAY 11, 1998 at 9:30 p.m.

The Last Transfer – A poignant portrait of institutionalized Holocaust survivors and their difficulties in coping with life after the end of the war. This film illuminates a subject that is painful but necessary to understand, and introduces us to a side of this story that we don't know much about.

Canada's elder techno-statesman rides the tiger

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Harvey Gellman says adapting to technology has always been like riding a tiger, even when it was just a kitten.

Addressing information systems from his half century of industry experience in his book Riding The Tiger, Gellman gives insights on taking on the ferocious feline in its virtual wilderness. He says approaching technology from purpose – not from specifics – is the foundation for information management systems that get results.

As Canada's first statesman of the computer age, he can tell you the tiger has never been known to just purr along. Its roar carries with it a bumpy ride of system and software decisions that has left many office managers being dragged by the tiger's tail, or worse still, walking away with their own tucked between their legs.

"Technology is wonderful when it is working well, but if it is not, you are in a pickle," Gellman says. "What I found, essentially, is that executives want good systems, but they have to realize the investment involved.

"Those organizations that have computer systems that work well have generally applied some common-sense principles: They start with a purpose for what they want to accomplish and then move towards strategy that can be used to build and progress."

Met with industry acclaim last year, Riding The Tiger is now entering into paperback edition. Co-authored with fellow consultants Alistair Davidson and Mary Chung, the book is designed for non-specialist business managers facing critical decisions about information management.

Key points of information are highlighted throughout the book in the form of "Tiger PEARLs" (Plan, Execute, Analyze and adjust, and Repeat the Loop), providing maxims that summarize topic content.

Based on a plan-do-improve model, information technology systems are implemented to reach predetermined goals, set to improve or change a business venture. Gellman says managers who are willing to open themselves to an evolving planning process can make better leadership decisions.

"Many [businesses] build systems in the cheapest or quickest way available to get up and running," he says. "They try to put the matter behind them as soon as possible, only to find problems creep up during the lifetime of the system – ones that cost many more times that of the initial investment."

Pointing to a simple example, he says when he visited a book shop on one occasion, a particularly long line-up of customers had formed as a result of a system failure that shut down the computerized network running the cash registers. Staff were forced to do the transactions manually.

"Clearly the owner of this book shop did not understand the importance of having back-up systems in place in the event the primary shut down."

Viewing the plan-do-improve process as an evolving one, Gellman says once a good system is in place, organizations must create effective partnerships outside the company to work with the departments, notably between those providing internal system support and software/hardware vendors.

Gellman, now 73, is known for a number of accomplishments, many of which form the beginnings of Canada's computer era. The first Canadian to hold a PhD in computer science in 1951, Gellman played a key role in buying the nation's first computer and in the creation of its first computer program for Atomic Energy of Canada.

Last year, Gellman joined his co-authors in their consulting firm Alacrity Inc. Playing a key role in creating new business, he says, the organization has found consulting opportunities through the same business principles as those behind Riding The Tiger.

Born in Radom, Poland, Gellman moved with his family to Toronto in 1928 and has been active in the Jewish community ever since. A 35-year member of Beth Tzedec Congregation, he has served on various planning committees for the Canadian Jewish Congress and has also undertaken consulting work in the community, including for Beth Tzedec and Baycrest Centre, mainly in those organizations' computer system set-up.

Art Garfunkle part of Israel at 50 celebration

The Canadian Friends of the Israel Museum organization is inviting the community to a gala evening marking Israel's 50th birthday, and featuring Art Garfunkle in concert.

The May 3 event will benefit the museum's youth wing.

The evening will include dinner at the Princess of Wales Theatre, beginning 5:30 p.m., followed by a fantasy auction, and capped with a concert by half of the super-star pop duo of Simon and Garfunkle.

Since splitting with Paul Simon in 1970, Garfunkle has recorded several solo albums, published a book of poetry and completed a trek across the United States, culminating in the album, Across America.

The Israel Museum, in Jerusalem, houses the world's largest collection of Judaica, as well as the Dead Sea Scrolls.

SEINFELD MAKES WISH COME TRUE

Ayal Beer, a 13-year-old Israeli boy hospitalized with acute leukemia, knew right away what he wanted when the Make-A-Wish Foundation came calling: to sit in on a taping of the Seinfeld television show.

Last month, Ayal and his parents were present in the tightly guarded CBS-TV studio in Los Angeles where the last Seinfeld episode was taped. During a break in the three hours it took to produce the show, Seinfeld came over and chatted with Ayal and his family.

The Make-A-Wish Foundation is active in 14 countries. Mishalat Lev, the Israeli branch of the foundation, has fulfilled the requests of 43 children with life-threatening illnesses since it was founded one year ago.

In the Spotlight: This year marks the centenary of the birth of legendary black American singer Paul Robeson, who immortalized the Jerome Kern tune Ol' Man River and was an outspoken opponent of racial hatred. Robeson, an active socialist and communist, first visited the Soviet Union in 1934, and in that year also first condemned the Nazi's treatment of the Jews.

In 1949, Robeson performed a concert live from Moscow that was broadcast across the Soviet Union. Learning just before the concert that the Stalin regime had imprisoned and killed some Jewish poets, Robeson switched his closing number. Instead of his usual Ol' Man River, he sang Zog Nit Keynmol, a defiant song from the Warsaw Ghetto uprising. The number electrified Russian audiences and received tumultuous applause.

Robeson, who died in 1976, grew up in New York and learned many Yiddish songs in the early 1920s. He also adored the stories of Shalom Aleichem. His son, Paul Robeson Jr., accepted a lifetime achievement award at the Grammy Awards in February for his father. The recording label Revelation recently released a commemorative CD, Paul Robeson – The Legendary Moscow Concert.

HISTORIC HOMESTEADS OF BELL AND BRANT

Like many Torontonians, I've driven countless times over the Burlington Skyway on my way to Niagara Falls, Buffalo and points south.

Recently, however, I exited the Queen Elizabeth Way at the Guelph Line and ventured south to Lake Ontario, intent on making a lazy exploration of Burlington, as well as of Brantford, about 50 kilometres to the west. I had previously known of these communities only as dots on the map.

On the ground, I discovered the historic homesteads of two internationally famous figures – the Indian chief Joseph Brant and inventor Alexander Graham Bell – as well as sites of importance to the Six Nations Indians. A patchwork quilt of urban and rural landscapes, the region is also known for its lavish gardens, such as the 2,700-acre Royal Botanical Gardens, and for its various possibilities in soft-adventure ecotourism along the Grand River and the nearby Niagara Escarpment.

Within sight of the Burlington Skyway and the Stelco and Dofasco smokestacks in Hamilton harbor, and only a short distance from where French explorer René-Robert de La Salle touched land in 1669, is a pretty white clapboard cottage in the Georgian style. Known as the Joseph Brant House, it's a replica of an earlier house on the same spot in which Brant lived and died.

Brant, otherwise known as Thayendanegea, is an important figure in these parts. Born in 1742 on the banks of the Ohio River, he served at age 13 with the British against the French. After again proving his loyalty to the British Crown during the upheavals around the American Revolution, he was rewarded with a large tract of land in Ontario for himself and his people.

They crossed the Grand River at a spot that became known as Brant's Ford and eventually Brantford. Brant built the house on Burlington Bay in 1800 and died there in 1807.

The two-story house is now a museum containing several thousand objects including a mastodon bone found locally, aboriginal relics, and an inscribed ring, a Masonic apron and other former possessions of Captain Brant.

Burlington boasts one of the largest natural sand beaches on the lake; in summer, the water is cold but swimmable. There's also a lengthy waterfront trail, and running north from the lake along Brant Street, an invitingly walkable five-block district of shops and restaurants.

May, when more than 100,000 spring bulbs show their colors, is probably the best time to visit the Royal Botanical Gardens (905-825-5040) in Hamilton, although there's something in bloom almost year-round; some 400,000 visitors come here yearly, making it one of the top-drawing attractions in the province.

Nature lovers will also find much to explore in the vicinity, since it's part of the only patch of Carolinian-type forest in Canada and boasts species like the Virginia opossum and the sassafras tree, found nowhere else in the country. Hamilton-based Green Planet Tour Company specializes in regional ecotours; its popular Wine, War and Waterfalls Tour combines viticulture, War of 1812 lore and visits to secluded waterfalls on the Niagara Escarpment.

I spent the night at On The Grand, a comfortable B&B farmhouse overlooking a gracious oxbow in the Grand River, south of Brantford. (Rooms range from $60 to $80 per night.) The evening being clear and cool, I stepped onto the second-floor terrace and looked into the sky, easily seeing a multitudinous sprinkling of stars that are usually invisible in Toronto.

The next morning, birds were twittering in the fresh country air as I walked along Tutela Heights Road to the Bell Homestead some 400 metres away.

No wonder the future inventor of the telephone was brought here from Scotland to recover from the tuberculosis that had claimed his two brothers.

In this simple Victorian farmhouse, now a museum, Alexander Graham Bell conceived the idea of the telephone in July 1874. Two years later, in Brantford, he first succeeded in transmitting speech over telegraph lines and in placing the world's first long-distance call – to Paris, eight kilometres away.

Although it contains much telephonic lore, the home is essentially a loyal re-creation of the domestic setting in which Bell worked. The adjacent Henderson Home, trucked from downtown Brantford in 1969, was Canada's first telephone business office.

Dealing with that constant craving

To Your Health asked Fran Berkoff, a consultant dietitian/nutritionist at Mount Sinai Hospital, to explain why sometimes you just have to have some!

"It can happen anytime, anywhere. I may be sitting in my office late in the afternoon, or driving home from work, when the craving strikes: I must have a chocolate bar – immediately. Sorry, but nothing else will do."

To Your Health

All of us, from time to time, have experienced the intense desire for a particular food – a chocolate bar, pizza, a plateful of french fries. These cravings can attack even when we don't happen to be particularly hungry, and with the smallest of provocations: a whiff of chocolate in the air, a television advertisement, a radio jingle. Although researchers don't fully understand all the factors that may cause cravings, they have learned much about the roles that both mind and body play. And there is general consensus that often, the best way to deal with a craving is to give in – at least a little.

Dr. Judith Wurtman, at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, says that scientists have identified a psychological basis for some cravings. The desire for carbohydrates, in particular, appears to be linked to changes in the concentration of serotonin, one of various chemical neurotransmitters that conveys signals from one brain cell to another. Serotonin is closely tied to appetite and mood – when levels are higher, it tends to help calm us. Carbohydrates, as it happens, increase serotonin levels. It is suggested that what we may actually crave is the soothing effect, rather than the taste of a particular food.

Other factors besides the purely physiological, however, can also be involved in cravings. If eating the right food doesn't satisfy the craving, then something else is going on – problems with a partner, perhaps, or frustrations at work. Whatever the issue, it must be confronted directly; eating is nothing more than a way of distracting yourself from the problem.

Dr. Janet Polivy, a professor of psychology and psychiatry at the University of Toronto has studied the psychological aspects of cravings. Using triggers such as smell and verbal suggestion, she has attempted to induce cravings both in people who have a preoccupation with weight and diet and in those who never diet. Dieters, she has found, respond much more powerfully; years of constantly telling themselves "no" leave them with intense feelings of deprivation. Their cravings refuse to go away until they get the exact food they desire – and then they often binge on it.

Non-dieters deal with their cravings differently: if their first choice doesn't happen to be available, they can satisfy the desire just as easily by eating something else. And when they've had enough, they stop eating.

Chocolate, of course, is by far the most common craving. As Polivy points out, there's no evidence that you crave exactly what your body needs. While some people crave treats such as chocolate and other sweets, others may also crave savory, spicy or salty foods. Not surprisingly, our desires often focus on the foods we're not supposed to have.

"You tend to crave what's forbidden," says Polivy. "People don't like having their freedom taken away, and if they are told that they can't have something, they want it."

What to do when a craving strikes? Cravings should be treated like thirst – when you're thirsty, it's natural to reach for the bottled water; in the same way, eating a soft pretzel or a baked potato when you crave carbohydrates seems a sensible response.

For those who crave chocolate, it's best to go ahead and eat a little. It's better than denying the craving altogether, which can just intensify the desire and cause you to go overboard when you finally do succumb. So when you're feeling satisfied – stop.

Health Briefs

Cancer Gene Found

Researchers at the Tumor Biology Research Unit at Hadassah-University Hospital and InSight Company in Jerusalem have discovered and cloned a human gene linked to the spread of cancer.

This breakthrough is expected to help predict the spread of tumors, assign treatments and lead to the development of new drugs and treatments.

The gene – responsible for producing an enzyme that aids the spread of tumor cells – plays a major role in the growth of secondary tumors, which are often undetectable and in many cases cause death.

Prof. Israel Vlodavsky, a cell biologist who heads the Hadassah unit, said this achievement has paved the way for the development of molecular probes and antibodies for the early detection of tiny metastases of certain tumor cells. Vlodavsky was honored for his work with Hadassah's Outstanding Scientist Award in 1997.

An application for patenting the recombinant enzyme and the gene code is being filed in the United States.

Test Tube Baby

Israel's first gender-selected test-tube baby was born to a healthy mother who had difficulty conceiving.

The unusual in-vitro fertilization was performed last summer at Hadassah-University Hospital in Jerusalem after tests showed that her husband carried a high risk of passing on a severe genetic disease – but only to male offspring. To avoid passing on the syndrome, which can cause mental retardation and infertility, gynecology and obstetrics department physicians, headed by Prof. Neri Laufer, performed in-vitro fertilization, producing five embryos.

After determining the gender of each, only the female embryos were implanted. Of four, one developed into a healthy baby girl. This unique procedure has so far produced only 150 babies around the world. Hadassah is working to use this pre-implantation genetic diagnosis for Tay-Sachs and cystic fibrosis.

Financial troubles foreseen for Toronto sports clubs

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Professional sports in Toronto will be in "dire straits" and will only be saved by the infusion of the television revenue that would accrue if the Teachers Pension Fund buys the Blue Jays and combines that franchise with the Maple Leafs and the Raptors, according to the assistant to Maple Leaf Gardens president Steve Stavros.

Speaking recently to the Baycrest Men's Service Group, Bill Watters said the Teachers Pension Fund will buy the Blue Jays franchise, which he claims is currently losing $30 to $40 million a year. "Otherwise why would [the fund] invest half a billion in the Air Canada Centre? They are the only logical purchaser."

Watters was the big draw for the Men's Service Group who had hoped to attract younger members to the meeting who would ultimately join the group, and a number showed up. They were among the most persistent and knowledgeable questioners of the Gardens' executive.

"It's like putting money into an RRSP for your future," said membership vice-president Richard Wagman, urging the newcomers to join up at a special membership fee of $25 instead of $75. "Perhaps you can come up with new and exciting services for residents of Baycrest. Even one hour a month of your time will help," he said.

Bill Watters

Modernized buildings, private boxes and television revenue are driving the sports business today, Watters said. He disclosed that extra boxes in the Air Canada Centre, and other revenue from the new building will add $20 million to the coffers of Maple Leafs/Raptors.

The existing Maple Leaf Gardens on Carlton Street "will never be torn down," and it most likely will be used as a practice arena for the Maple Leafs and as a base for the American Hockey League. Even in the unlikely event that the Gardens is torn down, the facade will be retained for historical purposes, he said.

He predicted it would take three years before the Maple Leafs come into Stanley Cup contention as they concentrate on rebuilding.

Fans may give the Maple Leafs a year leeway in rebuilding, but they want a winner, Watters said. The team will build around the core group of Mats Sundin, Felix Potvin, Matthew Schneider and Sylvain Cote.

The team urgently needs a second centre "impact player" to ease the load on Sundin and if that is to be Ron Francis "then so be it," Watters declared. But, he said later, "I can't justify $5 million for him."

Watters also made these points:

- Steve Stavros and Larry Tanenbaum are not interested in losing money in the Air Canada Centre operation.
- Merely putting up a new building will not save professional sports. He cited as proof the United Centre in Chicago, which has become a $215-million "mausoleum" where some private box-holders need field glasses to see the action.
- Although seat licensing is a trend, it will be difficult to do in Toronto. "We're not sure the increase is worth the backlash."
- The development of the Union Station property "is a little iffy."
- It will be a "logistic nightmare" to switch sale of Maple Leaf tickets from Carlton Street to the Air Canada Centre.
- Professional sports need a source of money that allows them to operate without restraint.
- Owners must decide to put a cap on players' salaries.
- There is no sense in bringing Doug Gilmour back "and whether Wendell Clark has a future here we don't know."
- Maple Leafs have been "unfairly chastised" for their scouting operations.

Godfrey remains optimistic about landing an NFL team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Paul Godfrey has heard from the naysayers before, but he's convinced NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue was not merely blowing smoke when he announced that Toronto was on a shortlist of cities being considered for future franchises.

"It's not a question of 'if,' it's a question of 'when,'" Godfrey recently told The CJN.

As the man who's been working for years to bring the NFL to Toronto, Godfrey has some reason to be optimistic. At a news conference a few weeks ago, Tagliabue mentioned Toronto along with Los Angeles and Houston as cities the NFL is considering for possible new franchises. Tagliabue's reference came during a news conference officially announcing that Cleveland had been awarded an expansion team, bringing the league total to 31 clubs.

Despite Tagliabue's statement, skeptics have suggested the commissioner was merely using Toronto as leverage to get better stadium deals for other expansion clubs based in the United States.

But Godfrey would have none of that. "Tagliabue is a very straightforward, honest guy," he said. "Los Angeles, Houston and Toronto would be the pecking order if all had good stadiums. Ultimately, all the teams will get in."

Godfrey, president and CEO of Sun Media Corp., said the decision to add a 32nd team will likely be made in the next year or two and "the challenge for Toronto will be to prove to the NFL that the stadium is capable of supporting an NFL team."

Unlike the current arrangement for pro teams at the SkyDome, NFL teams receive all revenues from private boxes. A similar arrangement would be necessary for a Toronto franchise to be successful, he suggested.

Godfrey also has a contingency plan that includes construction of a new 75,000-seat stadium on the Downsview Airport lands, the Toronto Sun reported.

Paul Godfrey

Godfrey said a Toronto team could be a going concern despite the monumental entry fee being bandied about for new franchises — somewhere in the neighborhood of $350 million (US).

How could a Toronto franchise prosper with that sort of cost hanging over its head?

"The revenues have also gone up drastically," Godfrey said, pointing to the multi-billion dollar television deal recently inked by the NFL.

In addition, "football is the best run sport of all the sports. They're not going to bring teams into the league that will blow their brains out. This is a business," he said.

As for the CFL, Godfrey said an NFL team in Toronto might do the Canadian league some good. An NFL team might stimulate interest in the Argos, he suggested.

The Inside Back

A Jewish fairy tale

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

Once upon a time, there lived a young girl whose name was Ella, but everyone called her Shmutzerella, as she was always dirty from cleaning the house and cooking.

You see, Shmutzerella was a hard-working university student trying to get into medical school. For some reason, her younger sisters were allowed to play video games outside of school hours, while she was expected to do all the cook-ing, cleaning and laundry for the entire family.

One day, an invitation to attend their third cousin's wedding arrived in the mail. Of course, the rest of the family was immediately busy buying new clothes to impress the cousins. But Shmutzerella would only be able to go to the wedding if she first finished all the housework.

When the wedding day arrived, poor Shmutzerella was left alone while everyone went off to the chupah. As she sat down and cried, she was startled by a crunching sound. Shmutzerella turned to see a not-so-svelte fairy. "Who are you?" she asked.

"Why, I'm your fairy Bubbela" she responded, nibbling on potato chips, "and I'm here to make sure you get to your cousin's wedding tonight."

"But I still have vacuuming, ironing, cooking to do and midterms to study for tomorrow, and nothing to wear" sobbed Shmutzerella.

"Leave that to me" said the fairy Bubbela. And with a wave of the drumstick she was noshing on, the vacuum and iron came to life and began to do their work. The vegetables in the fridge jumped out and diced themselves, then flew into a pot of soup on the stove.

"Now let's see about a dress." With another wave of her drumstick, the fairy Bubbela created a spectacular dress, simple yet elegant, with that expensive looking but just-off-the-rack look.

As Shmutzerella dressed herself, her fairy Bubbela transformed the Chia pet into an elegant white Porsche, its keys gleaming in the moonlight outside. Shmutzerella was speechless as she slid into the driver's seat.

"Remember, Shmutzerealla" the fairy Bubbela intoned, "you have to be back by midnight to study for midterms or the whole deal collapses. No lingering at the sweet table, you understand? Maybe you could bring me a doggie bag?"

Shmutzerella raced off while the fairy Bubbela made herself a three-course late night snack and plunked down in front of the television for Soap Opera Rerun Hour.

Shmutzerella arrived just as the simchah was in high gear. As she checked her coat, she immediately spotted the prince. She knew he was the prince by the oversized gold Chai he wore over his open-shirted hairy chest. As they chatted and ate for the next hour, Shmutzerella felt mysteriously magnetically drawn to his Chai and intoxicated by his extra-strength cologne.

Time flew quickly for the rest of the evening, and, as the prince was about to ask for her phone number, the band leader announced that it was now almost midnight, and time for the sweet table.

In a panic, and trying to avoid the stampede of people, Shmutzerella ran for her coat, but dropped one of her contact lenses. She ran to her Porsche, only to have it turn back into a Chia pet, and had to take the bus home, where she found both her Bubbela and the cookies were gone.

The next day, word travelled that the prince was searching the land for a princess who could fit a contact lens. Shmutzerella heard the news just as she returned from acing her midterm. When the prince arrived, her sisters tried on the contact lens, but it just wouldn't fit. The prince was just about to leave when he saw Shmutzerella. He had her try on the contact lens. It fit! (even though it was quite a bit dry by now).

Within a year, the prince and Shmutzerella were chassan and kallah, and they lived happily ever after, that is, at least until the kids arrived.

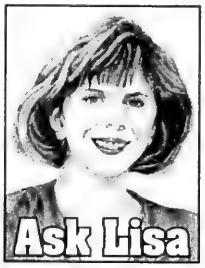
About jobs



Dear Lisa,

I applied for a job that was perfect for me. I know my resume was great, so why didn't I get an interview?

Dear Reader,

This is an old question and one that is still difficult to answer. I can only guess it was something in your application package, maybe the cover letter, maybe the type of paper you used or maybe just that yours was the last application in a very large batch. The best thing you can do right now is call the company you applied to, ask them if they received your resume, tell them you did not receive a call from them and would like to know why. They may be able to give you a good reason or they may not.

Sometimes, because so many resumes are scanned for a position, human resource personnel evaluate resumes. Marks are given for a variety of knowledge and experience listed in the resume. Categories that qualify for points may include ability to speak another language, how recently you graduated (a new graduate often gets an extra point), how much experience you have that is directly related to the job for which you are applying, and if you already live in the region where the job is located. In some cases, points are also given if you have previously worked for that company.

Sometimes, however, a company will do its first screening looking only for those individuals who have previously worked for their company.

If you call and are told your resume was not chosen, ask if there will be another opportunity to apply for that job or one like it. Ask if the company hires people for that position frequently. Ask if they ever hire replacement workers or temporary staff.

Meanwhile, keep your chin up. Know that you have tried your best and the right job for you may be just around the corner. It may be hidden and waiting for you to do a bit more research.

Job Search is a monthly column by career educator Lisa Galet Klug. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

Celebrating 50 Years of Building a Nation

FROM DESERT-LIKE CONDITIONS to fertile, productive fields. From simple villages to prosperous communities ... that's the story of an incredible journey made possible with the help of UJA/UIA dollars raised in Canada and around the world.

In the early days, Israel depended on UJA/UIA dollars for its agricultural settlements ... allowing them to grow crops where once there had been nothing but arid soil. On Israel's northern frontier, we have helped create economic independence by investing in educational scholarships, cultural programming and community centres.

The Canada Centre in Metulla is but one of 200 projects where Canadian communities continue to strengthen the fabric of Israel through UJA/UIA.

Israel as sentinel

Editorial

It is a testament to the sheer, inexplicable force of Israel's quasi-metaphysical, magnetic pull that its 50th anniversary has been, and continues to be, commemorated, observed, analysed, assessed, considered and reviewed by so many media outlets in this country and elsewhere.

Newspapers have dedicated pages and pages to Israel at 50; television and radio have devoted hours and hours to wide-ranging reportage and in-depth coverage of the tiny country that sits astride the crossroads of three continents on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean. Journalists and pundits of all ideologies, backgrounds and nationalities have dissected Israel's past, examined its present and pronounced in sonorous tones upon its future under the microscope of the high-speed, high-tech, high-resolution laboratory of the social and political sciences.

In all, it has been a remarkable display, an indirect, backhanded acknowledgment of sorts, that something more than most journalists can comprehend or even observe is at hand in the modern return of the Jewish people to their ancient land.

But as has been written in this paper a number of times and in a number of variations, that return is nothing less than a vital station on the long, arduous, but inevitable march of all mankind towards a better destiny. And on that march, in the fullness of time, in ways still unclear to us, Israel will be the sentinel on duty.

BLUE AND WHITE ON INDEPENDENCE DAY

The Magen David is the protective symbol of the State of Israel. On Independence Day the blue and white of the flag is the main motif of the country's celebrations, as can be seen by the young girl on the left waving the flag, or the young woman above enfolding herself within it. (photos by Israel)

Yom Ha'atzmaut

We have built an outstanding country

Message from the President of the State of Israel Ezer Weizman on the occasion of the Jubilee of the State of Israel

Ezer Weizman

The State of Israel is celebrating the jubilee of its independence this year. Over the past 50 years, despite all the internal and external difficulties, we have built an outstanding country. We have a thriving economy, a level of technology among the most advanced in the world, impressive scientific research, highly developed agriculture, and a very rich cultural life. Concurrently, we have had extraordinary success in meeting the Zionist challenge of absorbing immigrants from all over the world.

In the past few years, we have absorbed 750,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union and another 80,000 from Ethiopia. They make an important contribution to our society and to the country. Unfortunately, not all our Jewish brethren have come to Israel. To you, our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora, I say – the gates of the state are open to you; our air and seaports are open; our hearts and our arms are open to welcome you. Come and join us in building an exemplary society and an outstanding country. Come and realize the Zionist dream together with us in Israel.

Upon achieving independence, Israel's population was 600,000. Since then it has grown tenfold, to nearly six million, including more than one million Arab citizens enjoying equal rights. This is a very diverse society, but despite its many contrasts, loyalty to the state is shared by all.

During this century, the Jewish people experienced one of the most terrible events in its history, the Holocaust in Europe, but also reached one of its most impressive achievements – the creation of the national home in Israel, turning Israel into the centre of world Jewry and reviving the Hebrew language, which had not been forgotten during two millennia of exile.

We still have security problems, but we are on the right path, the path to peace, and I believe that within a few years we shall attain comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

Today we enjoy quiet borders and peaceful relations with Egypt and Jordan, and we have hopes of a peace settlement with the Palestinians. In the Declaration of the Establishment of the State of Israel, we state that we "extend our hand to all neighboring states and their peoples in an offer of peace and good neighborliness and are prepared to do our share in a common effort for the advancement of the entire Middle East."

This call is, of course, still valid today. It is my hope that we shall renew the peace negotiations with Syria and Lebanon, and establish diplomatic relations with all the countries which as yet have no ties with us.

When, in retrospect, I contemplate our accomplishments in the past 50 years, I am filled with hope and confidence about what Israel will achieve in the coming 50 years.

Israel is a modern miracle

Message from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to the Jewish communities of the Diaspora on the occasion of Israel's 50th Independence Day

This year we celebrate the State of Israel's 50th birthday, a landmark in our history. I believe we can be proud of our accomplishments in this half century.

Even before the state was officially declared, we were attacked from all sides, and most military experts doubted that the new state would survive. But we have not only survived against great odds. We have performed what can only be described as a modern miracle. We have gathered millions of exiles to our land, developed a thriving economy, and attained international standing in the sciences and the arts, in technology and in agriculture. With resolve and courage, we have proved again and again that we can defend ourselves against all enemies.

These achievements have convinced our neighbors of our permanence in the region. Egypt and Jordan have signed peace treaties with us; we have established relations with other Arab countries; and we have started a peace process with our Palestinian neighbors.

There are few sacrifices and concessions Israel is unwilling to make to achieve peace with all its neighbors. But a fundamental requirement must be satisfied: security.

This should have been self-evident. The very definition of peace includes the absence of violence and war. Terrorism and threats of violence are incompatible with the peace process.

Yet many expect Israel to withdraw from areas that are the cradle of Jewish civilization, to relinquish control over strategic assets and to leave itself vulnerable to attack despite the absence of any credible assurance of security. This we cannot do. To treat the matter of securing lightly is to abdicate our responsibilities as a government. Jews everywhere must remain united in demanding that security be an integral, indispensable component of the peace process. Only then can we achieve real peace.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Ever since the struggling days of the state's beginning, unity has been our invaluable weapon. And whenever cracks seem to appear in this bond, we prove time and again

Naval officer claims anti-Jewish bias in Forces

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two weeks of court time have been set aside in Vancouver next month to hear the case of a Canadian naval reserve officer who says he was denied a plum posting during the Gulf War because he is Jewish.

Andrew Liebmann, now 34, is taking the minister of defence and the chief of defence staff to Federal Court because he believes he's the victim of anti-Jewish bias on the part of the Canadian Armed Forces.

B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights will join the case as intervenors in an effort to strike down as unconstitutional the Forces' policy that permits it to exclude members from peacekeeping duties because of their ethnic or religious origin.

The case, thought to be a first in Jewish circles, goes back to January 1991, when Liebmann, then a lieutenant, was serving as a reservist aboard the HMCS Discovery in Vancouver. Just as the Gulf War began, he applied for the job of executive assistant to Commodore Kenneth Summers, then commander of Canadian forces in the Middle East. The posting was to Bahrain.

According to court documents, Liebmann alleges he was told by an officer on the Discovery that his application was revoked because he is Jewish. He says he was told that another officer would get the job. He says he was told the same thing by Maritime Command in Halifax.

Liebmann says he was told that the Forces' official position was that being a Jew in Bahrain – particularly when tensions were escalating between Iraq and Israel – would pose a threat to his personal safety or could impair his ability to do his job.

Finally, Liebmann says he was told that the job was posted in error, and that Summers' aide would be staying on.

A few weeks later, he received a letter of apology from the associate minister of national defence, but stating that the affair was an "unfortunate misunderstanding, which led to your being given incorrect information."

The Department of National Defence concurred, and has denied it discriminates on the basis of religion or ethnicity.

Liebmann taking his case to court

Liebmann launched an internal grievance, which took two years to complete. But it failed to resolve the matter and did not alter his belief that he was discriminated against as a Jew.

Liebmann launched his court case in 1993.

His lawyer, Sam Hayman, told The CJN in a telephone interview that his case is based partly on a "misapplication" of a Canadian Forces Administrative Order which permits the exclusion of some soldiers from peacekeeping duty.

The policy, a copy of which was obtained by The CJN, states that in choosing members of a peacekeeping force, the Armed Forces may consider "the cultural, religious or other sensitivities of the parties to the conflict and the host country, but only to the extent that failure to respect those sensitivities creates a real risk that the mission will not be carried out successfully," or that the mission and its members would be endangered.

The policy is designed to maintain peacekeepers' neutrality and avoid inflaming already-tense situations.

However, the policy does not apply to soldiers in active wartime service. Hayman says it was wrongly applied to his client, who was active during an armed conflict.

The League's involvement dates back to 1990, when it went to court to challenge what it called a ban by the Canadian Forces on Jews, Muslims and women serving in peacekeeping forces in the Middle East.

The League charges that Canada has not sent Jewish or Muslim soldiers to the Mideast since 1956. In 1988, Canada complied with a request to exclude Jews, Muslims and women from its contingent sent to monitor the truce between Iran and Iraq.

In 1991, the Federal Court dismissed the League's claim, urging it to find a victim of the alleged ban. Fresh ammunition in the League's case came when Liebmann stepped forward.

League lawyer David Matas told The CJN that Forces members are still excluded from peacekeeping missions based on ethnicity or religion, which the League alleges violates the Charter of Rights. It is asking the court to strike down the policy as unconstitutional.

Editorials May 14, 1948

Israel's 50th anniversary has been and is being widely covered by the Canadian media. But what did the newspapers of the country say about Israel when it was founded?

Recently I had the opportunity to research that question in the archives of the Canadian Jewish Congress, a rich, exciting trove of treasured documents and history-soaked memorabilia.

Without analysing their content, I reproduce brief excerpts from the editorials written in a handful of the country's leading newspapers on that fateful weekend in 1948.

The Ottawa Evening Journal of May 14, 1948, in its editorial, "Palestine – The Flag Comes Down," wrote, essentially, an apology for the British government's handling of the mandate.

"Tonight the British flag will be hauled down in Palestine, the British High Commissioner will sail for England on a light cruiser...

"It must seem to many that nothing so describes the difficulty of Britain's rule by mandate as the fact that her leaving of it finds no power or powers able to carry on...Britain did a brave best for 27 years, then, hard-pressed at home and elsewhere with problems more precisely her own, turned back the mandate to the League's successor...Grave and lamentable as is [the] state of affairs, it can surely not be laid at Britain's door. Her best may not have been good enough...but who or what will do better is almost fatefully unclear."

The editorial in the Montreal Gazette May 17 was called "Jewish State Born in Torment." It described the momentous situation and plaintively asked, "What is the ingenious formula which shall bring peace?"

"On Friday, the Jewish state was born amidst torment. It was an urgent hope that struggled through into a painful reality.

"Yet a great hope it has been. The sufferings of the centuries have deepened it with their weight, and this longing for a homeland has been given a new urgency by the sufferings and the losses of the last few years, when persecution was linked to science and system in the concentration camps of the Nazi regime. The hope for a national home in Palestine may be a desperate hope. But it has been born out of desperation...

"It is part of the tragic irony of the Jewish people that their hope should be launched in a dark sea of so many troubles."

The editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail on May 14 was entitled "Zero Hour in Palestine." It argued unambiguously in favor of the justice of the Jewish cause.

"Regardless of its fate, today will be forever memorable in the annals of the Jews. It will mark the attainment of a dream cherished amongst them for two thousand years, the return to a land they have always considered theirs. Critics of these claims...have all recognized that the spiritual hunger of the Jews for Palestine is genuine and deeply felt. There will be few in the world unmoved by sympathy with them as they enter into possession of what they regard, rightly or wrongly, as their birthright.

"How secure that possession is will be seen in due course. The legal basis of Israel is...the judgment of the United Nations in favor of partition...According to the Arab view, the UN decision has no legal status, but this is a meaningless argument. On such issues the UN is the highest authority available. There is no interplanetary court to which its rulings could be submitted. World opinion has given a part of Palestine to the Jews and that is final, so far as it goes."

Five days later, the paper's lead editorial was "Canada Should Recognize Israel." It urged a sharp departure by the King government from its policy of toeing the British line toward Israel.

The writer cited three reasons that "add up to a conclusive case for recognition now." The last sentence of the editorial was: "Canada, in our view, should recognize Israel without further delay and exert whatever influence she may have to secure the speedy concurrence of others."

The Toronto Daily Star referred to the proclamation of a Jewish republic as a "great historic event which causes rejoicing not unmixed with tears among the Jews scattered all over the world." It concluded "Arab and Jew will have to live together in Palestine. They could reap mutual advantage by a policy of cooperation...Long continued armed strife would bring ruin to everybody."

The Regina Leader Post's editorial on May 17, perhaps the most lyrically written of them all, was called "The Promised Land."

"After a lapse of nearly 1,900 years, a Jewish state has risen again in Palestine. The event is almost certainly without precedent in history...None therefore but a Jew can comprehend the tide of emotion which welled upwards through Jewish hearts the world over with David Ben-Gurion's proclamation Friday night...

"Born in blood and confusion, [the new state] is the strange offspring of lofty idealism and basest terror. Devotion and fanaticism, gnarled Polish hands, American funds and science, British tutelage, Nazi beastliness; all these have played their part in shaping the Zionist state. But it is at last in being..."

Rabin, Saddam almost met

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yitzhak Rabin and Saddam Hussein almost had a face-to-face encounter in 1989, a new book claims.

If it had taken place, Israel and Iraq may have established official relations, said Samuel Segev, author of Crossing the Jordan: Israel's Hard Road to Peace (McClelland & Stewart).

Top-ranking Israeli and Iraqi officials launched direct talks in the mid-1980s after Iraq let it be known it no longer opposed Israel's peace treaty with Egypt and favored a political solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, said Segev, an Israeli journalist, in an interview last week.

In 1985 and again in 1986, Abraham Tamir, director-general of Israel's Foreign Ministry, met several times with Tariq Aziz, the Iraqi foreign minister; Nizar Hamdoun, Iraq's ambassador to the United States; and Barzan el-Takriti, Saddam's half brother and Iraq's envoy to the United Nations.

The meetings were held in Paris, Geneva and New York, at a time when Iraq was locked in a war with Iran and wanted Israel to stop arms shipments to Tehran.

According to Segev, a former Ma'ariv foreign correspondent, an American banker of Arab origin, Robert Abboud, proposed the Rabin-Saddam tete-a-tete.

While in Baghdad in June 1989, following the end of the eight-year Iran-Iraq War, Abboud told Saddam that Iraq could not expect large American investments without an atmosphere of peace and stability in the Middle East.

Abboud said that a dramatic meeting between Rabin – then the defence minister in the national unity government – and Saddam might persuade overseas investors to take a second look at Iraq. He said that Azriel Enav, an Israeli businessman and former intelligence officer who knew Rabin well, could arrange the meeting.

Saddam agreed, but only on condition that the PLO representative in Baghdad be invited to take part in the discussion. In case of a leak, Saddam could always claim that the meeting was meant to defuse Israel's conflict with the PLO, said Segev, now a visiting professor of Middle East history at Hofstra University in Hempstead, N.Y.

Since Israel did not recognize the PLO, Rabin vetoed Saddam's proviso.

In the meantime, Rabin had come into possession of reports that Iraq was trying to develop a nuclear capability. In June 1981, the Israeli force had bombed Iraq's nuclear reactor near Baghdad.

As a result of these developments, Rabin backed away from Abboud's proposal. "Rabin feared that Iraq's 'moderation' and the idea for a meeting with Saddam were only a smokescreen and part of a major deception effort aimed to shield Iraq's production of mass-destruction weapons.

"There was no agenda, but you can imagine what could have been discussed: the reopening of the oil pipeline from Kirkuk (an Iraqi city) to Haifa; trade relations; and the beginning of diplomatic ties between Israel and Iraq."

In Crossing the Jordan, which is to be published in May, Segev also discloses that, on the eve of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, King Hussein of Jordan warned the late Israeli prime minister, Golda Meir, that Egypt and Syria were building up their forces along the borders with Israel. They met secretly north of Tel Aviv on Sept. 25, two weeks before the war broke out.

King Hussein, however, was not privy to the knowledge that Egypt and Syria intended to attack Israel in a coordinated offensive in the Sinai Peninsula and the Golan Heights.

At their meeting in Tel Aviv, King Hussein urged the Israeli leader to make peace with Egypt, Segev says.

In 1971, Moshe Dayan, Israel's defence minister, had laid out a plan for the reopening of the Suez Canal, closed by the 1967 Six Day War. The Israeli cabinet rejected Dayan's proposal. "Egypt's president, Anwar al-Sadat, took this idea and expanded it," said Segev. But Israel turned down his proposal.

"Israel made a mistake," he added. "Sadat's plan could have created the momentum for a diplomatic solution and prevented the Yom Kippur War."

Segev, in Crossing the Jordan, says that Israel saved King Hussein's life at least six times in the mid-1950s and early 1960s.

In 1963, at his initiative, he started meeting Israeli leaders secretly on a regular basis. Segev estimates there have been more than 100 meetings between the king and Israeli officials since then.

In another revelation, Segev claims that the Olso peace process actually commenced a month before the Labor party defeated the Likud in the June 1992 election, when a Norwegian diplomat informed Yossi Beilin, a future Israeli deputy foreign minister, that Norway could facilitate negotiations with the PLO.

Once the talks got under way some months later, Norway covered all the expenses.

Segev is of the view that the Oslo peace process has reached "the point of no return." But the Oslo agreements are ambiguous and therefore subject to different interpretations by Israel and the Palestinians.

Israel, he added, has been vague about its final intentions, but the Palestinians have been clear. They want a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Segev believes that Benjamin Netanyahu, the prime minister, will eventually yield about 80 percent of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority, headed by Yasser Arafat.

Segev said that Hafez al-Assad, the president of Syria, "missed the chance of his life to regain the Golan."

Israel had conveyed a willingness to withdraw from the Golan in exchange for certain concessions. But since Rabin declined to publicize his position, Assad refused to meet with him, thereby scuttling the opportunity of an historic breakthrough.

WHEN ISRAEL'S NEWEST SETTLERS arrived almost 50 years ago, the needs were quite basic ... learn the language, learn how to farm, learn how to build. UJA/UIA, through the Jewish Agency was there ... making funds available to help retrain former doctors, peddlers, merchants and shopkeepers.

Over the years the needs have changed. But UJA/UIA continues to help educate Israel's newest Olim. Whether they are engineers from the former Soviet Union or Ethiopian peasants ... all are learning new skills and sharing their expertise, contributing back into Israel's economy.

In the new millennium, it will be Brain Power that will keep Israel strong and independent among the world's nations.

Survivors' contributions lauded

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holocaust survivors – once the slaves of the Nazis – have helped transform Israel into the success story of the 20th century, the community's annual Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah commemorative service heard last week.

Yom Hashoah

Survivors have "injected Israel with life," keynote speaker Naphtali Lau-Lavie told an estimated 2,500 people at the twilight service at Earl Bales Park, near the Yad Vashem Holocaust Monument.

Lau-Lavie, a former Israeli diplomat, adviser to Israeli leaders and himself a survivor, said one of history's great ironies is that Jewish slaves who were forced to stoke the Nazi war machine later went on to build up and strengthen the Jewish state.

The Nazis, he said, precisely calculated the labor value of each Jewish slave at six Reichmarks per day, factoring in the cost of food and "housing," and reckoning the life of the average concentration camp inmate at nine months.

An estimated 100,000 Jewish slave laborers survived the war, said Lau-Lavie, whose brother is Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi, Israel Meir Lau.

Thanks to those survivors, thousands of whom immigrated to Palestine, Israel today is the second highest exporter of high technology in the developed world, he said.

To give an idea of how far Israel has come, Lau-Lavie said that in 1948, the new country's total exports were valued at $35 million worth of oranges. Last year, Israel exported about $35 billion worth of goods and services, mainly in high-tech, he said.

A large tent in the park was packed for the emotional community-wide service, sponsored by 12 communal organizations.

Candles were lit for the six million who perished in the Holocaust, each by a representative of one of the sponsoring groups.

In his greetings, Israel's consul general, Jehudi Kinar, called on the Vatican to "clarify" its stand on the Holocaust in the wake of its recent statement on its culpability during the war years, which many believe was too little, too late.

Dramatic readings and songs in Hebrew, Yiddish and English were delivered.

The K'El Maleh Rachamim was chanted by Cantor Yaacov Motzen of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. A stirring rendition of Elie Elie was given by the congregation's choir.

Rabbi Jerry Unterman, director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, recited Kaddish.

Members of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada and the General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion marched the colors.

Sentinel on a long march

Cynics, people opposed to Israel, and "realists" of course, will argue the matter, pointing for example to the plight of the Palestinians or to the internal stresses within Israel, that the very notion of "a better human destiny" is absurd and a foolish, self-centred idealism, hardly in sync with the cruel, bitter ways of an indifferent and violent world.

But we do not accept that cynical view of human history. No important cause, discovery or advancement was ever achieved by the cynic.

Nor did the truth of the Palestinians' conflict with the Jewish state ever influence the debate in Middle Eastern capitals. Ever since their very first refusal, more than 50 years ago, to coexist with the Jews and their simultaneous embrace of violence as the preferred instrument of discourse, the Palestinian people have been betrayed time and again by their own and by other Arab leaders. Though it is halting and frustrating, the current process of reconciliation between the two peoples is irreversible and will ultimately evolve into an accommodation of mutual dignity and trust.

The stresses, flaws and imperfections within Israeli society are mirrors of the stresses, flaws and imperfections within Israelis themselves. The divisions and the dissensions are not to be understated; nor is their potential for harm to be ignored. But, as we wrote earlier in our special tribute to Israel's jubilee, "In the life of nations, 50 years is nearer to the beginning. Institutions [in Israel] of civic and public life are still maturing, finding their efficiencies, testing strengths and correcting weaknesses, ignoring evanescing patterns but evolving according to the traditions of daily life.

"And if Israel's institutions...are still maturing, it is as a result of unparalleled daring and courage that they exist at all. Israel's rebirth 50 years ago is one of history's great affirmations of the indomitability of the human spirit.

"After 2,000 years, the Jews have returned to Israel, to where they always were. Jews have returned to rebuild and to restore what had long ago been confiscated, destroyed, parched, scorched and seared."

Surely, that is the reason for the quasi-metaphysical, magnetic pull that Israel exerts not only upon Jews, but upon the world.

To celebrate Israel's refounding is, at its very core, to celebrate humanity's ability to dream, to imagine, to achieve; to reach far, high and wide; to overcome; to rise from the ashes; to contend with the gravest adversity; to proclaim in loud, defiant voice, "We shall not die, but live."

Paul Johnson, the British historian and writer, has eloquently described the nature of the uniquely elevating paradigm embodied by Israel. "No people has ever insisted more firmly than the Jews that history has a purpose and humanity a destiny. At a very early stage in their collective existence, they believed they had detected a divine scheme for the human race, of which their own society was to be a pilot. They worked out their role in immense detail. They clung to it with heroic persistence in the face of savage suffering...The Jewish vision became the prototype for many similar grand designs for humanity, both divine and manmade. The Jews, therefore, stand right at the centre of the perennial attempt to give human life the dignity of a purpose."

If the Jewish people stand "right at the centre" of humanity's perennial search for meaning, the state of Israel, in 1998, only 50 years old, stands at the centre of the Jewish people.

And it is in relation to this state that the eternal mission of the Jews coalesces. It is an enterprise altogether human of trial, error; success, failure; laughter, tears; inquiring, acquiring; self-sacrificing, self-absorbed; idealistic, pragmatic; secular and holy. But in this altogether human enterprise, called the State of Israel, there is indeed something more at hand than most journalists can comprehend or even observe.

So, in Paul Johnson's words, be part of "the perennial attempt to give human life the dignity of purpose." Celebrate; do something particularly commemorative; confer a special kindness, for "this is the day that God has created, we will rejoice and take wondrous delight in it."

WISDOM OF THE AGES

"Accordingly, we...hereby declare the establishment of a Jewish state in Eretz Yisrael to be known as the State of the Israel."

Report upholds Kremer's work in war crimes unit

Re: Remarks attributed to Jack Silverstone, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), in an article titled "Government report on anti-Semitism slammed" (CJN, April 2).

Having been the principal target of the allegations of anti-Semitism, I am pleased that Prof. John McCamus' independent review concluded that every allegation was unfounded. However, I am disturbed that, despite the very comprehensive report by McCamus, Silverstone continues to suggest that the unit was not dedicated and that there was inaction during my tenure as director. An objective reading of the McCamus report, leads one to the exact opposite conclusion. A few quotes from the report illustrate my point:

"I have examined portions of 21 final reports on individual cases prepared by members of the Section...(p. 148)

"My review of the individual case reports satisfies me that the (Strategic) Plan was implemented in a thoroughgoing way and that the work done on the individual files was of the 'no stone unturned' variety... (p. 148)

"In sum, I see no basis for the suggestion that Kremer was engaged in an elaborate exercise of 'foot-dragging' in order to subvert the work of the section. On the contrary, he would appear to have exercised his professional judgment in developing a new strategic approach to the work of the section in an attempt to focus resources on the best cases and to maximize the prospects for success in these cases...(p. 153)

"Again these various initiatives were designed to facilitate proper investigation and assessment of denaturalization potential in a systematic and thorough manner...However when the [Finta] decision came down, the Section was well positioned...to switch from prosecution to denaturalization and accordingly, the Section has been in a position to bring a significant number of denaturalization cases in recent years..." (p.172)

The investigation and case development done by the Unit between 1990 and 1995 resulted in the 21 final reports, from which were selected the first 12 denaturalization and deportation cases to proceed to court. (p.152) Before my departure at the end of August 1995, the first four cases were launched and the next four were selected. In anticipation of ministerial approval, which came in January 1995, we did much of the preparatory work for trial on all the cases that we had recommended for denaturalization and deportation proceedings. I can say, parenthetically, that we were also responsible for the preparatory work on the next two cases selected as well.

The report concludes that there was no anti-Semitism affecting the work of the Section, and also states, clearly and unequivocally, that there was a tremendous amount of work done. I would suggest that there is no objective factual basis to question the dedication, commitment and contribution of the Unit between 1990 and 1995, and I would urge Silverstone and the CJC to redirect their energies to supporting the program, instead of attacking it.

Yom Kippur in Great Synagogue in Tunis

I read with a great deal of interest Gerald Schwartz's view of Jewish Tunisia. (CJN, March 26)

I served in Tunisia with the RCAF. In May 1943, we landed in Algiers from England and made our way to Kilrouan in Tunisia. We had an air base there from which our squadron bombed Sicily and Italy in preparation for the invasion of Italy.

I recall visiting Souss and Monastir Sfax when we were given rest and recreation in these towns. Yom Kippur was spent in Tunis at the Great Synagogue, which was packed with Allied troops from all over the world. A sight to behold!

All in all, it was a very exciting and interesting tour of duty, a fascinating country with perfect climate and friendly people.

No seat for mom at this seder

The question, "What's wrong with this picture?" seems to have been accidentally omitted from the "Mendy" cartoon of the family seated at the seder table (CJN, April 2).

The answer is that not only is the mother standing and serving as everyone sits and eats, but there is actually no chair at the table for her."

What kind of Palestinian state?

By Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In November 1947, the United Nations voted to partition Palestine into two states – one for the Jews and one for the Arabs. Israel accepted the plan, and today we are celebrating 50 years of statehood and sovereignty. The Arabs rejected the plan, and they are still suffering the consequences.

Since the 1993 Oslo agreement, however, the Palestinians have been steadily moving towards a belated acceptance of partition. Now, with the peace talks at an impasse, Yasser Arafat has repeatedly announced plans to declare a Palestinian state "with Jerusalem as its capital" next year. This state would include Gaza and all of the territory that came under Israeli control during the 1967 war, without any Jewish settlements or enclaves.

Beyond the territorial demands, which are clearly far beyond any boundaries that Israel is likely to accept, what kind of Palestinian state are we likely to see? According to some views, particularly in western capitals (including Ottawa), as well as among members of the Israeli Labor party, such a state would be a blessing and would provide a foundation for stability in the region. They point to the example of Israel, which used its first 50 years to build a dynamic, democratic and open society, emphasizing economic development and seeking regional stability.

Similarly, once the Palestinians have their own country to build and refugees to absorb, they will be too busy to engage in terrorism, and will have too much to lose, or so the theory goes. In addition, idealistic supporters of Palestinian sovereignty argue that, like other peoples, including the Jews, they are entitled to a state of their own, in which they can define their own destiny.

However, there is a counterview that is far less optimistic. Rather than creating stability, a Palestinian state could become the platform for violence and terrorism directed against Israel and the West. As terrorism continues, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has warned against the "establishment of a terrorist Palestinian state adjacent to our heartland."

Given the evidence to date, the expansion of the existing Palestinian Authority (PA) into a full-fledged state could turn out to be a disaster. Such a state would be prone to violence and civil unrest, with a major role for Islamic radicals and fundamentalists linked to Iran. In 1970, the Palestinians (with Syrian assistance) sought to overthrow the Jordanian government; Palestinian sovereignty would revive this threat, not only to Jordan, but to other pro-Western regimes.

In contrast to Israel, a Palestinian state might quickly turn into a "failed state," similar to Afghanistan, Haiti, Somalia or Algeria. These fragments of former states are ruled by feuding warlords and militias, who use violence and terror against each other and against the civilian population.

Besides destroying the lives of the citizens of these areas, failed states are also bases for international terrorists, drug barons and criminal mafia. In the absence of a central government, there are no police to which to turn for assistance, no health or educational system to speak of, and no central economy. In Afghanistan and Algeria, the chaos has allowed numerous Islamic fundamentalist groups to train in the area and use it as a safe haven.

A failed Palestinian state would be a very dangerous and destabilizing addition to the Middle East, and the warning signs are already in evidence.

Under the control of Arafat and the PLO, the PA has not demonstrated the ability to manage a modern and stable state. This problem goes beyond the corruption, lack of democracy and intimidation. Arafat's "police" have failed to disarm Hamas, and various factions linked to Fatah and the PLO operate without central control. This month, the body of Mohiedeen Sharif, the Hamas leader who masterminded a number of suicide bombings, was found in a bomb factory in Ramallah. The PA first blamed Israel and then claimed that he was killed by other members of Hamas in a power struggle. The truth may never be known, but whatever the case, this incident demonstrates how far the Palestinians are from creating a responsible system of government.

The PA has also failed to create the economic infrastructure that would allow for development and relieve poverty.

Despite the billions in economic aid, jobs have not been created and investors are unwilling to take the risks that are inherent under Arafat's rule. Most of the construction is for the opulent villas on the Gaza shore, owned by the PA political elite.

This sad record does not preclude the possibility that one day, a Palestinian state will be able to provide solutions for its own people and stability for the Middle East. However, this stage has not arrived yet.

Israel's complex past – warts and all

By Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Next Sunday evening, in what has become a weekly ritual during the past four months, I will join hundreds of thousands of other Israelis for a rendezvous with history. In living rooms around the country, people will park themselves in front of their TV sets for the latest hard-boiled look at Israel's past. For most viewers, the 18 segments shown so far have been riveting – or revolting.

Produced by Israel Television, the documentary series is called Tkuma (Rebirth). Its focus is the people and events that have shaped the country's destiny during its first 50 years. Pure unadulterated history is not exactly prime time fare in most countries, but in Israel, Tkuma has captured headlines and high ratings.

Few countries, of course, have packed so much dramatic history into such a relatively short period as Israel. And few countries are home to such a volatile political climate in which emotions and ideological differences are so pronounced.

Each instalment of Tkuma tackles a different chapter of Israel's first half-century. While chronicling the past – the impact of the Holocaust, wars, David Ben-Gurion, the massive Russian aliyah – the producers have not shied away from the less glorious sides of Israel's evolution. The discrimination against Sephardi immigrants, Golda Meir and Moshe Dayan's tragic misreading of Egypt and Syria during the weeks before the Yom Kippur War, the unfair treatment of Israeli Arabs, disputed actions by Israeli soldiers during the intifadah and the Lebanon War, and other rough edges of Israel's history are also examined, making Tkuma far more engaging than the candy-coated birthday portrait some people were hoping for.

Few viewers have been left indifferent. Their reactions have been almost as edifying as the series itself.

The most intense debate so far was triggered by an episode shown this month entitled, On the Path to Terror: My Homeland, devoted to Arab terrorism against Israel. Critics denounced it as pro-Palestinian and insensitive to Israel. The writer/director of the segment received more than 20 death threats by telephone. Communications Minister Limor Livnat denounced Tkuma for "destroying Zionist myths," saying it amounted to "a propaganda film for Israel's enemies." She called for an inquiry, adding, "I don't know of any normal state that would broadcast a series like this."

No less infuriated were members of the public who sent angry letters to the country's newspapers. "Our culture czars, in their unjustified arrogance, have presented a one-sided and warped picture," wrote one Louis Garb to the Jerusalem Post. "As I recall, we are presently celebrating our 50th jubilee, not our 50th yahrzeit…To force feed us unseasoned pottage of unbalanced self-hatred at our party is an example of gross bad taste."

Dan Heth, of Netanya wrote: "On the 50th anniversary of Israel, the decision to show on state television the history of Palestinian murderous terrorism is a national scandal which indicates the sick, masochistic and anti-Zionist conception of the Tkuma producers."

But criticism of the criticism was no less intense. "Tkuma's critics would have preferred a history without Arab refugees, without a military government, without occupation and, indeed, without Arabs at all," wrote Arie Caspi in the daily, Ha'aretz. Broadcasting Tkuma forces us to deal with the moral dimension of the feud, and recall facts we would prefer to forget."

Even a member of the government took aim at Tkuma's opponents. "The pathetic attempts of certain politicians to hide the issues, to take Tkuma off the air, or to apply censorship to it, do not serve their own interests," said Likud MK Ruby Rivlin. "These efforts are likely to cause Israeli youth, exposed to such things for the first time, to feel that Israel has dark chapters in its history that it should hide."

What's all the fuss about? After all, it's only a TV program. Agreed, certain aspects of Israel's past could have been presented in a more balanced, more complete manner. Of course, Tkuma is somewhat subjective, painting in broad strokes and selective in its choice of images and interviewees. How could it be otherwise? We're talking 50 years of action-packed history boiled down to 22 one-hour segments.

Surely, on our country's 50th anniversary, we are mature enough to look at the full picture of our turbulent past, warts and all. It can only be a healthy, if not always comfortable step, in Israel's development.

(Canadians can see a much shorter, English-language version of Tkuma, produced by Israel Television; it will be shown on History Television, on May 12.)

A new relationship

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I fell in love with Eretz Yisrael from the day I first visited it in 1936. That love has matured, but it has never diminished. The most important influence that Israel has on me these days is in my growing awareness that the Jewish future will depend on Israel, yet not exclusively so. In fact, if the prosperity of Western Jews continues, the distance between the two poles of Jewish existence may diminish. Even now, much of secular Israel (which is the majority) is Western rather than Jewish, and many of its citizens have no longer any use for the old Zionist ideal of redeeming the land by sweat of one's brow.

Now there are a quarter of a million foreign workers in the land (not counting Arabs from the territories), and the secular portion of the population aspires to the kind of middle-class life that is measured by economic well-being rather than by Jewish values, of which the majority has no inkling and in which it has little interest. No real opportunity exists at present for the injection of pluralistic religious values into a society that is polarized between a state-supported Orthodoxy and a largely secular majority.

Today Israel still has to contend with external enemies, though its security is no longer at risk. The "enemies" of tomorrow will be internal and will be embroiled in some form of Kulturkampf (the struggle between religion and the secular state). If religious/anti-religious strife should break out in earnest, the secular element will have no positive ideology except for its desire to break the impact the Orthodox have on many aspects of daily life and on the party politics of the state. The latter, in turn, will be sparked by the ideal of a truly Jewish state (rather than a state of Jews), guided by the divinely ordained statute. It is my feeling that, despite their stubborn resistance, the Orthodox will lose the struggle, and the political, social and religious patterns of Israel will be dramatically changed. That transformation will also affect the future of Israel-Diaspora relations. But of course I may be wrong.

Those of us who have chosen to live as part of the Diaspora and enjoy its benefits have a responsibility beyond what we owe to the Jewish future. Having cast our lot with the nation of our choice, we are obligated to support it with all our might. It is a case not of either-or, but rather of both-and. I lived for a quarter-century in the United States and 35 years in Canada and have attempted to contribute to the welfare of both nations. It is nothing for which I expected thanks – on the contrary. This is what I owed to free and hospitable lands.

As Israel turns 50, it will still be concerned primarily with its own needs, but at 75 or 100, in the days of my grandchildren and not-born-as-yet great-grandchildren, Israel may be ready to integrate its wants and hopes with the Diaspora and consider it for the potential that it will continue to have – exiles no more, but part of one worldwide community, flourishing the way it once did. I write, lecture and work for that day.

Taken in part from Rabbi Plaut's More Unfinished Business, published last year.

The Kirshner File

Israel at 50 stands at a crossroad

"Together in pride, together in hope." This slogan, coined for Israel's 50th anniversary celebrations,

By Sheldon Kirshner

has a bittersweet ring to it this week as Israelis look back and reflect on five decades of sovereignty and independence.

Born in war and nurtured on dreams of peace, Israel at 50 presents a study in contrasts: strong yet vulnerable, secular yet religious, unified yet fragmented.

One hundred and one years after Theodor Herzl – the founder of modern political Zionism – foresaw the emergence of a Jewish state in Palestine, Israel stands at a crossroad, the battle for its identity yet to be resolved.

With a divisive conversion bill on hold in the Knesset, Israelis and Diaspora Jews alike wonder whether Israel can maintain its pluralistic and democratic traditions under the mounting pressure of religious coercion.

The bill, if passed, would formally enshrine the Orthodox monopoly of religious life in Israel, the net effect of which would delegitimize Reform and Conservative Jews. If this happens, Israel would cease being a unifying force among Jews, most of whom regard it as the embodiment of Jewish yearning and a riposte to centuries of anti-Semitism, climaxed by the Holocaust.

Even if the bill is finally shelved and a workable compromise is reached, few observers believe that the Orthodox rabbinate, unbending in its interpretation of Judaism and generally contemptuous of non-Orthodox Jews, will come to terms with the Reform and Conservative streams, a minority in Israel but a majority in North America.

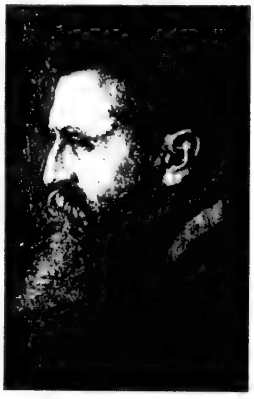
The rector of Bar-Ilan University, an institution closely associated with Orthodoxy, has criticized the growing extremism within the Israeli Orthodox movement. According to a recent poll, two-thirds of Israeli Jews fear that relations between religious and secular Jews will widen in the future.

Even as these words are written, the gap is widening. Ovadia Yosef, the prominent Orthodox rabbi, has declared that Reform Jews should be "cast out" of Israel. Meanwhile, in the past year, zealots have vandalized two non-Orthodox synagogues and a Reform kindergarten, and jeered and roughed up Conservative and Reform Jews trying to hold prayer services near the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

A backlash has already occurred. Last month, Shlomo Gazit, a reserve general in the Israeli army and a Middle East scholar, compared the knitted kipah – the symbol of Jews affiliated with the national religious camp – to the Nazi swastika. Following an uproar, Gazit apologized, but the incident underscored the polarization between secular and religious Jews, the latter of whom are still are a minority in Israel.

If the balance shifts, and the dati become a majority in the next 50 years, there may be demands for not merely a Jewish state, but a theocratic state governed by Jewish rather than civil law.

As Israel observes its golden jubilee, the country, always united in national emergencies, is also torn by serious political divisions. They take the form of sharp disagreements over the current Olso peace process, Israel's best chance in years of developing its economic potential as an economic powerhouse and integrating itself into the region.



Theodor Herzl

The rift, which has grown since the Six Day War, is essentially about land and who will control it. Should Israel, in the interests of peace, give up the bulk of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and let the Palestinians establish a sovereign state there? Or should Israel, for strategic and messianic reasons, keep much of the territories, with all its settlements and military bases, and nip in the bud such an entity?

The debate over this pivotal quandary has preoccupied Israeli politicians for more than a generation now. It has also split households, influenced the outcome of elections, and caused the murder of a sitting prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin.

One of Israel's stellar figures, Rabin was assassinated by Yigal Amir, a religious Jew who sincerely believed that the peace process Rabin had launched in 1993 was a clear and present danger to Israel and a betrayal of Zionism. Amir considered Rabin a traitor because his policy was predicated on the land-for-peace formula, which unwittingly unleashed a suicide bombing campaign by Islamic fundamentalists inalterably opposed to Israel's very existence.

Rabin's assassination, though almost universally condemned by Israelis, was symptomatic of the passions engendered by the debate over the status and disposition of the territories.

On another level, the killing of Rabin resulted in the formation of a conservative Israeli government led by Benjamin Netanyahu, who is wary of the Oslo process, hostile to Palestinian national aspirations and dependent on 23 religious parties for his survival.

Due to Netanyahu's unilateral policies, his party's reluctance to recognize Palestinian nationalism and the inability or unwillingness of the Palestine Authority to rein in terrorism, the peace process that Rabin promoted assiduously hangs by a thread. By way of reaction, Egypt, Morocco, Tunisia, Oman and Qatar, but not Jordan, have frozen their ties with Israel.

And because Netanyahu refuses to cede the Golan Heights, Israel's bilateral negotiations with Syria remain suspended. In the absence of an accommodation with Syria, Israel is mired in a deadly struggle with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, the Israeli army's last active war front.

Although Hezbollah poses no existential threat, Israel, with six wars behind it, is probably the only nation whose existence cannot be taken for granted. Israel has never been militarily stronger. But Iran is building a missile arsenal, while Syria already has one. Iraq can still rattle Israel, as evidenced by the 1991 Gulf War and the recent crisis over United Nations weapons' inspections. Hamas cannot bring down Israel, but is capable of demoralizing Israelis.

Throughout the cycle of war and peace, Israel has absorbed 2.6 million immigrants from all parts of the world, and this mission of ingathering Jews remains its raison d'etre.

Sephardi Jews have constituted a good proportion of the olim. And though they have enriched Israel, there is a consensus that they have gotten the short end of the stick from Israel's Ashkenazi elite. Old resentments flared last year when Aryeh Deri, a Sephardi politician, was cited by the attorney-general for his role in the Bar-On affair. And recently, Shas, a Sephardi religious party, lashed out at the Supreme Court, accusing it of elitism and racism against Jews of non-European origin.

Yet the grievances harbored by Sephardim pale in comparison to those of Israeli Arabs, who comprise about 20 percent of Israel's population.

Political, religious and social problems have not prevented Israel from building a vigorous economy which has given it a Western European standard of living. But poverty persists, with 16 percent of Israelis being classified as poor.

Israel's feats in agriculture are well known, and its network of kibbutzim and moshavim, accomplishments in themselves, have played an integral role in making Israel all but self-sufficient in the production of food. And Israel, whose literacy rate is the highest in the Middle East, is a nation rich in cultural achievements.

But as Israel celebrates 50 years of statehood, internal bickering, external challenges, a crisis in the peace process and the spectre of terrorism dampen the mood of a country whose attainments in nation-building are truly inspiring.

Scroll's history examined

The Mystery and Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls*, by Hershel Shanks (Random House, $35)

Where biblical studies are concerned the Dead Sea Scrolls are the greatest discovery of the 20th century. Starting about 50 years ago – and extending over a period of six years – a cache of ancient manuscripts were found in 11 caves above the northwestern shore of the Dead Sea. Written between 250 BCE and 68 CE, some of the manuscripts were 1000 years older than the oldest known Hebrew texts of the Bible.

Of the 850 or so manuscripts, fewer than 12 were in any sense complete. The rest had to be partially and laboriously reconstructed in jigsaw puzzle-like fashion from as many as 25,000 fragments, some no larger than a fingernail.

More than 200 of the manuscripts came from familiar books of the Hebrew Bible, others were fragments of books known only from medieval copies. But hundreds of them where completely unknown and bewildering in their scope and variety. The author writes, "They included unknown psalms, bible commentaries, calendrical texts, mystical texts, apocalyptic texts, purity laws, and on and on. How to make sense of it all."

Particularly intriguing was the Copper Scroll that described a number of sites of hidden treasure. Was this possibly a cryptic guide to valuables of the Temple of Jerusalem that were secreted to prevent their capture by the Romans? All attempts to locate these "treasures" have been futile.

Where did all of this material come from? Most scholars agree that they originated in a settlement, the remains of which are known as Qumran. This may have been the residence of a small, obscure sect known as the Essenes. It is believed that in 68 CE, in fear of the Roman threat, the library was deposited in the nearby caves.

Among the most important of the scrolls was a Manual of Discipline that described the rules and rites of an ascetic community, led by a mysterious and powerful figure known as the Teacher of Righteousness.

It took an inordinately long time for all of the material to be published. The few scholars originally in control, zealously guarded the precious scrolls and grudgingly made them available to others. Finally in 1991, photographic copies of all the scrolls were made available by the Huntington Library in California.

The author deplores the sensational claims that were made for the scrolls at the time of their discovery. They have not fulfilled extravagant expectations and there was never a conspiracy to prevent their publication lest they undermined the foundation of Christianity.

Nevertheless, the scrolls tell us much about Judaism at the time the Temple still stood in Jerusalem and about the roots of Rabbinic Judaism, the direct ancestor of all major Jewish denominations today. Moreover, the scrolls show that in almost every respect the message of early Christianity was presaged in its Jewish roots.

The author writes "There is no evidence to show a direct relationship between the theology of the Dead Sea Scroll community and early Christians, and there are enough dissimilarities to make a direct connection doubtful. The similarities may simply show that both grew out of the same Jewish traditions."

A unique scroll known as MMT (Migsat Ma'assah Ha-Torah) translated as "Some Precepts of the Torah" indicates why the Dead Sea sect separated itself from the mainstream Judaism of the time. It lists 20 halachot that sets the group apart. It also provides evidence of the nature of lawmaking in the long interval between the final codification of the Pentateuch, possibly in the fifth century BCE, and the next written codification of the Halachah some six centuries later in the Mishnah.

MMT is the only scroll containing practical Halachah that applies to the entire Jewish people in the area of communal life.

Much progress in deciphering the scrolls has been made recently with remote sensing equipment in reading illegible parts of the manuscripts and with a new data base to expedite research.

This relatively brief volume, clearly and incisively written, is a model of insight and information. The author, founder and editor of the Biblical Archeology Review, presents a fully rounded picture of a many-sided drama that includes secret dealings, greed, politics, as well as documents of immeasurable value and interest.

From tragedy to great joy

By RABBI LIONEL MOSES

The piercing wail of the sirens that fills the midday air throughout Israel is the only audible sound as all life stops for a brief moment to pay tribute to the men, women and children who gave their lives to ensure that Israel would become and will remain a democratic Jewish state.

Traffic comes to a halt, children cease their games, adults stop in their tracks. Yesterday, 3 Iyar 5758, April 29, was Yom Hazikaron, Memorial Day, for military personnel who lost their lives in the line of action and for civilians who lost their lives in senseless acts of terrorism.

The disproportionate number of young men who have lost their lives during the past 50 years has left a disproportionate number of young widows and orphans and a statistically exaggerated number of parents who lived to bury a child.

In Israel, where it seems as if everyone knows everyone else, no one has been spared. Is it any wonder that the silence is palpable, broken only by the piercing wail of the sirens?

Miyagon l'simchah, from tragedy to great joy, Me'evel l'yom tov, from mourning to celebration, such is the transformation of Israel from Yom Hazikaron to Yom Ha'atzmaut, the 5th of Iyar.

The model for bridging from tragedy to joyful celebration was already anticipated in the Book of Esther. Not so easily is the bridge made in Israel today. The great victories of 1948, 1956, 1967 and 1973 came at an enormous cost of human life and have been followed by less popular wars with far less clear-cut results – the War of Attrition, the Lebanon Campaign.

Yet, despite the omnipresent reminder of the high cost in human life to create and protect the State of Israel, Israelis and Jews throughout the world will make the emotional transition to celebrate what is nothing short of a miracle – the rebirth of a nation after 1,900 years of dispersion and exile.

Fifty years of Israel's independence is ample reason for Jews everywhere to celebrate. The very existence of Israel in a world that had no place for the Jews barely 60 years ago would be sufficient for us to say Dayenu. But over the past 50 years, we have returned to the land of our ancestors and rebuilt the land in fulfilment of the prophecy of Amos: "I will return the captivity of my people, Israel, and they shall rebuild the waste cities and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards …and make gardens and eat of their fruit."

And during these 50 years, Israel has become a haven for persecuted Jews, and has become a home for Jews already living in freedom who chose to enhance their lives by anticipating the prophecy of Isaiah: "On that day, God will again stretch out his hand…and will gather the remnant of Israel and the scattered of Judah from all four corners of the earth."

But in the final analysis, what will ease the transition from sadness and mourning to the joyful celebration of 50 years of independence for the State of Israel will be the continued hope and expectation that the next half-century will fulfil the final prophecy: "And I will give peace to the land."

Surely, if the land has been settled and cities have been rebuilt and the vineyards and gardens have been replanted, then the final promise of redemption, the promise of peace when "you shall lie down and none shall make you afraid," will also be fulfilled. It is that hope and vision that help mothers and wives and children who mourn today for sons, and husbands and fathers to celebrate tomorrow and to say: "This is the day the Lord made; let us rejoice and celebrate thereon."

Yom Huledet Samayach!

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Israel, of course, is celebrating its 50th – and you're invited to the cyber celebrations.

An incredible number of Internet sites have been created to mark the anniversary. Today, I'll take a look at the main Jubilee Web pages and also visit a great site for kids.

Start off at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' massive Israel at 50 site [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/israel50/]. You'll find links to articles detailing the independence and growth of Israel, a timeline of events, photo-essays and articles on culture, and even one about changes in the country's eating habits. If you are fortunate enough to visit Israel over the next few months and want to attend the festivities, go to Netking Israel50 first [http://www.netking.com/israel50/dbeng.cgi]. It details hundreds of special events being held this year throughout the country. Here are some events scheduled for May: the City of Tel Aviv is hosting a re-enactment of the Declaration of the State of Israel followed by a parade and a festive cantor concert in the Great Synagogue of Tel Aviv.

Nitzanim will hold a memorial for the women of the Israeli military. And world chess champion Garry Kasparov will face off in simultaneous matches against the Israeli national chess team. A piece of advice about this Web site: Use the built-in search engine. Do not print this massive document. I did. And that was 136 pages ago.

If you're looking for celebrations around the world, then visit the Ministry of Foreign Affairs [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/israel50/] site that I mentioned above for international Web links. Toronto's UJA Federation site also offers a comprehensive list of activities for that city [http://www.feduja.org/israel50/calendar/Welcome.html].

Are you organizing an Israel at 50 event this year and still looking for a headline entertainer? Then do your shopping on-line. The Israel 50 Connection offers a Talent Roster [http://www.israel50.com/i50c/list.htm] of some of the most famous Israeli performers available. And you can also take a peek at how much your favorite singing legends charge: Yaffa Yarkoni ($5,000 plus expenses for two), Mike Burstyn ($7,500 for two) and Noa ($15,000 plus expenses for 10 people).

Do you want to share a holiday greeting card with a friend? There's no way that it will get there before the holiday if you pop it into the mail right now. But if your friend has an e-mail address, send him a free electronic postcard [http://www.israel50.org.il/eng/postc.htm]. You can choose from three vintage shots such as a sepia photograph of the Tower of David or two modern shots like Jerusalem blanketed in snow.

Just fill in an address, add your own message and click send.

Finally, make sure you point both your browser and your kids toward Dr. Nurit Reshef's 100 Years of Zionism/Israel's 50th Anniversary Web page [http://bus-nt2.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/zionism/zionism.html]. The Edmonton educator has really outdone herself with a site that both amuses and educates. There are plenty of Java-based games here – everything from assembling the map of Israel on your screen, to a cities of Israel wordsearch game. I really like the prime ministers of Israel quiz that says nachon or lo nachon when you respond correctly or incorrectly.

Next week, we'll continue to celebrate Israel's Jubilee as we take a look at Internet sites that focus on 50 years of history, politics, war and peace.

Peres set to visit Toronto

TORONTO — Former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres is scheduled to be in Toronto on May 13, Lag b'Omer, to address and honor Canadians who served in the Machal – foreigners who volunteered to fight in the 1948 War of Independence.

Peres is slated to appear at Shalom '98, a bash to mark Israel's 50th anniversary, organized by State of Israel Bonds. It will be held at the John Bassett Theatre in the Toronto Convention Centre.

Also scheduled is a celebration of Israel in song and dance featuring the Shalom Dance Group, renowned Israeli singer Yaffa Yarkoni, and the celebrated Israeli singing group Hakol Over Habibi.

According to Israel Bonds, Peres' speech will mark the first time Canadian Machalniks will be publicly honored and thanked for their efforts 50 years ago.

"We are honored that Mr. Peres has chosen this event to publicly recognize the role Canadian veterans played in helping to secure Israel's independence," said George Cohon, Israel Bonds' Canadian board chair.

Shimon Peres

This will be the only Canadian appearance of the Shalom Dance Group, Israel's premier folk dance company. Consisting of 50 dancers, the troupe performs everything from traditional Israeli folk dance to Gypsy dance and tributes to Fiddler on the Roof.

Yaffa Yarkoni is Israel's most recorded female performer, and has sung around the world. Her performances combine song, dance and dramatic sketches, presented in eight languages.

Since 1975, Hakol Over Habibi has performed over 2,000 times around the world with its unique blend of theatrical style based on modern interpretations of Israeli and international music. The group is widely regarded as Israel's best singing ensemble today.

The Board of Aish HaTorah wishes a Mazel Tov to The State of Israel on its 50th Anniversary

Aish HaTorah's Official Statement of Policy

1. Aish HaTorah stands for Jewish education for all Jews everywhere. We seek unity among all Jews. Our goal is to re-ignite Jewish pride by teaching Jews about their heritage and its contribution to humanity. We were founded to combat assimilation, alienation and indifference among Jews.

2. Aish HaTorah believes that the State of Israel is a divine gift. That's why Rabbi Weinberg, a native-born American, chose to found it in Jerusalem and that's why Aish HaTorah has encouraged thousands of Jews to study in Israel and many to make aliyah.

3. The flag of Israel flies from the roof of the Aish HaTorah World Center—the Dan Family Building, every day. We recognize Israel Independence Day and Jerusalem Reunification Day. We do not take these important milestones for granted.

4. Governors of Israel, be they Labor or Likud, have recognized the contribution of Aish HaTorah to the Jewish State and the Jewish people. Indeed, the initial site facing the Western Wall where the Aish HaTorah World Center stands today was awarded to us for the symbolic sum of 1 Shekel by a Likud Government, headed by Prime Minister Menachem Begin. The site of the Aish HaTorah at the Western Wall Educational Center, now under construction, was transferred to us by the Labor Government, under the leadership of the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

5. Aish HaTorah has been endorsed by every Israeli Prime Minister, beginning with the late Menachem Begin. Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu, like his predecessors, Shimon Peres, Yitzhak Rabin and Yitzhak Shamir, has participated in Aish HaTorah's education programs. President Ezer Weizman and the late Chaim Herzog addressed our students and our supporters on many occasions.

6. Most of our students come from abroad for a defined period of time after which they return to the Diaspora (often to be involved in Jewish education). Aish HaTorah staff and students who do settle in Israel are encouraged to fulfill their obligations to the State, including service in the Israel Defense Forces.

7. Aish HaTorah condemns violence against Jews and non-Jews in Israel. We unequivocally oppose violent demonstrations, including stone throwing, flag burning, and other vulgar acts claimed in the name of religion, or any other disrespectful behaviour against the State.

8. We welcome all Jews of all affiliations, beliefs, and traditions to come to learn. We are educators. We explain what Judaism is about. Our goal is to build bridges and encourage dialogue among all Jews.

9. Aish HaTorah's policy and practice is to refrain from endorsing, supporting or involving ourselves in any political issues in Israel. We have no affiliation nor express support for any political party in Israel or elsewhere.

10. There is no Aish HaTorah political policy on the peace process or any other political issue. Everyone is entitled to their own opinion. We don't dictate. Our educational mission is seen as essential by our supporters, who come from all segments of the political and religious spectrum.

Aish HaTorah's business is teaching Jews about Judaism. Period. That's a tall enough order and we embrace the challenge.

Seder held for seniors

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An elderly woman who hasn't spoken in years joined in the singing following a seder for 190 seniors at Temple Sinai sponsored by temple youth and Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS).

"It brought tears to the eyes of one of her family," said Toby Mashkowitz, coordinator JF&CS chaplaincy services, which helped organize bringing the seniors from 15 nursing homes and homes for the aged.

For many of the seniors the free seder was their only trip out for the year, Mashkowitz said. About two dozen or more came in wheelchairs. Some were blind or had little sight.

"It was the biggest seder for seniors in the eight years we've been helping with this event," said Steven Greenwood, Temple Sinai youth advisor. A total of 250 people attended.

About 25 youth from Temples Sinai and Emanu-El supplied and prepared the seder plate items and served the meal, which included a catered main course of chicken. They also set the tables.

One man told Mashkowitz that it is the only kosher meal he has every year.

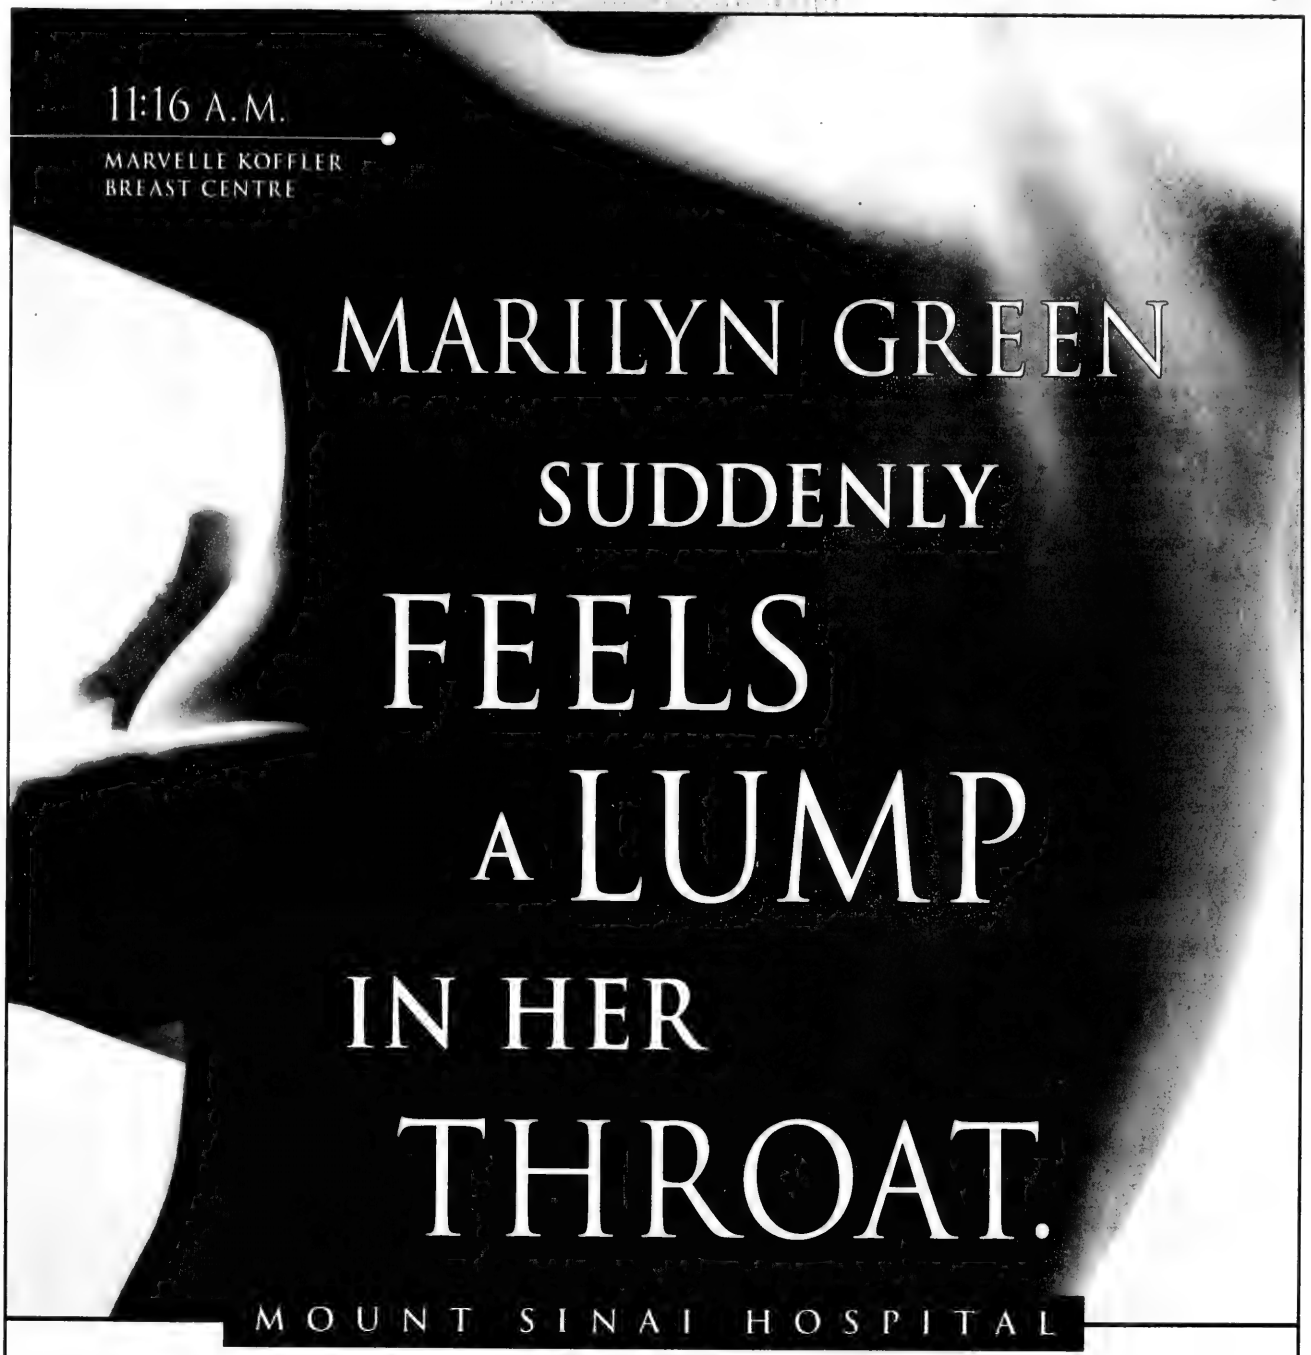
The abbreviated seder led by Temple Sinai youth president Eli Cooper used a special Haggadah. Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of JF&CS chaplaincy services, was among the guests.

Many seniors joined in the dancing led by entertainer Mickey Lewin. Even those in wheelchairs moved their hands in time to the music.

"It was a happy time for everyone," said Mashkowitz.

B'nai Brith drivers who brought some of the seniors were coordinated by Meyer Gordon.

Ten volunteers from HOT (Hands on Toronto) UJA Federation of Greater Toronto also helped out.



MARILYN GREEN SUDDENLY FEELS A LUMP IN HER THROAT.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

Probably nothing to worry about. After all, about 85% of the abnormalities detected by mammography turn out to be benign. But, let's face it, statistics aren't all that comforting.

That's why when someone like Marilyn arrives at Mount Sinai's Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, we treat her fears every bit as seriously as the lump in her breast.

The multidisciplinary team makes it a point to keep patients informed before, during and after any procedure. And they deal with tough questions head-on: How often should I have a mammogram? How much radiation will I be exposed to? Does it hurt?

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL
THE BEST MEDICINE

Of course, our innovative approach to patient care extends through every wing of the hospital. We're recognized world leaders in perinatology, surgical oncology, molecular medicine, gastrointestinal disease and reconstructive orthopedics. And our reputation for patient education is second to none.

The point is, Mount Sinai is an institution that is deeply committed to compassionate care, teaching and research. We must continue to create new facilities to accommodate new and exciting ideas.

Just one of the reasons why we are launching a campaign called The Best Medicine.

Intrater spearheaded founding of DVI

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dr. Alfred Intrater, a well-known Toronto dentist who spearheaded the founding and operation of Dental Volunteers for Israel (DVI), died March 28 of pancreatic cancer. He was 74.

Obituary

Born in Vienna in 1923, his family moved to Palestine when he was 11 years old. He studied dentistry at the French University in Beirut.

In 1948, his graduating year, Arab refugees arrived from Palestine and demanded that all Jewish Palestinian students be thrown out of the American and French universities. The French University, however, allowed the students to graduate.

There was no transportation between Lebanon and Palestine but after graduation, Intrater was able to charter a private Lebanese airplane. The seven Jewish students at the university returned to Palestine the day Israel was declared a state.

Dr. Alfred Intrater [File photo]

Intrater immediately joined the army and fought in the War of Independence.

During his two-year army service, he married Genya Freedman who served in the army as his dental assistant.

In 1950, Intrater was accepted at the French University in Montreal where he completed two years of orthodontics. Deciding to remain in Canada, he entered a three-year program at the University of Toronto for dentists who graduated dentistry in other countries.

On completing his courses, he established a practice on St. Clair Avenue West. Fluent in several languages, he developed a loyal multi-ethnic practice and remained there for more than 40 years.

Intrater was a member of Alpha Omega Fraternity and served as a volunteer dentist at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

As a frequent visitor to Israel, he realized that there was a lack of dental facilities for Israeli children from indigent families. Along with the late Dr. Max Florence, he set up a committee which has provided the clinic with hundreds of dentists who pay their own airfare to Israel and volunteer their services at the dental clinic in Jerusalem.

Over the years, Intrater was involved in every aspect of DVI including the annual fundraising musicales.

Funeral services were held at Beth Tzedec Synagogue. He leaves his wife Genya, daughters and son-in-law Daphne Intrater, and Orna and Gary Spira, and brother and sister-in-law Norbert and Shoshana Intrater in Israel.

Helping Make Israeli Dreams Real For Over Fifty Years

On the joyous occasion of the nation's jubilee year, Bank Hapoalim congratulates the people who have made Israel more than a State of Mind.

For two thousand years, our ancestors dreamed of a place to call home. For the last 75 years, from the early pre-State days, Bank Hapoalim has had the privilege of playing a part in this nation-building enterprise. And we look forward to helping transform today's dream into tomorrow's Israel.

KOSHER SHARES

that in times of trouble or when facing a national challenge, we set aside our differences and act as one people.

The bond between Israel and the Diaspora is vital to our survival. It is what gives the Jewish people strength in the present and confidence in the future.

Not every goal has been attained, not every challenge has been met. As we mark 100 years of modern Zionism and enter Israel's 50th year we must not lose sight of the purpose of Zionism: the ingathering of the Jewish people in the Jewish state.

With Israel's economy developing at an extraordinary pace and with its standards of living approaching that of the most advanced nations, there is every reason for Jews everywhere to consider aliyah. I am certain that a majority of the Jewish people will be living in Israel by the time we celebrate the state's 60th anniversary.

We shall also widen the circle of peace to encompass all our neighbors, narrow the socio-economic gaps in our society and resolve the differences between our religious streams.

Let us not rest on our laurels. But let us also view our magnificent achievements with pride, and feel confident that we will successfully face all challenges and overcome all obstacles.

We are one people, united forever by faith, history and a shared destiny. With best wishes for Chag Samayach from Jerusalem, Israel's eternal capital.

IT'S TAKEN 50 YEARS TO REACH THIS DAY.

AND ALL OF THESE PATRONS TO HELP US CELEBRATE IT.

White supremacist ordered to get counselling from CJC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Ontario Court judge last week ordered a white supremacist convicted of assault to get counselling from an official of Canadian Jewish Congress – a move that caught the official, Bernie Farber, by surprise.

Farber said he had no idea in advance that the judge sentencing Quinn McFarlane would call on him to provide counselling. But he said he would talk to McFarlane and he will counsel him "if there is a sincere willingness on his part to change."

McFarlane, 19, was convicted of assaulting CFTO-TV reporter John Lancaster outside a University Avenue courthouse last year. Lancaster had gone to help a cameraman who was being attacked while shooting footage outside a murder trial. Lancaster suffered a broken nose and teeth in the incident. Crown counsel Calvin Barry had sought an 18 month sentence for the attack.

Though McFarlane denied he was a white supremacist, court was told he has tattoos saying "skin" and "8814." In neo-Nazi circles, the number 88 stands for Heil Hitler (H is the eighth letter in the alphabet) and 14 refers to the14 rules observed by white supremacists.

During the trial, Farber served as an expert witness on the propensity of white supremacists to use violence to achieve their goals. Farber recalled that during cross-examination by McFarlane's lawyer, one of the questions he was asked was whether he would agree to talk to McFarlane. He responded he would "if that was his sincere desire."

"We're prepared to do that," Farber said last week. "Here's an individual who's had a very rough childhood. The judge feels this can salvage him. If there's some hope for Mr. McFarlane and we can help him, we'll do it."

In addition to counselling, Judge Mary Hogan ordered McFarlane to avoid white supremacists, observe a curfew and take courses in anger management and alcohol control. She also ordered him to perform 100 hours of community service and to return to school or get employment.

Hogan pointed out that McFarlane had a history of trouble with the law, including nine previous convictions for assault. She noted he came from a broken home and he suffered abuse and broken bones in a number of group or foster homes.

Lancaster, meanwhile, told the Toronto Star that "I get a punch in the nose and he gets a slap on the wrist."

Bonds Tribute set for June 25

TORONTO — The State of Israel Bonds Gala Tribute in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary will take place June 25 at the Sheraton Centre.

Special guest is actor Gregory Peck, who will present the one-man show, A Conversation with Gregory Peck.

Honored at the gala will be Rose Wolfe, former University of Toronto (U of T) chancellor; former lieutenant-governor Henry Jackman, current chancellor of U of T.; businessman Ephraim Diamond; Maureen Kempston Darkes, president and general manager of General Motors of Canada Limited and vice-president of General Motors Corporation; Isadore Sharpe chair and CEO of the Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts International; Dr. Barry Sherman, chair and CEO of Apotex Inc. and chair of the Apotex Foundation; and Peter Munk, founder, chair and CEO of Barrick Gold Corporation.

Every year, the International Israel Bonds organization in Canada raises investment capital for such projects in Israel as water carrier systems, airports, hydro projects, highways and creation of jobs for new immigrants.

In the past 27 years, the organization has raised $18 billion (US) worldwide. Ten percent of this amount has been raised in Canada, which has less than two percent of the world's Jewish population.

Firm loses Internet access

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Canadian Internet Service Provider (ISP) that hosts extremist Web sites and the telephone company that links it to the World Wide Web are severing their relationship.

Fairview Technology Centre (FTC) will not renew its contract with BC Telecom after the telephone company added terms to its new contract that would require FTC to indemnify it for damages resulting from civil liability.

The move came in the wake of pressure to remove FTC's access to the Internet and following the beating death of Nirmal Singh Gill outside a Sikh temple.

"It's a positive development," said David Matas, B'nai Brith's national legal counsel, "but it's regrettable it took a murder to do it."

"Incitement to hatred is an incitement to violence," Matas said. He pointed out that the five alleged murderers have been linked to White Power, a racist group in British Columbia.

"The involvement of these five individuals in this murder shows the human price of hate speech... You have to act preventatively and decisively now to remove this material from the Internet," Matas said in letters to the Canadian Association of Internet Providers (CAIP) and BC Tel.

Matas had been pressing BC Tel to cut off FTC for hosting racist Web sites. FTC gets access to the Internet through telephone lines provided by BC Tel.

Matas said BC Tel had investigated the sites hosted by FTC and had concluded that some of the material on the sites violated Canada's hate propaganda laws.

Last week, Matas filed a complaint with CAIP, a voluntary organization, that BC Tel had violated its guidelines. But CAIP president Ron Kawchuk said by examining the Web sites hosted by FTC and by referring the matter to the province's attorney general, BC Tel had complied with CAIP's code of conduct.

"BC Tel is not the ISP" and "BC Tel is not responsible for the content" carried by Fairview. As the provincial telephone company, "they're just providing the pipeline" to the Internet, he said.

Law enforcement agencies have primary responsibility for dealing with the issue, said Sol Littman, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Canadian spokesperson.

Littman urged B.C. Attorney General Ujjai Dosanjh to "initiate prosecutions under Canada's anti-hate propaganda laws against FTC and all of the racially motivated Web sites it supports... It is time to lay the charges and bring the matter before the courts."

Michael Elterman, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Pacific region, commended Matas for putting the ball in BC Tel's court. But he agreed the attorney general should lay hate propaganda charges against FTC, which is operated by Bernard Klatt.

"Let's at least apply the Criminal Code to this guy and see how the courts deal with it," he said.

Elterman said Jewish history proves that racist words can lead to racist violence.

In British Columbia, Dosanjh sidestepped suggestions he should lay charges against FTC. "Nearly all the material alleged to be hate propaganda provided to us by BC Tel on this particular site is located in the United States, creating problems of jurisdiction. The legal opinion BC Tel obtained...does not address the evidentiary hurdles posed by this complex issue."

In another development, Interlog, a Toronto-based ISP, last week announced it will terminate the account of Marc Lemire, an employee of Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel, on May 20. In closing Lemire's account, Interlog cited one of its terms and conditions that prohibits, among other things, using Interlog's service for communicating material "which advocates or promotes genocide or incites hatred against any identifiable group."

Zundel case back in court

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lawyers for Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel and the Canadian Human Rights Commission were in Federal Court earlier this week to exchange arguments over whether a human rights tribunal has jurisdiction to hear a complaint against the pro-Nazi propagandist.

The hearing came after Zundel's lawyer, Doug Christie, asked the court to stay proceedings against his client because of a recent Federal Court decision. In a pay-equity case involving Bell Canada and two unions, Judge Donna McGillis ruled the impartiality of a tribunal established under the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRC) is suspect because the CHRC is involved in setting the wages and tenure of the tribunal members.

Zundel is facing a complaint under the Canadian Human Rights Act alleging that he used the Internet to promote hatred against the Jewish people. The complaint was brought by Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron and the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations.

A tribunal established under the Canadian Human Rights Act is hearing that complaint, but it also recently faced a motion by Christie to shut down the case because of the Federal Court ruling. The tribunal is expected to announce its decision on May 11.

Should the motion be dismissed, the CHRC will call two witnesses before winding up its case, CHRC counsel Mark Freiman said.

Christie, meanwhile, has provided him with a list of 20 proposed witnesses for the defence, including media critic Noam Chomsky, historian David Irving and a host of Holocaust deniers, he added.

Beder Remembers First Walk

By Adi Neuberger

You don't have to be young to be a part of the fun and excitement at UJA Federation's Israel 50 Fun Walk, May 24, from Toronto City Hall to Ontario Place. You just have to be young at heart.

And that's just how 91 year old Alex Beder feels nearly 40 years after participating in the first ever UJA Federation Walk in 1970. "I was proud back then and I'm proud today," says Beder, who will be among the thousands of community members converging on City Hall for what will be the biggest Walk for Israel in UJA Federation history.

Registration for the Walk begins at 9:15 a.m. at Nathan Phillips Square. The 5.5 km route then weaves through old Jewish Toronto ending at Ontario Place where the Israel at 50 Festival will be held from 12:00 pm – 5:00 pm.

Beder, who raised $4,000 in 1970, is a little disappointed that the original 22 km route has been significantly shortened, but feels the event is one of the best ways to show the community's solidarity with Israel. "We owe our freedom to Israel," explains Beder, who has been an active and outspoken supporter of Jewish causes and the State of Israel through his work with UJA Federation, B'nai Brith, Holy Blossom Temple and the Soldiers of Israel, an organization he holds dear to his heart.

Alex Beder

"I'm so grateful that I've lived to see Israel's 50th anniversary," says Beder, who was one of the first donors to receive UJA Federation's Golden Giver recognition award, which he still cherishes, along with dozens of other philanthropic honours. Among his other precious mementos is the certificate given to him by Rabbi Gunther Plaut, the 1970 UJA Federation Campaign Chairman. "It was a privilege for me to be a part it all," notes Beder.

This year's Israel 50 Fun Walk begins at 10:15 am. Walkers will receive free admission to Ontario Place for every $25 in sponsorships (maximum four). Those without $25 worth of sponsorships can purchase an Ontario Place pass for $10 or a family pass for $40.

The Israel at 50 Festival will feature several unique attractions, plus live entertainment from 1300 Jewish students, and a huge kosher food court modeled after a kibbutz dining hall.

To obtain sponsorship kits or for more information about the Israel 50 Fun Walk, call the UJA Federation hotline at (416) 631-5700.

Celebrating Israel's 50th at the CNE

For the first time ever, the Canadian National Exhibition will be hosting a special Israel pavilion as part of year long celebrations marking Israel's 50th anniversary.

Nearly two million CNE visitors are expected to tour the Israel at Fifty exhibit which will be housed in the new National Trade Centre from August 21 to September 7.

The Israel at Fifty Pavilion, which will profile every segment of Israeli society, will include: a marketplace showcasing Israeli goods; an Israeli food court; Israel travel and tourism booths; an interactive Negev desert landscape complete with rock climbing and camel rides; a university sponsored research and development exhibit highlighting Israel's advanced technology in a variety of fields; an art gallery featuring works by Canadian artists and a children's museum with everything from craft activities to computer stations.

A 5th century mosaic synagogue floor will make its debut appearance outside Israel under the auspices of the Israel Museum, the Hebrew University, Joey and Toby Tanenbaum and the Royal Ontario Museum. There will also be entertainment for adults and kids including the Yovel and Kramin Israeli folk groups and Canada's Judy and David.

Also available for viewing will be an historic exhibit featuring photographs depicting the birth of Israel, the Palmach's role in the fight for Israel's independence and a mural commemorating 4000 years of Jewish history.

"We want people to learn what Israel is really all about," explains Karen Morton, who is chairing the Israel at Fifty Pavilion. "We want to show them the beauty, culture and warmth of Israel they don't read about in the papers and see on TV."

Israel at 50 festivities take to the Skydome

Canadian singer Amy Sky will be performing at the Skydome on May 17 as part of a special pre-game show paying tribute to Israel's 50th.

The Israel 50 Fun Night, an appreciation evening for UJA Federation volunteers, before the game between the Toronto Blue Jays and the Seattle Mariners, will also feature the Israel at 50 dancers, musical entertainment and a video montage of Israel's history shown on the Jumbotron.

The festivities begin at 7:30 pm. The game starts at 8:00 pm. Tickets to the Israel 50 Fun Night are just $10 – half the regular price of $20.

Blocks of tickets are available for all Israel at 50 Consortium members. To order (minimum of 20) call the Consortium organization to which you belong. Orders must be received by May 6. Tickets will be available for pick-up at the Lipa Green Building, 5th floor, between May 11-15.

"We're very excited about being able to both reward our volunteers and celebrate Israel's birthday at the Skydome", says UJA Federation 1999 Campaign Vice-Chair Abe Glowinsky. "It's a fabulous way to set an enthusiastic foundation for the upcoming campaign."

The Israel 50 Fun Night with the Toronto Blue Jays is being sponsored by UJA Federation, the Toronto Sun and the Israel at 50 Consortium.

HOLOCAUST CENTRE TO EXPAND

A surge in demand for Holocaust education material is propelling the expansion of Canada's largest collection of resources documenting the horrific destruction of six million Jews in Europe.

Over 500,000 visitors have passed through UJA Federation's Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto since it opened to the public in 1985. More than two-thirds of the Centre's visitors are non-Jewish. Each year thousands of students from hundreds of Ontario schools tour the museum and hear from one of more than 50 survivors who lecture at the Centre.

Don Sharp, who teaches grade 11 and 13 political science at Peterborough Secondary School, was part of the first group of 22 Canadian teachers to visit the Centre in 1985.

"It was extremely emotional," recalls Sharp, who continues to bring his students to the Centre twice a year following his two-week course on the Holocaust. "The students leave being sensitized to what the Jewish people went through, and as a teacher, I'm glad to have this tremendous vehicle of knowledge to benefit from."

"There has been an enormous increase in interest about the Holocaust in recent years," notes Michael Herman, Chairman of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto. "The new initiatives we're about to launch will help us meet the growing needs in the community for more information and more access."

The Centre's Education Consultant, Dr. Carole Ann Reed, will be heading many of the new initiatives to expand the Resource Centre. They include annexing more space to house the Centre's growing collection of books, videos, film, documents and audio tapes; developing high school curricula, courses, and information packages; working with other communities to plan Holocaust education programs; and, embarking on a fundraising campaign.

"I'm amazed at the scope of opportunities to transmit lessons from the Holocaust for healing as well as for outreach and education," explains Reed. "We want to make sure Holocaust education remains relevant and accessible for future generations."

The Centre's spectacular growth took place under the directorship of Pnina Zilberman, who has moved on to other endeavours.

GREENING UP FOR SPRING

Healthier living is the focus of the annual Social and Political Action program next month, sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation.

Green Up Your Act: Creating a Healthier Home Environment, May 11, at Adath Israel Synagogue, 37 Southbourne, will feature environmental health expert Nita Chaudhury, Pollution Probe's Dr. Ian Morton, Dr. Lynn Marshall from Women's College Hospital and Jewish educator Rachael Turkienicz.

"We have an obligation to take care of our environment," explains Lori Disenhouse, who co-chairs the S&P program with Miriam Rosenberg. "The environment is definitely a Jewish concern because Tikkun Olam is all about making things right in the world," Disenhouse adds.

The panel discussion, moderated by TV host/producer Jane Hawtin, will cover a wide range of environmental issues, including the Jewish perspective on environmental responsibility, health concerns commonly associated with the environment, and community advocacy to bring about stricter regulations.

Ian Morton, Director of Environmental Health at Pollution Probe, is particularly concerned about environmental hazards in the home, including air quality, moisture levels and lighting. "We spend over 90% of our time indoors and 65% of that time in our homes," explains Morton. "We need to make sure these environments are as healthy as possible."

Attendees will also be able to collect information about products displayed at tables before the 8 p.m. program, which is being co-sponsored by UJA Federation Women's Campaign. Doors open at 7:30.

Jane Hawtin

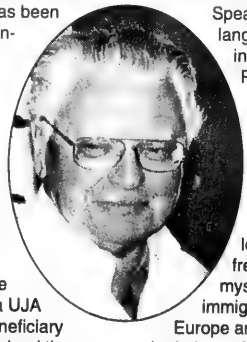
"We want people to walk away feeling educated and empowered to make positive changes," says Disenhouse.

Admission is $5 at the door. For more information or to RSVP call (416) 635-2883 ext 135.

Volunteer Views

For Jerry Blitzer, tzedakah is about helping people to help themselves. That's why, for the last seven years, he's helped hundreds of community members start new businesses and become self-sufficient at the same time.

After retiring from his own lumber business in 1990, Blitzer, who has been an active volunteer in the Jewish community since he was a teenager, began to focus his attention on the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa. Since 1924 the Loan Cassa, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, has helped thousands of community members improve their lives through interest free personal, business and educational loans.



In 1997, the Loan Cassa dispersed more than $1 million to over 400 clients, many of whom are single parents, elderly with limited retirement income, or unemployed and/or facing personal crisis.

"We're the last resort for many people who come to us for help," explains Blitzer. "By the time they approach us, the banks, their friends and/or family have already said no."

But although he and many of his fellow Loan Cassa volunteers conduct their monthly interviews with a compassionate ear, Blitzer, who recently finished a two year term as Chair of the Business Loans Committee, says "a sound business plan is what we're looking for."

Speaking several languages including Russian, Polish, Hebrew and French also helps Blitzer assist many applicants who are new arrivals to the community, looking for a fresh start. "I myself was an immigrant after I left Europe and I appreciated the help my family received from communal agencies."

Blitzer says although his work with the Loan Cassa benefits others, it gives him a reason to get out of the house now that he's fully retired. "My wife says I married you for better or for worse — not for lunch."

For more information about the Loan Cassa or other volunteer opportunities available through UJA Federation call Shelly Rotman at (416) 635-2883 ext. 137.

50 Years of Achievement

May 14, 1948. A landmark moment that changed Jewish history forever. And even though David Ben-Gurion declared the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, UJA Federation's helping hand was felt long before the country's independence.

In 1938, the Jewish community had a vision to create a central fundraising campaign to deliver local services for people in need. The United Jewish Welfare Fund, the predecessor of UJA Federation was established and provided staff, volunteers and expertise for fundraising in the Jewish community.

After Israel's independence, the Welfare Fund entered into a partnership with the Zionist Organization of Canada to operate a unified campaign for both local and overseas needs - United Jewish Appeal. And throughout the decades, UJA Federation has stood side by side with Israel in times of jubilation and sorrow.

Today, through The Jewish Agency funded by UJA Federations across North America, nearly 800,000 new immigrants from the former Soviet Union have moved to Israel. Partnership 2000 has joined Torontonians and Israelis to develop the region of Eilat/Eilot. The Canada Centre in Metulla, built by Canadian contributions, houses Israel's first Olympic sized skating rink and is used by thousands of Israelis and residents of southern Lebanon. Through triumph and tragedy, UJA Federation has helped to shape the destiny of Israel and the Jewish people.

The following photographs capture some of the poignant moments that UJA Federation has shared with our Jewish homeland.

Murder of Sikh condemned

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

SURREY, B.C. — Following the recent arrest of five young white skinheads for the murder of an elderly Sikh, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Pacific region, called for British Columbians to "stand together against those whose racist ideology results in abhorrent crimes motivated by hate."

In a letter to Balwant Singh Gill, president of the Guru Nanak Sikh Gudwara, Dr. Michael Elterman, chair of CJC, Pacific region, said his organization expressed its solidarity on behalf of the Jewish community.

"As a community that has been targeted for hate throughout the generations, we stand together with you in condemnation of this violent crime," Elterman said.

"Racial hatred and bias must not be allowed to go unchecked in our society," Elterman noted in the letter. "By prosecuting the perpetrators of this crime to the full extent of the law, British Columbians will send a clear message that hate crime has no home in our province."

The hate crime in question is the murder of 65-year-old Nirmal Singh Gill. The caretaker of Guru Nanak Sikh Temple in the Vancouver suburb of Surrey, Gill was bludgeoned to death Jan. 4 before dawn, just after he had opened the gates of the temple for morning prayers. The caretaker lived with his wife in a seniors centre adjacent to the temple.

Skinheads arrested

The five young men are accused of second degree murder in Gill's death. Sporting shaved heads and wearing short-sleeved T-shirts, they made a brief appearance in a Surrey courtroom on April 23. The accused include four adults and a 17-year-old. They are Robert Kluch, 20 and Radoslaw Synderek, 22, of suburban Delta; Daniel Miloszewski, 20, of Surrey; and Nathan LeBlanc, 25, of Vancouver. The juvenile, a resident of suburban Port Moody, cannot be named under the provisions of the Young Offenders Act. The four adults agreed to postpone the hearing to May 6, to give their lawyers time to prepare a defence.

The crowded, tense session took place in Surrey's most secure courtroom, where spectators are separated from the proceedings by bullet-proof glass. The hearing was attended by members of the Guru Nanak temple, including temple vice-president Sadhu Singh Samra and community leader Sukhi Sandu. They called the beating an isolated tragedy and appealed for calm.

Also in attendance were several white supremacist supporters, including Karl Nordstrom, a young computer programmer who describes himself as a white nationalist. Nordstrom acts as B.C. head of the neo-Nazi Heritage Front, which reportedly has 50 members in British Columbia.

Surrey, where the murder took place, is a sprawling, rapidly growing city of 350,000 southeast of Vancouver. Many of the immigrants to the Lower Mainland in recent years have settled in Surrey and in such suburbs as Delta and Port Moody. Approximately one-half of Surrey's residents are members of a racial or ethnic minority.

Tensions have occasionally erupted in Surrey and in other parts of the Lower Mainland, and the presence of several "white power" organizations has been reported. The RCMP alleges that the accused were members of one of these groups.

Holocaust Education Symposium draws over 1,000

By SUZANNE KORT
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — More than 1,000 high school students from across Vancouver Island participated in Victoria's sixth annual Holocaust Education Symposium held recently at the University of Victoria.

Holocaust survivors, several of whom were children during the war, lit yahrzeit candles and shared stories of devastation and courage. Students also watched films, asked questions, and participated in a workshop on stereotyping led by Bernie Farber, executive director, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

David Katz, a psychologist for the Greater Victoria School District, organized the program along with other members of the Victoria Holocaust Education Remembrance and Education Society. Marilyn Berger, associate director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, facilitated the event.

Robbie Waisman, a child survivor, who was interned in Buchenwald, gave students "glimpses of what it was like to live through the Holocaust and to become a human being again afterward." He said recovering from the war was as difficult as surviving it for children who, like himself, witnessed "...humanity destroyed before their eyes."

He said that although it was not easy to speak about his experiences, he chose to do so to help students avoid the mistakes of those "who looked the other way" during the Holocaust.

He screened the film You Are Free, which details his camp's liberation. In the film, Leon Bass, an African-American veteran, recalls how camp inmates reached out their hands in disbelief when his platoon helped liberate Buchenwald.

Waisman said that Bass was the first black person he had ever seen. He touched the American soldier to see if he was real.

Bass said that the shock of meeting the camp's skeletal inmates convinced him that "suffering is universal." An excerpt from CBC's The Journal showed an adult Waisman in Philadelphia bestowing an award on Bass for his role as a liberator and humanitarian. "Your pain is my pain," responded Bass, a high school history teacher.

The Victoria Holocaust Remembrance and Education Society's Web site, [http://www.veritas.nizkor.org/~hopesite/], offers educators information on teaching the Holocaust.

The Web site says that the study of Holocaust history "...helps students develop an awareness of the value of pluralism, and encourages tolerance of diversity in a pluralistic society."

Students at previous symposia, say in the Web site, "The past can repeat itself, even when most everyone hates that part of the past. That's why it is important to keep an open eye, and not a turned head."

Police lay charges in cemetery vandalism

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

ST. CATHARINES — Police here are treating last Saturday's desecration of the B'nai Israel cemetery as a hate crime.

Forty-three tombstones were toppled or damaged, windows were smashed and flower beds trampled in the incident. Damage has been estimated at between $5,000 and $8,000.

"We believe there is evidence that this was a hate crime," Niagara Regional Police Superintendent K.R. Davidson told The CJN on Monday morning.

Police say the suspect has a number of neo-Nazi affiliations, including hate groups such as White Power, the Hammerskins and Aryan Resistance.

The suspect also sports a swastika tattoo, Davidson added.

Police have seized a large quantity of hate literature from the suspect's home.

According to Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC), hate as a motivating factor in a crime allows courts to impose stiffer sentences.

An alert citizen called police after he spotted a man damaging headstones at the Bunting Road cemetery around 7 a.m. last Saturday.

Police recovered pieces of steel with protruding spikes.

The 150-family Jewish community here was reassured by the quick arrest of a suspect.

Samuel Walters, president of B'nai Israel Congregation, said the community was upset but has been calmed by the swift arrest.

Congress noted that the timing of the incident could be significant, given Yom Hashoah and Israel's 50th anniversary. In white supremacist circles, Adolf Hitler's birthday – April 20 – is also marked.

Warren Michael Soles, 20, of nearby Thorold, is charged with mischief over $5,000, attempted break and enter, and possession of a dangerous weapon – brass knuckles edged with blades.

He was scheduled to appear in court on Tuesday for a bail hearing.

Rabbi Martin Applebaum of Congregation B'nai Israel requested permission to address the judge in the case, in order to ask that Soles be denied bail.

"This was an assault on society and humanity," Rabbi Applebaum told The CJN, adding that repairs to the cemetery have begun.

Service draws mix of young and old

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The annual Shoah memorial service at the Holocaust monument beside the Manitoba Legislature this year drew a mix of old and young, including classes from all three Jewish elementary programs in the city and some past participants of the March of the Living.

Yom Hashoah

As has been the case for the past three years, the service was preceded by B'nai Brith Canada's And Unto Every Person, There is a Name, the recitation of the names of individuals lost in the Holocaust whose surviving family members settled in Winnipeg after the war.

Speaking for Winnipeg's survivors, Barbara Goszer commented on the growing number of people and, in particular, younger people, who are attending Yom Hashoah Awareness Week programs. Goszer, the immediate past president of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, was hidden during the war and escaped the horrors of the concentration camps. She never learned where or how her parents died, she noted.

Goszer praised the work of educator Hersh Zentnor (who was unable to attend the service due to illness) for his unstinting efforts to bring the lessons of the Holocaust to Manitoba schools.

"Hersh brings magic to the classroom," she said. "Together, we have been to schools in every corner of the province, teaching tolerance and trying to repair the world."

Goszer and Winnipeg Jewish Community Council president Larry Hurtig both mentioned the new Holocaust Education Centre, which will be officially opened at the Asper Jewish Community Campus on May 3. The centre will have exhibits and teaching materials meant to raise awareness of the Holocaust and to fight against all forms of racism.

Hurtig also spoke of efforts to combat hate on the Internet, noting that the Simon Wiesenthal Centre is creating the largest Web site on the Internet to counter the activities of hate groups using the medium.

Pauline and Rudy Lowenstein were asked to place flowers on the memorial. Rudy was on the last kindertransport to leave central Europe for England. Daniel Thau-Eleff and Adam Potash, grandsons of survivors, who participated in the 1996 March of the Living, recited Kaddish.

The week's activities began with the traditional memorial service at the Bnay Abraham Synagogue.

Ross wins defamation case against cartoonist Beutel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Saint John cartoonist and illustrator Josh Beutel is considering whether to appeal a New Brunswick court decision that awarded former Moncton school teacher Malcolm Ross $7,500 in damages for defamation.

Beutel told The CJN "I was certainly surprised and disappointed" in the decision by Court of Queen's Bench Judge Paul Creaghan that found he had libeled Ross through an illustration that depicted the former teacher as a Nazi.

The judgment may create a libel chill among cartoonists and other commentators, Beutel said. "It's a concern."

In Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress urged Beutel to appeal. Keith Landy, Congress' honorary legal counsel, said if Beutel appeals, he will recommend to Congress' executive that it seek intervener status in the case.

The court decision has the potential to create a chill on those responding to those who would vilify the Jewish community, he said. "It can place limits on our ability to respond to hate propaganda. Congress wants to be able to respond to racists in the strongest possible language without fear of being sued for defamation."

The incident that sparked Ross' defamation suit took place in Saint John on May 6, 1993 when Beutel was invited to make a presentation at a workshop of the New Brunswick Teachers' Association Social Studies Council. The subject of the workshop was related to Jewish history and focused on the Holocaust and anti-Semitism.

Beutel's presentation and the resulting discussion characterized Ross as a Nazi and compared his views to those held by Hitler, Goebbels and other leaders of Nazi Germany, the court stated.

Beutel had defamed Ross through his presentation but could escape liability if he showed it was fair comment based on true facts, Creaghan ruled. The judge accepted Beutel's contention that Ross was indeed a racist and that he held anti-Semitic beliefs. But he pointed out that Ross, who credits a strong belief in Christianity for his views, strongly denied he is a Nazi.

"He points to the Nazi philosophy as being anti-religious and as such, the antithesis of his position," Creaghan stated.

"I find that Ross' views are founded on his personal religious beliefs and not in any substantive way on Nazism. He may have unknowingly, or even knowingly, picked up some ideas from current Nazi sympathizers, but to take as a fact that Malcolm Ross is a Nazi goes too far. To suggest that Ross would advocate a policy of extermination as a solution to what he perceives as a spiritual battle against Judaism has not been established as fact."

"Upon preliminary reading we find this judgment...to be offensive at worst and perplexing to say the least," said Congress president Goldie Hershon. "His decision makes alleged religious belief a rationale for hatemongering, a concept that has been rejected by the Supreme Court of Canada in a previous case concerning Ross."

"Ross is a well known bigot whose anti-Semitic views are read and used as gospel by Canadian neo-Nazi leaders," said Victor Goldberg, chair of Congress' Atlantic region. "To hand him $7,500 in damages is a miscarriage of justice."

Reform shul seeks new home

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

ST. CATHARINES — In pursuit of a dream, Veronica Balaj is hoping to raise enough money to build a new Temple Tikvah, a Reform congregation that now meets in rented quarters in a church.

Balaj's father, Paul Szmuk, a native of Romania, lost his first wife, first-born son and several brothers and sisters in the Holocaust. In 1983, her father died in Israel, where the family had immigrated. His family was Orthodox.

"My father was an atheist and my mother Reform, and I had no religious education in Romania. Now I would like to give something back, in memory of my parents and for the future of my grandchildren," Balaj said in a telephone interview.

She is vice-president of Temple Tikvah, which has a membership of 30 families and holds services at St. George's Anglican Church, a landlord who, she said, has treated them well.

The temple's spiritual leader is Mike Wierzba, a member of Temple Solel in Mississauga, whose daughter, Ellen, was Temple Tikvah's rabbi for three years.

Balaj's husband, Michael, a Christian, is a machine operator. They have two teen-age children.

She believes a new Temple Tikvah would attract many unaffiliated Jewish families in the Niagara region, which has no Reform congregation.

"Some of the potential members have told me they do not like the idea of services in a church, that they would rather go to a rented hall in an industrial mall, but I think a new temple is needed."

Unaffiliated families in Welland, Fonthill, Niagara-on-the-Lake and other places in the region would join, she says.

"Even when I first came to St. Catharines 12 years ago, there were 50 families in the temple. But interest has dropped off and at our services every second Friday night, we sometimes have only seven families present. But that has improved lately because we are busy phoning people to come out."

A new temple in a good location would cost $700,000 to $800,000, she estimated.

Another option would be to buy an old house for $150,000 to $180,000 and renovate it.

The final decision depends on how much money is raised, she says.

She has sent an appeal for help to Jewish organizations in Canada and the United States.

דער וואַטיקאַן בעט מחילה. . .

פון אַלעק סילווער (טאָראָנטאָ)

די קאַנפערענץ פון דייטשע קאַטולישע ביסקופּן האָט אַרויס-געגעבן א דערקלאַראַציע אין 1995, צום יאָרטאָג פון דער באפרי-אונג פון אושוויץ, אין וועלכן עס ווערט געמאַכט: „דער פאקט וועגט היימט שווער אויף אונדזערע גדאַנקען, אַז עס זיינען געווען בלויז איינצלנע (מיין אַנטערשטרייכונג, א.ס.) אינציאַטיוון צו העלפן די פאַרפאָלגטע יידן. קריסטן האָבן נישט אַרויסגעווינן קיין שטאַרקן ווידערשטאַנד צום ראַסיסטישן אנטיסעמיטיזם".

בי אונדז יידן זאָגט מען: „לא המדרש עיקר אלא המעשה". אין, לויט מיין מיינונג, נאָך נישט געקומען די זייט זיי מוחל צו זיין. לאָמיר קדים קָל זען, וואָס עס וועט פון דעם אַרויסקומען.

Jewish fraternity chapter launched at U of T

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tau Omega at the University of Toronto (U of T) is the newest "colony" of Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEII), a Jewish fraternity founded in New York in 1913.

First-year Commerce student Harley Gold, Tau Omega's president, was among the chapter's eight "founding fathers" who started the ball rolling at a Jewish Students' Union (JSU) event last fall. There are now 10 "brothers," and Gold hopes to have double that number of members next year.

Although an AEII chapter was active at U of T in the late 1980s, it became dormant in 1991, said Gold.

The new colony is one of 106 altogether, five of which are on Canadian campuses (at McGill University jointly with Concordia University, at McMaster University, the University of Western Ontario and York University). Gold expects Tau Omega will become a full-fledged chapter next year, based on its activities and an increasing membership.

AEII allows no hazing, noted Gold. He and the other new members were initiated at the University of Western Ontario in January in a ritual ceremony.

Tau Omega basketball players (including at least one potential member) take a break from the action at a recent event. Colony president Harley Gold is kneeling at front left.

"Alpha Epsilon Pi strives to help each student develop character, team responsibility and cultivate a proper set of values," wrote Gold in a letter to prospective supporters. "Creating better men is our chief goal."

Tau Omega, which meets weekly at the JSU, is involved in community service – such as a recent Passover food drive in conjunction with York University's Eta Pi chapter of AEII – as well as athletic and social events.

"We work at a food bank at the women's centre at U of T. We also have poker nights, movies and intramural basketball. We're looking to raise money for charity," said Gold, adding that Tau Omega activities will continue over the summer.

"We want to create a great brotherhood," he said. "We want to let people know we're alive and things are going [on]."

The colony has a Web site at [http://www.geocities.com/CollegePark/Library/4225/].

When the state was declared...

By ADINA ESHEL

Friday, May 14, 1948 seemed like any other spring day in Palestine, perhaps a little warmer. However, we, the Palestinian Jews, hoped it was going to be a very different day.

Until that day, the words "a Jewish State" had spelled a dream, a dream that had passed from one generation to another for almost 2,000 years, generations that kept praying every day: Vetechezena eineynu beshuvcha leZion berachamim (and may we live to see your merciful return to Zion).

It was the dream of our generation in particular, after having been through the horrors of the Holocaust, and having seen the British Mandatory Power turn from a reasonable foreign ruler into a vicious cruel enemy, the famous British Navy, with its modern battleships, tracking down on the high seas the miserable Holocaust remnants, as they were trying to return to their ancient homeland, in tiny shaky boats.

Then, at long last, the day came. The day of the Declaration of Independence. The location of the ceremony due to take place just before Shabbat was kept a secret, as war was already raging throughout the country. Jaffa had been taken only shortly before and Arab snipers were still targeting Jewish pedestrians in Tel Aviv on the streets adjacent to Jaffa. Gush Ezion, the buffer-zone of Jerusalem, was falling to the Arab Legion as the day went on. It was a reasonable possibility that a car bomb could be planted near the convention place, as many high ranking Zionist leaders were due to participate in the historical event.

It was an open secret, however, and some Tel-Avivis got wind of the location, perhaps because of the massive preparations that were going on there. They gathered outside Dizengoff House on Rothschild Boulevard and waited.

Others, who did not know about the location, went about their Friday chores almost as usual.

People who owned a radio – and not everyone could afford one in those days – opened it on full volume so that their neighbors could hear the announcements regarding the ceremony and the long-awaited ceremony itself. Nobody was sure it was going to take place, as the Americans, who had retracted their support for the partition plan, were pressing David Ben-Gurion to postpone the declaration. We could only hope he would be strong enough to withstand the pressure.

I was a fifth grade high school student at the Herzlia Gymnasium in Tel Aviv, still situated in its beautiful old building near Jaffa. Due to the fighting in Jaffa, we had been excused from school until things improved.

On that day, I was sitting impatiently by the radio, listening to the announcements and the Hebrew songs in between. My mother kept asking me to go to the ice factory and bring half a block of ice for Shabbat, but I postponed it from one hour to another, clinging to the radio. Needless to mention that small transistor radios were not yet even heard of, at least not in Palestine.

At about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, my mother told me that if I did not go right away, we would remain without ice for Shabbat, which meant all the food my mother had prepared would be spoiled. (At the time, we still had an old fashioned ice box.)

I had no more excuses. I took the large tweezers used for carrying ice and started off towards the ice factory on King George Road.

We lived on Bilu Street; so I walked up Hashmonaim Street towards Rothshchild Boulevard and then down the street towards King George Road. The way downhill was easy and in a little while, I reached the ice factory – and my heart sank.

A long queue was formed well into the street, despite the relatively late hour. People clearly anticipated trouble and were accumulating ice blocks, and probably food as well. I regretted not having listened to my mother earlier, or I could have gone several times and brought several pieces of ice.

I queued up behind an elderly man, who told me there was actually no more ice and the factory was producing new ice blocks as we were standing there. I heard the familiar noise of the machines, which confirmed his words.

We felt tension in the air. Would he dare to declare or would he not? Some were positively sure he would, others were just as sure he would not.

"He," was of course Ben-Gurion, the charismatic Zionist leader, head of both the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency. The long queue proved that many people expected him to declare. After about an hour, it was my turn to win my piece of ice. I already knew I would not get half a block. Shabbat was nearing and they could not manufacture more ice; so everyone got a quarter of a block only. When I meekly asked for half a block, the man with the ice pike answered curtly that I could not get more than the others did.

"But we have a baby at home," I cried out, remembering the milk my mother had saved for my baby brother. The man's hand, holding the ice pike, remained in the air. Then, without uttering a word, he cut a third of the block, took my tweezers, got a firm hold of the ice and handed it to me with not so much as a smile.

A man standing next to him stretched out his hand for the money. I paid him, thanking the man who had cut the ice for his generosity and began to make my way up the street towards home.

A third of an ice block was, of course, less heavy than half a block, but it was still heavy enough, particularly when I was carrying it uphill, and its sharp cold edges were scratching my legs. I went as fast as I could, hoping to make it home for the declaration.

All the radios in the houses along my way were turned on and could be heard loud and clear. I stopped every now and then to listen, as did many others who happened to be on the street or who did not own a radio. I switched the ice from one hand to the other as I was walking, thereby bruising both my legs.

When I suddenly heard Ben-Gurion's familiar voice, I stopped near an open window, my heart beating like mad. I heard his words very clearly; he was speaking about the Jewish people in Eretz Yisrael and about the Holocaust.

My eyes filled with tears. He did it! He withstood the American pressure!

I kept going up the street and stopped again, just before the corner of Rothschild Boulevard, near an open window through which I heard Ben-Gurion's voice uttering the words I awaited, the words the entire Jewish people had awaited, for so long: "We hereby declare the establishment of a Jewish State in Eretz Yisrael – to be named the State of Israel."

Tears kept streaming down undisturbed, and the melting ice kept dripping on my feet ceaselessly.

I waited for Ben-Gurion to finish reading the Declaration of Independence. When I heard the loud applause coming both from the radio and from the people on the street, I began running down the street towards home, the dwindling piece of ice swinging in my hand and bruising my legs.

Suddenly I stopped, bursting out in laughter, my face wet with tears. "You must have just witnessed the most important event of your lifetime," I told myself. "What will you tell your children and grandchildren when they ask you where you were and what you did, on that historical day when the independence of the Jewish State was declared?"

"The truth, the complete truth," I told myself. "I was carrying the remainder of a third of an ice block, listening to the declaration through open windows along Hashmonaim Street, warm tears flowing from my eyes and cold drops of melting ice dripping on my feet."

SIGNPOSTS OF A NEW NATION

With the birth of the state came certain proofs of its existence, such as, clockwise from left, new recruits raising the flag; the first session of the first Knesset; and the inexpressible grief of a mother mourning the loss of her young, soldier son. Fifty years of friendship:

By BRIAN MORRIS

At Israel's founding 50 years ago, there was some popular sympathy among Canadians for Zionist aspirations, but bilateral ties between the two countries were limited. Over the subsequent five decades, relations have blossomed in many ways, premised on mutual respect, shared commitment to democratic values, common interests, friendship and understanding. The following is a brief historical sketch of Canadian-Israeli bilateral relations over the past 50 years.

Political Relations:

In 1947, Canadian diplomats found themselves at the centre of the debate over the future of the British Mandate in Palestine. Under-secretary of state for External Affairs Lester B. Pearson was instrumental in facilitating support in the United Nations General Assembly for Resolution 181 of Nov. 29, 1947 – the plan to partition Palestine into separate states, one Arab and the other Jewish. Canada's role in this major event in modern Jewish history influenced the subsequent 50 years of Canadian-Israeli bilateral political relations.

In deference to prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King's stubborn insistence on always supporting British imperial policy, Canada delayed granting de facto recognition to Israel until late December 1948. Full, de jure recognition was conferred on May 11, 1949 (the same day that Israel was granted membership in the United Nations). One week later, Avraham Harman arrived in Montreal as Israel's first consul general in Canada.

In September 1953, Michael Comay was appointed Israel's first ambassador in Ottawa, and Canada opened its embassy in Tel Aviv. However, until 1958, Canadian interests in Israel were represented by a non-resident ambassador.

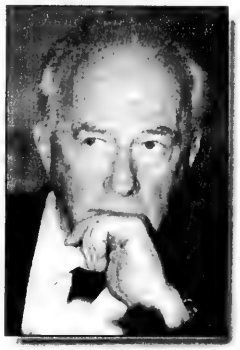
In May 1961, David Ben-Gurion became the first prime minister of Israel to make an official visit to Canada. In 1967, Zalman Shazar made the first state visit by an Israeli president. Prime minister Menachem Begin visited Canada in the fall of 1978, while in June 1989, president Chaim Herzog addressed Parliament. Prime minister Yitzhak Rabin made official visits to Canada in 1993 and 1994.

In recent years a growing number of Canadian federal politicians and officials – including members of Parliament, cabinet ministers and justices of the Supreme Court of Canada – have visited Israel. In addition, the premiers of Prince Edward Island, Ontario and Alberta and cabinet ministers from other provinces have led successful commercial and cultural missions to Israel. A number of Canadian municipalities are also twinning with Israeli cities.

Peacekeeping and Peacemaking:

Since the UN partition debate, Canadian-Israeli bilateral relations have always been closely interconnected with Canada's involvement in efforts to mediate the Arab-Israeli conflict. In 1956, Pearson, as secretary of state for External Affairs, helped organize the UN peacekeeping force interposed in the Sinai Desert between Egyptian and Israeli forces at the conclusion of the Suez War. For these efforts, Pearson was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize; he and Canada were recognized by Israelis as true "honest brokers."

A decade later as prime minister, Pearson was also praised by Israel for his (ultimately unsuccessful) efforts to reverse the drift toward Arab-Israeli war resulting from two interrelated events: Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's closing of the Strait of Tiran to Israeli shipping, and the disastrous decision of UN secretary general U Thant to comply with Nasser's demand that UN peacekeepers be withdrawn from the Sinai.



Yitzhak Rabin

In November 1967, Canada, then a non-permanent member of the UN Security Council, worked behind the scenes to achieve consensus for Security Council Resolution 242 recommending Israel's withdrawal from territories in exchange for formal peace treaties and permanent and secure borders. This resolution remains the only framework for Arab-Israeli peacemaking accepted by all major parties.

Following the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Canada participated in the resumed UN peacekeeping force in Sinai and in the United Nations Disengagement Observation Force on the Golan Heights separating Israeli and Syrian forces.

Canada endorsed the Camp David Accords and the Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty in the late 1970s, as well as the Declaration of Principles signed between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in September 1993. In support of the Israel-PLO agreement, Canada made an initial pledge of $55 million over five years for economic projects in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and has since augmented this contribution.

As a reflection of its long-standing reputation for fairness and sensitivity to the concerns of all sides, Canada (at the Moscow Peace Conference in January 1992) was asked to take responsibility for the potentially volatile multilateral working group on Middle East refugees, a role endorsed by Israel. Canadian experts also participate in meetings of the other multilateral working groups.

Admittedly, Israel and Canada have sometimes held different views on how best to resolve the refugee issue and other aspects of the peace process. But the overall strength and durability of the bilateral relationship is demonstrated by the efforts of the two countries to reconcile their different policy approaches in an atmosphere of friendship, mutual respect and understanding. Canada and Israel also share the goal of developing a coordinated international response to terrorism and state-sponsored terrorism emanating from the Middle East.

Economic Relations:

Trade between Canada and Israel grew significantly over the past five decades. In 1948, Canadian exports to Israel totalled $5 million, while Israel recorded no exports at all to Canada. In 1957, bilateral trade was valued at $6.6 million, mostly in Canadian exports to Israel.

In the early 1960s, rudimentary steps were taken to institutionalize bilateral economic relations through the establishment of the Canada-Israel Development Corporation (1961) and the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce (1962) and its Israeli-based counterpart (1964). By 1967, two-way trade jumped to $15.8 million, with Canadian exports to Israel totalling $6.6 million and Israel exporting $9.2 million in products to Canada.

The 1970s witnessed a significant growth in bilateral trade to just under $100 million. The increased importance of the trade relationship gave rise to the formation of the Canada-Israel Joint Committee for the Development of Trade and Economic Expansion (1976).

In 1987, two-way trade totalled

The Canada-Israel relationship

about $260 million; trade levels ranged between $250 million and $270 million in the late 1980s and early 1990s.

Bilateral economic relations were institutionalized in the early 1990s. In 1993, the multi-million dollar Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Fund (CIIRDF) was established, in order to stimulate contact between private interests in both countries, especially in the high-tech sector. Funding by both governments for the successful Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation was recently renewed.

In January 1996, negotiations were concluded on a Canada-Israel free trade zone agreement, the first for Canada outside of the Western Hemisphere. In its first year alone (1997), the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) helped stimulate an overall increase in two-way trade (calculated in direct shipments of goods) of 18 to 20 percent, with Israeli imports of Canadian products increasing by 55.8 percent (to $294 million) and Israeli exports to Canada growing by 18.1 percent (to $146 million).

Among Israeli imports from Canada, the most significant growth occurred in the areas of prepared foodstuffs; transportation equipment, including aircraft; electrical equipment, including telecommunications technology; mineral products; and precious stones and metals, especially finished diamonds.

Among Israeli exports to Canada, the most impressive growth in the first year of the FTA was in the following areas: rubber and plastic products; hides and leather products; animals and vegetable fats; and finished wood and wood products (which increased by a whopping 8855.7 percent). Experts contend that the benefits of the CIFTA will continue to grow as preferred access is extended to ever-greater areas of bilateral exchange.

New Areas of Initiative:

The spirit of cooperation and common interest that gave rise to the CIIRDF and the CIFTA has also extended to new, under-explored areas of the bilateral relationship. For example, the governments of Canada and Israel, as well as non-governmental agencies in both countries, are currently assessing the feasibility of joint efforts, memorandums of understanding and formal treaties, in such diverse areas as medical and scientific research and development, sports and cultural affairs, academic and judicial exchanges and other people-to-people contacts involving ever-widening circles of Canadians and Israelis.

These initiatives will reinforce and institutionalize the multitude of non-governmental contacts established by Canadian and Israeli individuals and groups over the years in such fields as art, dance, literature and music. Taken together, these new public and private initiatives will reinforce the strong bonds of friendship and understanding that have evolved between Canadians and Israelis over the past 50 years and propel the bilateral relationship to new and exciting plateaus in the years and decades to come.

Israel, U.S. disagree over scale of pullback

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM— U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright intends to officially present a U.S. plan for a 13.1 percent pullback to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat during their London meetings next month, senior government sources quoted Netanyahu as saying during an inner-cabinet meeting at his residence last weekend.

In meetings this week with U.S. envoy Dennis Ross and assistant secretary for Near Eastern affairs Martin Indyk, the prime minister was expected to launch a last-ditch effort to dissuade the United States from pursuing such a course.

Ross and Indyk arrived here Saturday night and met shortly afterwards with Netanyahu at the prime minister's residence. The meeting lasted more than three hours.

The U.S. officials were to meet with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat and again with Netanyahu.

Netanyahu said he would tell Ross and Indyk that unless the size of a third redeployment is set, Israel would not agree to a second redeployment, a senior official said.

Following the emotional impact of Netanyahu's visit last week to Auschwitz, he returned "very determined to insist on what he considers to be Israel's security needs," the official added.

A U.S. official said Ross was in the region "to lay the groundwork for the London talks, which are aimed at ending the current crisis over troop withdrawal from the West Bank."

Albright is to hold separate meetings with Arafat and Netanyahu in London on May 4.

Before meeting Ross, Netanyahu met with his inner cabinet: Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky and National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon.

In addition to Indyk, policy adviser Aaron Miller and U.S. Ambassador Edward Walker attended the meeting. Joining Netanyahu were advisers Yitzhak Molcho, Uzi Arad and cabinet secretary Dan Naveh.

In Washington, State Department spokesperson James Rubin described the peace process as "increasingly moribund" and said the obstacles to progress remained serious.

"We have no reason at this point to know that this meeting will yield anything but the kind of refusal to make hard decisions that we've seen in the past," Rubin told reporters.

Rubin appealed to Netanyahu and Arafat to approach the meetings with Albright with open minds and not miss the opportunity to put the peace process back on track "before it's too late."

A senior State Department official said a failure in London would not necessarily mean the end of the road, and that a judgment "will depend on where we think we are."

Before Ross' arrival, officials in Jerusalem said they expected he and Indyk would assess the limit of Netanyahu's willingness to compromise on a pullback plan.

Defining this as the "principle of reciprocity," a senior Israeli government aide expressed the hope that Ross and Indyk will obtain convincing evidence that the PA can and will prevent incitement to violence, confiscate unauthorized weapons, reduce the number of armed men and women in its police force to the agreed-upon level and expunge all the anti-Israel clauses from the Palestine National Council's covenant.

PA officials indicated Saturday that Israel has moved beyond its original proposal of an IDF handover of nine percent of the West Bank to full PA control and are within one to two percentage points of the U.S. plan.

Iranian missile threat cited

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A leading U.S. congressman says Iran is as little as a year away from completing and deploying a medium-range ballistic missile capable of striking Israel, and accused the Clinton administration of not doing enough to stop Teheran's program.

Rep. Curt Weldon, chair of the House Military Research and Development Subcommittee, told the Jerusalem Post that he also is trying to obtain briefings from the Clinton administration concerning reports that Iran already has received nuclear weapons from the former Soviet Union.

Weldon said the United States must move quickly to stop the Iranian missile and nonconventional weapons programs and help Israel develop a system to defend against ballistic missiles.

"The Iranians are 12 to 18 months away from completing and deploying a missile," said Weldon, echoing Israeli assessments of Iran's missile program. "This is absolutely unacceptable. Time is of the absolute essence. We need to close the window. We have a window of vulnerability that most affects Israel. We are going to have to have an anti-ballistic missile system."

Weldon, whose subcommittee is part of the House National Security Committee, said the White House is not cracking down on Russian aid to Iran's military programs. He pointed out that in January then-Russian prime minister Viktor Chernomyrdin issued a directive against the unauthorized transfer of military technology, but the parliament has failed to codify this into law.

"I went to Russia 14 times," said Weldon, chair of the congressional parliamentary group, an organization that reaches out to its Russian counterparts. "I know the Russians, and have contacts in every faction of the Duma [Russian parliament]. The Russians are trying but we must hold Russian entities accountable. It doesn't embarrass Yeltsin if we sanction Russian companies if they transfer technology."

Weldon said that Russia has violated the 1987 Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR) seven times in the last six years. The congressman has drafted the Iranian Missile Proliferations Sanctions Act, which overwhelmingly passed in the House, has 82 co-sponsors in the Senate, and would sanction any company that helps Iran's missile programs.

The bill is opposed by the Clinton administration, which says such legislation would undermine the government of President Boris Yeltsin and turn Russia against the United States.

Vice-President Al Gore said over the past few months, the Russian government has taken vigorous steps to combat illegal technology transfers to Iran.

Israel's strategic problems: Iran, Russia

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

It rates as one of Israel's most serious strategic problems – the transfer of sophisticated Russian military technology to Iran. Israel fears that Iran's acquisition of long-range missiles and nuclear reactors is a clear and present danger.

Last week, in a report to the Knesset, Israeli intelligence warned that Iran is on the cusp of test launching a prototype of a missile capable of reaching Israel. The Israeli government is also concerned by Moscow's recent decision to construct two more nuclear reactors in the Iranian city of Bushehr.

For Israel, these developments are a source of anxiety because Iran, which has been governed by an Islamic fundamentalist regime since 1979, is a disruptive force in the Middle East.

Mideast Analysis

Mohammad Khatami, a relative moderate who was elected Iran's president last year, has toned down the harsh level of anti-western rhetoric emanating from Tehran. Nevertheless, Iran still officially opposes the Oslo peace process, supports such groups as Hamas and Hezbollah and, most importantly, questions Israel's very existence. In light of these factors, Iran's desire to acquire ballistic missiles and nuclear reactors sets off alarm bells in Jerusalem.

For the record, Russia denies having helped Iran build missiles and claims that Iran's nuclear ambitions are peaceful in nature. The highest Russian officials, from President Boris Yeltsin to Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov, have issued these disclaimers in meetings with Israel's leadership over the past year.

Of late, Russia has gone one step futher to allay Israel's concerns. Under strong American pressure, Moscow issued a decree banning the export of weapons technology to Iran, expelled an Iranian diplomat caught trying to purchase missile know-how, suspended a contract between a Russian rocket engine manufacturer and Iran, and squelched an attempt to smuggle 22 tons of alloyed steel to Iran via Azerbijan.

Israel and the United States acknowledge these measures, but wonder whether they have been strictly enforced. Three weeks ago, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told U.S. special presidential envoy, Robert Galluci, that Russia has made insufficient progress in halting the flow of dual-use technology to Iran.

Allegations also persist that 9,000 Russian scientists and technicians are involved in Iran's military projects, and that Iranian specialists are still being trained by the Baltic State Technical University in St. Petersburg.

As for nuclear technology, Russian spokesmen claim that the reactors in Bushehr, four in total, will not be able to produce weapons-grade plutonium. In support of Russia's assertion, the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency announced that Iran, a party to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, will abide by a program of safeguards. (Israel has not signed the treaty on the grounds that several Middle Eastern states remain committed to its destruction).

Washington is embroiled in the issue by virtue of its containment policy toward Iran. Vice-President Al Gore discussed the question of technology transfers with the former Russian premier, Viktor Chernomyrdin. The House of Representatives has passed a bill threatening economic sanctions against countries, companies or research institutes which assist Iran. Senator Trent Lott, the majority leader, is scheduled to bring the issue to the Senate floor later this month.

President Bill Clinton threatens to veto legislation imposing sanctions on Russia, arguing that diplomatic efforts should be given a chance to work. In the meantime, the United States, with Israel's blessing, is urging Russia to forcefully implement its existing measures and take further concrete steps to ensure that Iran doesn't become a regional menace.

TEL AVIV. April 28–British troops fortified with armored vehicles, mortars and artillery were attacking Haganah and Irgun positions in Jewish-occupied suburbs of Jaffa in order to prevent the Jews from seizing the rest of the city.

The British attack followed on the heels of a warning delivered to Mayor Israel Rokach of Tel Aviv that if the Jewish forces continued their advance into Jaffa, British troops would defend the city. Even if the Jews succeed in capturing Jaffa, the warning said, the British will drive them out.

IDF, gov't at opposite ends of youth approval: survey

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Sixty-eight percent of youth are disappointed with the government and 66 percent with the Knesset, while 31 percent say they are disappointed with the state, according to a poll conducted on behalf of the Union of Local Authorities (ULAI).

The poll, conducted in February among 423 Jewish young people aged 13 to 18, had a margin of error of 4.8 percent. It showed the youngsters are proudest of the IDF, with 87 percent saying they were proud of the army, 11 percent disappointed and two percent indifferent.

Asked to rate various bodies in terms of whether they were proud of, disappointed with or indifferent to them, only 26 percent were proud of the government, 68 percent were disappointed and six percent were indifferent. Only 27 percent were proud of the Knesset, 66 percent were disappointed and seven percent were indifferent.

A total of 48 percent said they were proud of the education system, 40 percent were disappointed, and 12 percent were indifferent, while 58 percent were proud of the legal system, 28 percent were disappointed and 14 percent were indifferent. A total of 65 percent said they were proud of the state, 31 percent were disappointed and four percent were indifferent.

Asked to give the various bodies grades from one to 10, with one showing greatest disappointment and 10 the highest level of pride, the government got a 5.2, the Knesset a 5.9, the educational system a 6.8, the judicial system a 7.6, the state a 7.6 and the army an 8.7.

Shmuel Abuav, the head of the ULAI's education committee, said the poll shows that the army is seen as an apolitical body that has values and goals with which the youngsters identify. The judicial system is also seen as being independent and objective in their eyes.

The youngsters tend to dissociate themselves from the government and Knesset, he said, which are by their nature political bodies.

The youngsters are also turned off by the coalition dealings and deliberations in the government and the Knesset, which often feature displays of intolerance.

The Knesset also highlights disputes within the people, he said, adding it is unfortunate that it is the bodies elected by the people which are the ones that have the least amount of respect in the youngsters' eyes.

U.S. public backs Israel: poll

By MARILYN HENRY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

NEW YORK — Fifty-eight percent of Americans sympathize with Israel over the Palestinians in the Middle East conflict, the first time in 20 years of polling that support has reached that high, according to a nationwide New York Times poll published last Sunday.

However, only one-quarter of Americans think Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu or Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat has kept their side of the peace accords.

American Jews were more likely than others to support a Palestinian homeland, the poll showed.

Fifty-seven percent of 1,395 people polled said they had a generally favorable opinion of Israel, while only 11 percent had such an opinion of the PLO. Nearly half – 49 percent – view Israel as a "special place," while 18 percent said they once had viewed it as special, but no longer did, the Times reported.

There were significant differences in attitudes toward Israel and the PLO when it came to the peace process.

Americans, between 1989 and 1998, had steadily increased their view that Israel "had done enough to prove it is interested in peace." In 1989, 17 percent answered yes. That percentage rose to 37 percent in 1993 and to 43 percent in 1998.

In contrast, the sentiment toward the PLO's efforts was erratic. In 1989, 14 percent said the PLO "had done enough to prove it is interested in peace." That rose to 29 percent in 1993, but dropped back to 15 percent in the 1998 poll, the Times reported.

In the "personal approval" category, Netanyahu seemed to be largely an unknown. Eleven percent of Americans said they had a favorable opinion of him and another 11 percent said they had an unfavorable opinion, while 77 percent said they had no opinion.

Ten percent said they had a favorable opinion of Arafat, while 42 percent had an unfavorable one. The rest said they had no opinion.

In an unusual development, the 232 American Jews among those polled were likelier to favor a "Palestinian homeland in the territories." Some 45 percent of American Jews said they favored a homeland, while 42 percent were opposed. In general, 38 percent of all Americans supported a Palestinian homeland, while 28 percent were opposed and 34 percent said they had no opinion.

Swiss release Mossad agent

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An Israeli Mossad agent caught during a bungled spy operation in Switzerland has returned home.

The agent, identified only by his age, 44, returned to Israel last Saturday after Israeli authorities guaranteed that he would return to Switzerland to stand trial.

The agent was one of five Mossad operatives caught in February while attempting to bug an apartment near the Swiss capital of Bern. The apartment belonged to a businessman with suspected links to the Islamic fundamentalist group Hezbollah.

The other four agents were released by local police after being detained briefly.

Swiss officials issued a statement last weekend confirming that the agent had been allowed to return to Israel "after his questioning was concluded and it was agreed that his continued detention was not required."

It was not immediately clear when the agent would stand trial or whether the proceedings would be open or closed.

The agent may face charges that include violating Swiss sovereignty and conducting foreign intelligence activities in another country.

In a statement issued earlier this month, the Swiss prosecutor disclosed that the equipment for the bugging operation had been transferred to Switzerland in a diplomatic bag.

The operation, which came on the heels of a failed attempt last September by Mossad to assassinate a Hamas official in Jordan, contributed to former Mossad head Danny Yatom's recent decision to resign. He was replaced by Ephraim Halevy, a former diplomat and senior Mossad official.

Controversy over Deir Yassin endures after 50 years

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Fifty years after Israel became a state, the tragic story of an Arab village on the western outskirts of Jerusalem once again threatens the delicate relations between Jews and Arabs.

In the early hours of April 9, 1948, Jewish underground fighters from two dissident groups stormed Deir Yassin, killing at least 120 of its residents, including women and children, in what became one of the bloodiest battles leading up to Israel's independence.

"Remember Deir Yassin" endures to this day as a rallying call for Palestinians and their sympathizers.

What exactly happened that day has long been a source of controversy. History has recorded the event as a massacre in which the Irgun and Stern groups slaughtered Arab soldiers and civilians.

Some Israeli and Jewish leaders, pointing to a different version of the facts surrounding the fight for Deir Yassin, have denounced the allegation as a farce. They say the battle was crucial for Jewish survival, and they accuse Palestinians of sensationalizing the incident to try to win support for their plight.

The incident gained new attention this year as Palestinians commemorated its 50th anniversary this week with a series of vigils and conferences in the United States and Israel.

Deir Yassin has "become an emotional rallying cry" for Palestinians and their sympathizers, and "as you get further and further away in time, it takes on more relevance and greater meaning," said Kenneth Stein, a professor of Middle Eastern history and political science at Emory University in Atlanta,Ga.

While much surrounding the incident continues to be disputed, this much is known:

Deir Yassin was a village of some 500 Arabs, strategically located on a hill overlooking the main highway entering Jerusalem. The Irgun and Stern militia forces, led by such figures as Menachem Begin, captured the village with help from the Haganah, the pre-state army.

Much of the debate focuses on what occurred during and immediately after the Jewish attack.

The battle of Deir Yassin "has come to symbolize for Palestinians the beginning of their so-called catastrophe," said Daniel McGowan, director of the New York-based Deir Yassin Remembered, which organized the anniversary campaign.

The attack marked "the beginning of the depopulation of over 400 Arab villages, and the beginning of the exile of roughly 700,000 Palestinians," he said.

Jewish activists, meanwhile, have launched a counter-offensive, claiming that there was no massacre.

"The Arabs have used this to demonize Israel, to make it seem as if there's a moral equivalence between the terrorism of the Arabs and the terrorism of the Jews, and to help reduce support for Israel," said Morton Klein, president of the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA).

Death toll disputed

A new ZOA report, Deir Yassin: History of a Lie, says that civilians were killed unintentionally during fierce house-to-house fighting, when Arab soldiers turned the village into a fortress. It cites eyewitness accounts of Jewish fighters who denied a massacre, and it points to a little-known Palestinian study which found that the death toll only amounted to half of what was originally claimed.

Perhaps the least controversial aspect of the ongoing debate is the death toll. It was originally placed at 240, but subsequent research conducted by Bir Zeit University in the West Bank found that the fatalities did not exceed 120. The ZOA report cites the Palestinian study's finding on the number.

Israeli military historians disagree about whether the deaths occurred before or after the fighting.

Uri Milstein, who wrote a four-volume book on Israel's War of Independence, contends that most of the casualties occurred during the fighting.

He disputes the account of Meir Pa'il, another Israeli military historian who was at Deir Yassin and says that the killings took place after the fighting had ended and the Haganah had withdrawn, leaving the Irgun and Stern soldiers in the village.

Labor Zionist leaders initially confirmed there was a massacre in what some said was an attempt to discredit the rival Irgun and Stern groups. The Israeli government, however, gradually backed away from that position.

In 1969, then-foreign minister Abba Eban issued a pamphlet describing the massacre accusation as a "fairy tale" and "the 'big lie' of Deir Yassin.

"This was no massacre of an unarmed, peaceful village population by a military unit, as Arab propaganda pretends. The Irgun fought and won a battle; there was no aftermath of outrage or brutal excess," the pamphlet said.

New testimony has emerged to support that assertion.

In a forthcoming BBC television series, Israel and the Arabs: the 50-Year Conflict, an editor of the Palestine Broadcasting Service's Arabic news in 1948 claims he was instructed by Hussein Khalidi, the secretary of the Arab Higher Committee, to exaggerate abuses, claiming that children were murdered and pregnant women were raped.

Deir Yassin survivor Abu Mahmoud told the BBC that the villagers protested about being asked to exaggerate.

Why the assault was ordered is still questioned today.

"We and the Jews were the best of friends, like brothers we were," Radwan Abu-Mahmoud, a survivor, said in an interview this week. "There was no reason in the world why they should have attacked us."

Pa'il agreed. "There was an agreement between the village head of Deir Yassin and the village head of the nearby Jewish neighborhood of Givat Shaul not to shoot at each other," he said.

Milstein insists that what happened at Deir Yassin is what happens in wars – innocent people die. But, he said, "Deir Yassin was one of the most important events in the war in that it sped up the exodus of Arabs from other places, fearing that Deir Yassin might repeat itself."

On this 50th anniversary, thousands of Israelis hope your name will be right next to theirs.

Signing Anew: A Statement of Solidarity.

The State of Israel, the culmination of 2,000 years of Jewish longing for a homeland, is celebrating its first 50 years. In that time, it has become home to millions of our dispersed people from around the world, brought them an unprecedented measure of prosperity and security, and created the institutions of a modern democratic state.

As Israel enters its second half-century, hundreds of thousands of Israelis are signing anew their Declaration of Independence, through a campaign jointly sponsored by the New Israel Fund and Yediot Aharonot. They are reaffirming that, "The State of Israel will be open to Jewish immigration and the ingathering of the exiles. It will devote itself to developing the land for the good of all its inhabitants. It will be based on freedom, justice and peace as envisaged by the prophets of Israel. It will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex. It will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education, and culture..."

As Israelis are rededicating themselves to the State's founding principles, so do we Jews of the Diaspora reaffirm the historic ties and shared values that have bound us together.

Netanyahu speaks to The CJN

'I am upbeat about the economy'

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was in an upbeat mood when he was interviewed last week by The CJN correspondent and correspondents from New York and Australia.

A few hours before the interview, held in the Cabinet Room of the Prime Minister's Office, Netanyahu arrived back in Jerusalem after a breakfast meeting in Tel Aviv with visiting British Prime Minister Tony Blair prior to Blair's return to Britain.

The style of Blair's diplomacy was in sharp contrast to the abrasive visit of British foreign secretary Robin Cook a few weeks earlier. According to a senior Israeli government spokesperson, Blair's visit was held in "a very good atmosphere and confirmed the good relations between Israel and Great Britain."

Blair's two-day visit to Israel at the end of a whirlwind tour of the Middle East concluded with Netanyahu and Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat agreeing to meet him in London on May 4 for further peace talks.

Benjamin Netanyahu

"I think it was a good visit. It undoubtedly helped to move the peace process along," Netanyahu said. "It helps when you have a leader of a country who tries genuinely to find some middle ground and doesn't automatically adopt a negative attitude. In our private conversations, he tried to understand where we were coming from. This is the kind of attitude that might assist us in making the London meeting a success. I think that only good can come out of meeting with such individuals as the British prime minister."

Netanyahu was asked if the Palestinians were now really earnest in their desire to see a lasting and tangible peace with Israel.

"The Palestinians have to decide today between two concepts; one is that they will make a genuine peace with us and the other is that they will make a false peace with us and use it as a pretext for a future war. We are insisting on a peace based on security. We want to see demonstrative evidence that the Palestinians have opted for a genuine peace."

Netanyahu referred once again to the question of terrorism. "All Israel's intelligence services agree that the Palestinians do not fight terrorism systematically – they do not dismantle the terrorist infrastructure. They do take action at times against individual terrorists when they are forewarned, mostly by us. But that is like going after a needle in a haystack. When you fight terrorism you have to systematically sift through the haystack to find all the terrorists who are hiding there."

Asked to comment on Arafat's insistence that a representative of the European Union (EU) be included in future peace talks, Netanyahu said, "We haven't given any agreement to such a meeting. As far as the EU is concerned, we are always prepared to see how we can work together, but they too must understand that the central facilitation should be left to the United States. Mr. Blair offered his good offices and we thought we should try to benefit from his experience."

Netanyahu has no immediate plans to hold discussions directly with Arafat. Apart from the issue of a further IDF redeployment, Israeli and Palestinian representatives could meet over such matters as the establishment of the airport in Danya and the completion of the industrial park near the Karni crossing. These two issues, which are vital for the Palestinian economy, were close to resolution when the Palestinians withdrew from bilateral talks.

The prime minister responded very firmly to the recent statement by Arafat that by this time next year he would declare a Palestinian state.

"It would be a big mistake on his part, a big blow to the prospect of peace, because peace involves agreements. We have an agreement called the Oslo accord. A unilateral declaration of a Palestinian state would be a gross breach of those agreements. We have both consented to negotiations for a final settlement. Arafat would raise his ideas and we would raise ours. Eventually we would work out a negotiated solution. If this is violated and Arafat takes unilateral action, we would have to take unilateral action too. If he takes unilateral action with territory under his jurisdiction, we will have to take unilateral action over territories under our jurisdiction."

Referring to the threatened demonstration by right-wing factions in the coming weeks to insist that the government go ahead with its building plan at Har Choma, Netanyahu said, "There is no need for Israelis to demonstrate; we have made clear our resolve to build homes there. We are working there now. By the end of this government's term in office [in two years time], there will be houses built on Har Choma."

The prime minister was reminded of his interview with The CJN last October when he spoke in glowing terms about Israel's economy. It was pointed out that the economic indicators today, together with the worsening unemployment figures, would point to a serious downward turn and the possibility of a recession later in the year.

"I was very enthusiastic about the economy when we last spoke and I am still enthusiastic now," Netanyahu said. "I think we are still doing all the right things with the economy. We are going through a slowdown that comes from a history of huge deficits. Sixty percent of the GNP is the government's budget. I expect growth to resume.

"We have reached the lowest levels of inflation in Israel's history (first-quarter inflation this year totalled 0.1 percent). We have privatized more than at any other time. We have attracted in the last 12 months more foreign investment in Israel than ever before. We are heading in the direction of additional liberalization [of the currency] because this is what ultimately produces growth and investments.

"This will create employment and bring down unemployment. The economy is undergoing fundamental restructuring more rapidly than any other economy in the world. Unemployment is very painful and I intend to deal with this at the same time as accelerating growth in the economy. The government will invest heavily in infrastructure such as roads and railways.

"I am upbeat about the economy. The International Monetary Fund has tipped its hat to Israel and said it is the first time for many, many years that the Israeli government is doing the hard things, very hard things that are absolutely vital to return Israel to a very healthy, highly technological, free market economy."

Speaking about Israel in its jubilee year, Netanyahu said, "In the next decade, the majority of the Jewish people will live in the land of Israel. It is a realization of the prophetic dream. I'm not a religious person in the strict sense of the word, but I believe that there is an enormous inspiration of destiny and faith in the triumph of the Jewish people.

"I am full of hope and optimism at this juncture, because we have overcome the most horrendous obstacles to get here, we have overcome impossible challenges. I believe that the problems that face us, including the completion of a secure peace around us, the closing of the social gaps, are all within our reach. Just as we have overcome previous challenges, we will overcome these as well."

The continuation of The CJN's interview with the prime minister will appear next week.

Deir Yassin controversy endures

It cites eyewitness accounts of Jewish fighters who denied a massacre, and it points to a little-known Palestinian study which found that the death toll only amounted to half of what was originally claimed.

Perhaps the least controversial aspect of the ongoing debate is the death toll. It was originally placed at 240, but subsequent research conducted by Bir Zeit University in the West Bank found that the fatalities did not exceed 120. The ZOA report cites the Palestinian study's finding on the number.

Israeli military historians disagree about whether the deaths occurred before or after the fighting.

Uri Milstein, who wrote a four-volume book on Israel's War of Independence, contends that most of the casualties occurred during the fighting.

He disputes the account of Meir Pa'il, another Israeli military historian who was at Deir Yassin and says that the killings took place after the fighting had ended and the Haganah had withdrawn, leaving the Irgun and Stern soldiers in the village.

Massacre allegation

Labor Zionist leaders initially confirmed there was a massacre in what some said was an attempt to discredit the rival Irgun and Stern groups. The Israeli government, however, gradually backed away from that position.

In 1969, then-foreign minister Abba Eban issued a pamphlet describing the massacre accusation as a "fairy tale" and "the 'big lie' of Deir Yassin.

"This was no massacre of an unarmed, peaceful village population by a military unit, as Arab propaganda pretends. The Irgun fought and won a battle; there was no aftermath of outrage or brutal excess," the pamphlet said.

New testimony has emerged to support that assertion.

In a forthcoming BBC television series, Israel and the Arabs: the 50-Year Conflict, an editor of the Palestine Broadcasting Service's Arabic news in 1948 claims he was instructed by Hussein Khalidi, the secretary of the Arab Higher Committee, to exaggerate abuses, claiming that children were murdered and pregnant women were raped.

Deir Yassin survivor Abu Mahmoud told the BBC that the villagers protested about being asked to exaggerate.

Why the assault was ordered is still questioned today.

"We and the Jews were the best of friends, like brothers we were," Radwan Abu-Mahmoud, a survivor, said in an interview this week. "There was no reason in the world why they should have attacked us."

Pa'il agreed. "There was an agreement between the village head of Deir Yassin and the village head of the nearby Jewish neighborhood of Givat Shaul not to shoot at each other," he said.

Milstein insists that what happened at Deir Yassin is what happens in wars – innocent people die. But, he said, "Deir Yassin was one of the most important events in the war in that it sped up the exodus of Arabs from other places, fearing that Deir Yassin might repeat itself."

Feet love Walking On A Cloud

Interested in specialty footwear for adults? Try Walking On a Cloud.The owners, the Vella family, have been in the shoe business for 40 years; the staff are experienced people who know their footwear.

Walking On a Cloud carries major brands like Easy Spirit, SAS and Clarks of England, well-known trademarks like Birkenstock, and the popular Danish Ecco. There are fashion styles too, but only those which combine looks and comfort.

There are prescription shoes recommended by podiatrists and foot surgeons, and special fittings for every shape and size. Most models have supple, breatheable full-grain leather uppers, and light, shock absorbing polyurethane soles. And for every customer, Walking On a Cloud measures the length, width and arch of both feet.

Poor fittings, says manager David Vella, cause 70% of foot problems. By the same token, well-fitting shoes promote overall health: they're shock absorbers for your whole body.

Footwear, Vella insists, should be comfortable for walking, and durable. In a good fit, toes are loose, heels snug and not too high, and fasteners adjustable; linings are breatheable, and the footbed's comfortable. Also, shoes should fit on first wearing, without break-in time.

So try Walking On a Cloud; the Don Mills store is at 939 Lawrence Ave. East in the Don Mills Centre. Hours Mon.-Fri. 10-9, Sat. 9:30-6, Sun. 12-5; tel. 441-0013.

There are other locations in Etobicoke, Burlington, Newmarket and Oshawa.

Emmanuel Bitini anchors Orfus discount district with exquisite quality, exceptional value

A simple but compelling recipe for success has made Emmanuel Bitini a destination of choice for women wanting the most for their high fashion dollar.

The recipe goes something like this. Take the biggest showroom you can find (10,000 square feet) with ample free parking, in an ultraconvenient location near other outlet stores (Orfus Road), fill it with exquisite ladies' designer fashions — the kind you'd find in the most expensive boutiques — and sell them at prices so low you can't mention the labels for fear of upsetting competitors and suppliers. For good measure, give the customers expert personal service, and throw in a coffee bar for relaxation.

Judging by the steady stream of customers since their opening in June '97, Emmanuel Bitini has indeed hit on the formula for fashion success. The brainchild of owners André Abitbol and his wife Miryam Zini, the store is named after their first child Emmanuel and their own last names.

10,000 square feet of exquisite designer fashions to choose from

Like many so-called "overnight" successes, this story was actually years in the making. Offering a combination of quality and price that have allowed them to weather three major recessions, the Abitbols have parlayed their forty-plus years of fashion experience into that rarest of retail birds: a store that's always fun to shop and offers up new treasures on each visit.

"We like to stay not just up to date, but up to the minute," says Miryam. To that end, she brings in new stock on a weekly basis — no small undertaking when you consider the literally thousands of upscale garments that grace her showroom at any given time.

By piggybacking on the huge orders of Parisian fashion chains owned by their relatives, the Abitbols are able to offer the kind of discounts savvy fashion shoppers dream of. "Low price is only meaningful if you offer quality and selection," smiles Miryam, and in this respect Emmanuel Bitini delivers magnificently. Day and evening wear, dressy and casual, are all well-represented; if you're looking for a bargain on a business suit or that perfect dress for a special occasion,

"Low price is only meaningful if you also offer quality . . ."

you're almost guaranteed to find it here. More than one customer, says Miryam, has remarked that Emmanuel Bitini offers a better selection than "some entire malls." Emmanuel Bitini also distinguishes itself from "grab-bag" fashion discounters by offering coordinated groupings that allow you to mix and match, giving each garment multiple possibilities. Jackets, for example, are often grouped not only with matching slacks but also with long and short skirts, and a choice of both prints and solids — all in a full range of sizes.

As seen in TORONTO LIFE:

Emmanuel Bitini Fashion Outlet
In the Dufferin and Lawrence bargain block on Orfus Road, Emmanuel Bitini offers another surprisingly pleasant discount shopping experience. This fancy ladieswear discounter is at the forefront of a growing trend in off-price retail—it shares a 10,000-square-foot space with like-minded tenants for one-stop, low-price shopping.

The Abitbols are particularly proud of their staff, who offer a level of expertise second to none. "You won't get the "everything looks wonderful" routine here," says André. "Each garment that leaves here is an advertisement for our store, so we want to be sure you look good in it. We'd rather lose a sale than let a customer leave with an outfit that doesn't suit her."

This approach — and the appeal of the outfits they do let their customers leave with — have been rewarded by word of mouth and repeat clients, who come from as far away as Cleveland and Miami to wardrobe shop.

New arrivals weekly ensure an up-to-the-minute selection

A quick perusal of the merchandise reveals that Emmanuel B. does more than talk a good bargain. A few examples: 100% stretch cotton tops at $19.50 that retail elsewhere for $40.00; organza dress blouses at $45.00, versus $135.00 in other stores; exquisite crêpe pants from $95.00 (versus $150); evening suits at $495.00 (versus $695.00); designer coats at $495.00 (versus $700.00).

Emmanuel Bitini also features an extensive Junior department brimming with high-fashion offerings that range from exquisite Bat Mitzvah dresses to sexy stretch camisoles and crop tops that'll have your daughter(s) uttering those immortal teenage words: "This is so cool!"

Cool or comfortable, cute or career-oriented, the outfits you want and need are available in abundance at Emmanuel Bitini.

Orange juice stops arteries from clogging

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Drinking three glasses of fresh orange or other citrus juice a day can help reduce the risk of developing atherosclerosis, the clogging of arteries with fatty plaque that can lead to heart disease or stroke, according to a study conducted among students at a hesder yeshivah in Gush Etzion.

The department of human nutrition and metabolism at the Hadassah-University Hospital in Jerusalem's Ein Kerem carried out a three-month clinical study on freshly squeezed orange juice. The subjects were 36 healthy male students, 18 to 23, at the Har Etzion yeshivah in Alon Shvut, who go home on leave only once a month and eat solely in the yeshivah cafeteria.

The study, headed by Prof. Elliot Berry, was supported by a grant from the Israel Citrus Marketing Board, which provided a squeezing machine and the fruit, but Berry said his research was conducted without influence from the board.

The findings, among the first in the world to show a clear effect of vitamin C on the levels of LDL (low-density lipoprotein, or "bad cholesterol"), was published in the February edition of the American Journal of Clinical Nutrition.

The students were fed diets typical of the Mediterranean region, but half of them also drank three glasses of freshly squeezed orange juice a day and the other half did not. (The juice-drinking group continued their diet on their short home leaves.) This amount of juice is six times the recommended daily allotment of vitamin C. None of the participants suffered any negative side effects.

The juice-drinking group had three times more of the water-soluble vitamin in their bloodstream than the control group, whose diet contained only the recommended daily requirement of vitamin C. LDL particles in the juice-drinking group were significantly more stable than those in the control group. When LDL breaks down, it tends to clump on artery walls in a condition called atherosclerosis, which can lead to vessel narrowing, heart attacks, and stroke.

Berry said that despite many studies on the role of vitamin C, an antioxidant, in slowing the development of cancer and other diseases, its function as a stabilizer of LDL and protection against heart disease has not been as well established as the protective role of vitamin E, another antioxidant that neutralizes oxygen free radicals.

Since only fresh orange juice was tested, Berry could not say for certain whether frozen juice or reconstituted juice – or, for that matter, vitamin C pills – would have the same effect. Vitamin C is known to dissipate when exposed to oxygen in the air. But he said he was certain that other fresh citrus juices would have the same effect, as they are also rich in natural fiber, which may also play a role.

Insulin injecting implants explored at Technion

TORONTO — Diabetics could be freed from regularly monitoring their sugar levels and injecting insulin.

Researchers at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology are developing systems that will release in the body the correct dosage of medicine according to the patient's needs and only where necessary.

Such a system would prevent the drugs from affecting the body where and when they are not needed, thus reducing damage, especially in cases of drugs becoming toxic when given in large quantities.

Prof. Noah Lotan, of the Department of Bio-Medical Engineering at the Technion, is working with his team on the development of biological systems implanted in the body that can monitor the condition of the disease and provide medication accordingly.

"A controlled drug release system tailored to act according to the state of the disease will release patients from this manual, often tiresome task," says Lotan. "In the case of diabetes, for example, the system, implanted in the patient's body, will check the changing sugar levels and supply the necessary dose of insulin."

The systems Lotan and his team are working on are based on the idea that the disease is characterized by a chemical "signal," whose concentration rises in the blood when the disease intensifies. The drug is inserted into the body in a tiny container. The drug is chemically linked to a polymer that serves as its carrier, releasing the drug into the blood stream.

Once the drug overcomes the disease, the concentration of its signal decreases. An antibody that recognizes this signal attaches itself to the modified enzyme and causes it to stop the drug release. The communication between the system and the patient's blood takes place through a membrane that allows only the passage of the disease's signal and the related drug.

Film on Jewish Brigade opens sixth annual festival

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The Toronto Jewish Film Festival opens its sixth season May 7 with the Canadian premiere of the fascinating documentary In Our Own Hands: The Hidden Story of the Jewish Brigade in World War II.

This new U.S.-made film tells the little-known story of a band of 5,500 Jewish soldiers from Palestine who, as part of the British Army, fought against the Germans in one of the final battles of World War II. By smuggling Jewish refugees to Palestine between 1945 and 1948, the Jewish Brigade also played an essential role in the genesis of the Jewish state.

During the late 1930s and early 1940s, the British repeatedly denied permission for the Jews of Palestine to form a band of Jewish fighters even though thousands of volunteers were available and ready. The British had two main reasons for refusing. First, they were determined not to offend the Arabs, whom they saw as potential allies against the Germans. Second, they recognized that any military training and equipment they gave the Jews might later be turned against themselves, since the Jews were keen to force an end to British colonial rule and establish a Jewish state.

For years not even Chaim Weizmann, the London-based head of the World Zionist Congress, could persuade his friend Winston Churchill to convince the government to accept a Jewish Brigade. But in 1942, as the German General Rommel's troops advanced across North Africa and seemed to threaten the Middle East, the British quickly authorized the formation of three Palestinian battalions of mixed Jewish and Arab units, albeit with limited guard duties only. Then Rommel was stopped at El Alamein.

For the next two years the underground army of the Haganah grew in secret but the official Jewish Brigade languished in frustration while stories circulated of Germany's campaign to annihilate the Jewish people.

Only in September 1944, with the war in its final stages, did Churchill override the objections of the War Office and the Colonial Office to announce in the House of Commons the establishment of His Majesty's Jewish Brigade.

"It seems to me," Churchill said, "...that a special Jewish unit, a special unit of that race that has suffered indescribable torments from the Nazis, should be represented as a distinct formation amongst the forces gathered for their final overthrow."

Led by Brigadier E.J. Benjamin, a Canadian engineering officer, the members of the Jewish Brigade proved themselves as ferocious fighters against the Nazis in northern Italy.

"Out with you pigs! The Jews are here!" one shouted to their German opponents; they captured a whole squad of German PoWs. However, they were not present at any decisive battles and almost as soon as they got their boots muddied, the war was over.

For a while some members of the Jewish Brigade became a self-appointed vengeance squad, seeking out and executing SS officers in hiding. Soon realizing they had a more positive mission to fulfil, they abandoned the role of Angel of Death to become Angels of Life. All of Eastern and Central Europe was a Jewish cemetery. There were no Jewish communities left, no Jewish families, only individuals who had survived the Nazi onslaught. Often diseased and half-starved, they flocked towards these Jewish soldiers whose sleeves bore the insignia of a Jewish Star – not blue like the Jewish flag but yellow like the stars that Hitler had forced the Jews to wear.

Whereas the Allied powers sought to repatriate Europe's roughly five million refugees to their native countries, the Jews had no chance of a happy homecoming in Europe. Until 1946, when they were ordered out of Europe, the Jewish Brigade smuggled thousands of Jews to Palestine.

Afterwards, they continued the work clandestinely, often devising ingenious and daring gambits worthy of the best spy fiction, and frequently with the complicity of Gentile British and American military figures.

Directed by Chuck Olin, In Our Own Hands is well researched and well told, and makes a good counterweight to the festival's closing film, the Oscar-winning The Long Way Home, which also deals with the crisis facing the Jewish world between the end of WWII and the establishment of the Jewish state. In Our Own Hands is being screened at the Bloor St. Cinema on May 7 at 7:30 p.m. and again on May 8 at 3 p.m. For tickets phone 324-8600.

Play sends mixed signals

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The three sisters (and a daughter of one) turn thumbs down on their men in The Sisters Rosensweig by playwright Wendy Wasserstein at the Alumnae Theatre until May 9 (Wednesday to Saturday).

Still, Wasserstein treats the men rather kindly and depends on Neil Simon-type dialogue to carry a play that sends mixed signals about women who want their freedom and want to retain their Jewish heritage at the same time.

The mixed messages are reflected in the uncertainty and poor timing of the players in Act 1 (at least on opening night), who are coping with a script that changes direction too quickly.

But things improve in Act 2, both writing and acting, and audiences are advised to hang in.

The central character in this unlikely scenario is Sara Goode (Shelley Goldstein), a 54-year-old divorcee president of a Hong Kong bank who is ambivalent about her Jewish roots. Visiting her London, England, digs are two sisters, Pfeni Rosensweig (Ruth Barrett), a wan-

Jewish Film Festival reviews

Chilling documentary analyses Yitzhak Rabin's assassination

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs from May 7 to 14 at the Bloor Cinema. Sheldon Kirshner reviews four of the movies to be screened.

Michael Karpin's chilling documentary, The Road to Rabin Square (May 10 at 5:30 p.m.) analyses the events that led to Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

Karpin, a partisan observer, does not dispute the evidence that Yigal Amir – the Bar-Ilan University rabbinical student – was Rabin's lone assassin. However, he believes that Jewish fundamentalists, Likud party leaders and the settler movement all contributed to the incendiary political climate and campaign of incitement that climaxed with Rabin's cold-blooded murder in Tel Aviv in 1995.

Rabin had contempt for the extremists who sought to scuttle the Oslo peace process and bring down his government. But, as his widow Leah recounts, he could not conceive of a situation whereby a fellow Jew would wish to murder him.

Perhaps, as she suggests, he should have read the handwriting on the wall. As the Oslo accords were implemented, the level of rhetoric against Rabin escalated to the point where he was branded as a traitor, a Nazi, a son of a bitch, a homosexual and an alcoholic. Rabin was completely demonized by the forces that vehemently opposed his policies, making it easier for Amir to shoot him.

Singling out the individuals who implicitly guided Amir toward his date with destiny, Karpin mentions, among others, Elyakim Haetzni, the settler from Kiryat Arba who likened Rabin to Marshall Henri Petain; Shlomo Goren, the former chief rabbi who warned of bloodshed in case of an Israeli withdrawal from Hebron; Ariel Sharon, the ex-general who compared the Labor party government to the Judenrat; Shmuel Dvir, a West Bank yeshivah rabbi who allegedly called for Rabin's death; and Benjamin Netanyahu, the future prime minister, who remained conspicuously silent when Rabin was mercilessly flayed at emotive mass rallies.

In short, The Road to Rabin Square is a not only a disturbing and edgy account of a tragic assassination, but a meditation on a deeply fragmented nation.

K (May 9 at 9:15 p.m. and May 11 at 3 p.m.) contains the ingredients of a taut thriller: a sudden and deadly confrontation between a Holocaust survivor and a former SS officer, a mysterious murder, gunshots ringing out in midday, blackmail, mistaken identity, a German soldier's wartime diary recounting atrocities against Jews, Nazi archival footage.

Add to this brew a Jewish cop, a woman whose father was a Nazi and a team of intrepid Mossad agents.

Sounds intriguing, doesn't it?

In fact, K, set in France and Germany on the eve of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, is something of a clunker. Alexandre Arcady's film, featuring a virtually unknown cast, simply does not deliver the goods.

The central figures in this low-budget movie are Joseph Katz (Pinkas Braun), an elderly Parisian art dealer; Sam Bellamy (Patrick Bruel), a compassionate Sephardi detective who has known him for years; and Emma Gutler (the relatively well-known Swiss actress Marthe Keller), an attractive blonde whose search for her past turns up unsavory disclosures. One of them has to do with Iraq's acquisition of nuclear and chemical weapons of mass destruction, a lively subject these days.

Despite its topicality and its red-hot story line, viewers may feel let down by K. Moving at a glacial pace, it is short on suspense and long on boredom. A pity. K might have been a white knuckle special.

Minyan on the Mira: The Jewish People of Glace Bay (May 13 at 5:30 p.m.) is a profile of a dying Jewish community in Cape Breton, N.S.

This impressionistic documentary, directed by Michael MacDonald and Sonya Jampolsky, is set in 1997, during Passover, as good a time as any to reflect on a community whose heyday has passed.

Minyan on the Mira's theme is perfectly distilled by a 57-year-old woman, one of the youngest members of the community. "There is no future...at the moment," she laments. "We raised our kids to leave."

Depleted by departures and deaths, the declining status of Glace Bay's Jewish community mirrors the fate of countless small communities across Canada. Everyone who appears in the film, from a merchant to a plumber, agrees that the community, originally settled by East European Jews and now bereft of a rabbi or a cantor, is doomed to extinction unless a miracle occurs. "There's something sad happening," observes a sympathetic Roman Catholic priest who's obviously familiar with the situation.

Clearly, the community's chief problem is one of numbers. When a simple minyan can hardly be raised for prayer services at Congregation Sons of Israel, which was consecrated in 1902, the future is certainly gloomy.

Mendel (May 13 at 7:30 p.m.), Alexander Rosler's feature film which unfolds in the mid-1950s, turns on a young Jewish boy's coming of age and his acclimatization to a new home in Norway. Mendel, the boy (competently played by Thomas Jungling Sorensen), longs to return to Germany, which his parents have irretrievably rejected. He also displays a probing curiosity about their wartime experiences, which they wish to conceal from him.

As his mother and father struggle to adjust to an alien society where Christian missionaries seem uncommonly ubiquitous, Mendel copes with anti-German outbursts and anti-Semitic stereotypes voiced by neighborhood children. And as he gets closer to the truth about the Holocaust, he is troubled by the conviction that Jews went to their deaths like sheep.

As unobtrusive as its Scandinavian backdrops, Mendel is at once contemplative and exuberant.

Art Garfunkle has kept busy since split with Paul Simon

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — That voice.

"Yes, it's me," says Art Garfunkle on the phone from New York, almost crooning. "I'm that guy in the studio, years ago, singing 'Hello darkness my old friend.' I was the one putting all those hours into The Boxer, so that the harmonica would come in just right; getting the drums in Bridge Over Troubled Water to make the last verse sound like it was important."

Not a bad introduction, even if it's tongue-in-cheek. And although there are still hints of the clear, angelic pipes that made Simon and Garfunkle world-famous for their unique harmonies, the voice is now distinctly mellow, but self-assured. Solid, even.

Art Garfunkle, now 56, is not the kind of '60s pop star who finds himself in the "Where Are They Now?" file. Since he and Paul Simon parted ways 28 years ago, after a string of multi-million-sellers like Scarborough Fair, Feelin' Groovy and Mrs. Robinson, Garfunkle could have easily slipped into obscurity.

Instead, he's released a string of solo albums (with a few hits, like Angel Clare), appeared in several films, published a book of poetry, was the voice of a singing moose for an animated PBS series, performed an orchestral concert of Jimmy Webb songs, read the dictionary back to front and continued touring.

Garfunkle will appear in concert in Toronto May 3 at the Princess of Wales Theatre.

Art Garfunkle

The evening will benefit the Youth Wing of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, which houses the world's foremost collection of Judaica, not to mention the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Garfunkle is fresh from a trip to Israel, where his concert in Tel Aviv was attended by Leah Rabin. He'd been to the country twice before and has seen most of it, but this time, he made his first visit to the Dead Sea.

Performing on May 3

"I have psoriasis," he explains, "and I've been told that if you float in that salty, buoyant water, it's very good for the skin. I found it not so much therapeutic as beautiful."

What did prove therapeutic – almost spiritual – for Garfunkle was his much-touted walk across America. Starting from his New York City apartment in 1984, he would trek about 100 miles at a time, drive or fly home, and pick up again later at the exact same spot. After 40 excursions, he completed his walk in 1996, where the Columbia River empties into the Pacific Ocean.

"I'm the son of a travelling salesman," he explains. "I love to see great countryside. This was taking that love and really savoring it slowly. And also feeling the continuity of the country, from one end to the other. You really feel its totality."

When he finished his journey, "I felt like something deep in me was registering an accomplishment. One registers these things somewhere in one's bones. It's done. I did it. So it is doable."

Garfunkle's odyssey culminated two years ago at the massive Registry Hall of Ellis Island, where he staged a concert and recorded a new album about his trek, Across America.

"I was struck by the fact that it all started there," he says of Ellis Island, "that we all fanned out from there."

Including his own family. Garfunkle's Jewish grandparents arrived there around 1905 from the town of Jassi in northeast Romania.

"How they got to be called Garfunkle, I really don't know. I wish somebody would help. Put that in the article: 'Garfunkle wishes someone would help him.'"

His family tree has him stumped but interested. "What is the name Garfunkle doing with a Romanian family? Is it that at Ellis Island they smoothed out an otherwise eastern European sounding name? Garfunkle sounds kind of German to me."

Garfunkle says he grew up hearing plenty of Yiddish. But like other children of Lower East Side immigrants, he was born "uptown," in Forest Hills. He's as American as apple pie, but his awesome success has humbled him.

"I'm an American story, in that my lucky life with Paul Simon, and now without him, is so much about how America works and allows any middle-class toad who practises a lot and has talent and takes it seriously – without any bribery or connections – to knock on doors, and win in this system. The system is very open for sincere, earnest people who try hard.

"Paul and I got on that competitive track as New York kids who were calculating the market at age 15 [as the duo Tom and Jerry]. We just kept rehearsing, making demos, knocking on doors, going to the Brill Building, and having tenacity and never giving up."

During the '70s and '80s, "I was very full of myself. My career! My potential! My hidden talents! A lot of 'me, me, me.'"

In 1988, he married singer-actress Kim Cermak. The couple has a son, James, 7, the spitting image of his dad.

Today, Art Garfunkle is feelin' groovy again. "Loving another," he says with purpose. "That's where it's at."

Photographer captures people's faces

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Photographer Orah Buck will be one of the artists participating in the second annual Contact '98, a city-wide festival of photography to be held from May 1 to 30.

The festival is funded by commercial galleries, public institutions, artist-run centres and individual photographers.

It will feature 90 exhibitions of contemporary and vintage photographs by Canadian and international photographers. Also featured will be a week-long symposium on photography, a film series hosted by Cinamatheque and a series of hands-on workshops.

Buck will present two exhibitions of her photography – at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and at Holy Blossom Temple.

Many of Buck's works are on display at Baycrest and at the Tel Hashomer Hospital in Tel Aviv. An exhibition of 48 new black-and-white photographs taken of Baycrest clients over the past two years, titled Time and Faces, will be on display in the Silverman Heritage Museum at Baycrest from May 10 to 31.

The focus of Buck's exhibition is the extraordinary faces of people who have travelled through time. "As we grow older," says Buck, "the lines of our faces dramatize and pay homage to unique lives. This exhibition is a tribute to those lives."

From May 3 to 31, the Holy Blossom Temple will be the venue of Buck's exhibition titled, Brighton Beach Bound – the Russianization of the 15 blocks between Ocean Parkway and Brighton 15th, and the boardwalk in Brooklyn, N.Y.

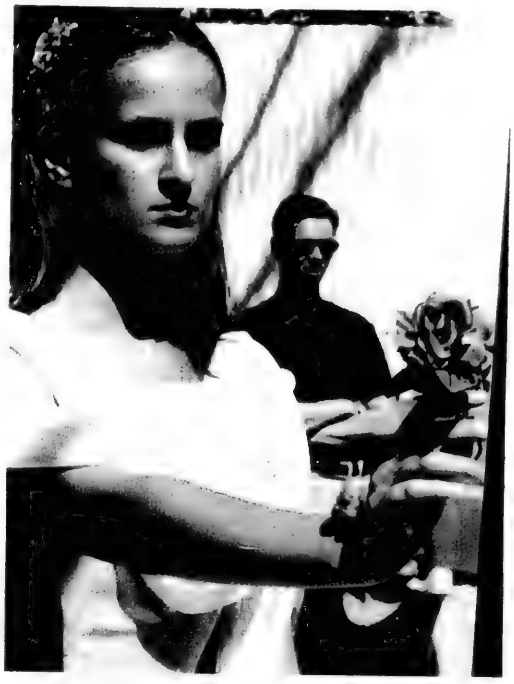
Buck explained that 60 years ago, Brighton Beach was "a very Jewish" neighborhood. Throughout the years, many Jews left the area for more prosperous neighborhoods. The area began to renew itself some 20 years ago with a wave of low-income Jewish Russian refugees. Ten years ago, under Gorbachev's glasnost, a wave of more affluent Russians arrived.

Once again, Brighton Beach, with more than a quarter of a million Russian Jews, has become a vibrant area of shops and services.

Buck's interest in Brighton Beach was piqued over 20 years ago when her daughter Ruth became engaged to a man from Brighton Beach.

The 31 black-and-white photographs at Holy Blossom Temple, reflect the street scenes and the Russian Festival Day.

A Contact '98 reception of the Buck exhibition which is open to the community, will be held on May 6 from 7 to 9:30 p.m. in the Philip Smith Foyer at Holy Blossom. The Russian Jewish community will be participating at the opening reception.



Rose Pose—Russian Festival Day

Actress delivers magnetic performance

dering travel writer, and Gorgeous Teitelbaum (Elaine Martyn), a fake medical radio host on marital affairs from Newon, Mass.

Pfeni's affair with theatre director Geoffrey Duncan (Warren Coughlin) ends when Duncan tells her, "I miss men," and Pfeni replies, "I do too."

Her sisters are shocked to hear Gorgeous say that her brilliant and supposedly prosperous attorney husband back home in Newton is out of a job, writing mystery novels at night and sleeping all day.

Sara herself is intrigued by the advances of Merv Kant (Alan Rosenthal), who has some of the best lines in the play. She spends a night with him, but decides to send him back to United States – alone.

Under Barbara Larose's direction, The Sisters Rosensweig provides some good laughs, but never quite recovers from a rudderless script. Her earlier play, The Heidi Chronicles, had no such defect and made its points clearly.

The Alumnae Theatre is at 70 Berkeley Street, 364-4170.

The magnetic performance of Yanna McIntosh as the black granddaughter in Athol Fugard's Valley Song should win her an award of some kind. Playing the part of a gangly teenager with ambition busting out all over, she imbues Valley Song with a lively spirit and a carefully shaded reading of the emotions in her young heart.

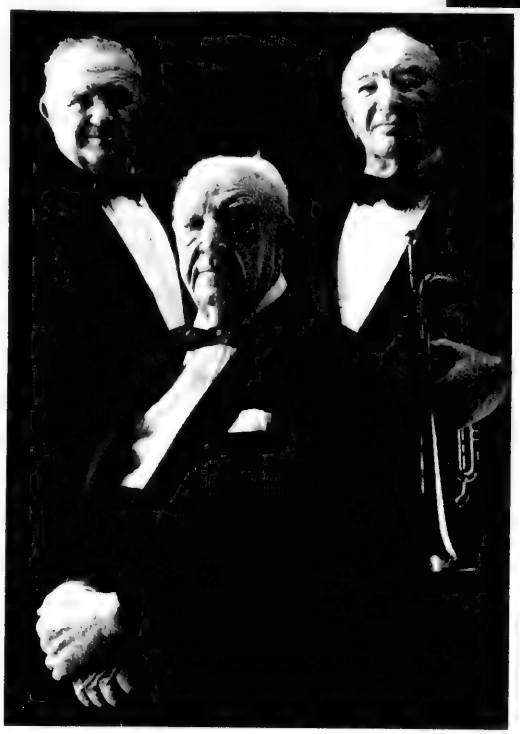
It's needed too, because for some reason, director Seana McKenna decided to do the play on a bare stage with no props or backdrops to even suggest the locale, a fertile valley in South Africa.

Valley Song, at the Ford Centre Studio Theatre until May 17, isn't helped by the difficulty in differentiating the twin roles essayed by Les Carlson as the 76-year-old "colored" tenant farmer Abraam Jonkers and the white playwright who comes to own the land that Jonkers farms.

Valley Song, surprisingly, is not primarily about political events in South Africa, as Fugard's other plays have been, but about an old man who has special reasons for not letting go of his granddaughter. Their relationship as developed by Fugard evolves lyrically.

New Globe Theatre's artistic director, Janese Kane, is a South African native, and obviously has an affection for Fugard's plays.

Valley Song plays Tuesday to Saturday. For information, call 482-0006.



The Epstein Brothers — A Tickle in the Heart

Epstein Brothers entertain Torontonians

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The irrepressible Epstein Brothers returned to Toronto last week, leaving a rapt audience longing for their kinetic, heart-felt, nostalgic klezmer music.

As they finished the last rousing number of their two-hour concert at the Winter Garden Theatre, the crowd rose spontaneously in tribute and clapped in unison.

"More, more, more," they chanted rhapsodically.

Seven months after their first performance in Toronto at the Ashkenaz festival, the Epsteins – the legendary klezmorim from New York City via Florida – had done it again.

They had left a sense of infectious, unfettered joy and exuberance in their wake, filling every pore with their intense musicality. And much like the Roman legions of yore, they had come and conquered, gathering up new devotees along the way.

The audience they performed for was largely geriatric, like the Epsteins themselves. But in a testimony to their cross-generational appeal, the Epsteins had also attracted younger fans, 35 years and under.

One of them, a girl with fine features and long brown hair of about 15, sat next to her father, cradling a counter-culture book entitled And God Created Punk.

The Epstein Brothers' band is made up of Willie Epstein on trumpet, his younger brother Julie on drums, Paul Pincus on saxophone, Ray Musiker on clarinet and Peter Sokolow on piano.

Fusing their collective talents, they played lively, Yiddish-inflected Russian, Hungarian, Romanian and Israeli standards.

"I'm sure you'll recognize all those songs, ladies and gentlemen" said the tuxedeo-clad Willie, who doubled as master of ceremonies.

He was essentially right. Even if you had forgotten, or never even knew their names, you instinctively recognized these throat-catching melodies, redolent of a vanished era in Eastern Europe destroyed during the Holocaust.

The effervescent Epsteins and their accomplished accompanists belted out an eclectic and pulsating medley of lullabies, doinas, gypsy airs and Yiddish theatre classics.

And in a piano solo, Sokolow, the youngest member of the band, produced a mesmerizing version of Romania, Romania, a favorite which transcends nationality and class.

Throughout the evening, I was frankly amazed by Willie Epstein's unflagging energy. At 79, he is no spring chicken. Yet Willie, a hoarse voice and an occasional flubbed line notwithstanding, was tireless and indefatigable, a real trooper from the old school of klezmer.

In short, it was a memorable concert, a night to remember. Once again, the Epsteins had lived up to expectations.

Israel captures medal in IIHF tournament...

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel's national team enjoys summertime sun between games at a hockey tournament in South Africa.

TORONTO — Israel has won its second-ever medal in international hockey competition, earning a bronze in a recent International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Pool D tournament in South Africa.

The undermanned and injury-riddled Israeli squad lost 4-2 to Bulgaria in the tournament's last game, with Bulgaria scoring an empty net goal with 20 seconds left to secure the victory. A win by Israel would have given them the gold medal while the loss dropped them into third place. Bulgaria with the gold and Australia with the silver rounded out the medal winners.

Other tournament participants included the host South Africans, Belgium, Greece, Turkey and New Zealand.

The Israeli nationals were bolstered by four Canadian "ringers" – young men who were born in Israel or whose parents have Israeli citizenship but who now live in the Great White North.

Defencemen Ron Berman and Ron Soreanu, both 17, goalie Sergei Ostrovski and forward Larry Bloch joined the Israelis for the tournament in Krugersdorf, just outside Johannesburg. Berman and Soreanu, both veterans of the Israeli junior team, were two of only four rearguards to see regular action in the tournament while Block saw limited ice time due to a shoulder injury he suffered early in the first game against Greece.

Unlike previous tournaments in which the Israelis started slowly, this time the boys in blue got off to a roaring start, thrashing Greece 16-2 in the opener. Israel was led by 20-year-old Sergei Zak, who played with St. Petersburg in Russia's elite league this season. Zak scored 13 points (six goals and seven assists) in the opening game en route to being named tournament MVP.

Soreanu, who plays single A midget hockey for Warren Park Eagles of the MTHL, said the score pretty much indicated the play. "We were all over them the entire game. All our passes were connecting, our shots, everything."

Game two was against South Africa and it too was a blow-out with Israel winning 8-1.The South Africans, coached by a couple of Canadians, challenged the Israelis with physical hockey and a dump and chase style while the Israelis, coached by former national team player Sergei Matin, played a Russian style of possession hockey. That style was effective against the weaker teams, less so against the better checking squads, Soreanu said.

Game three was against Belgium, which featured some pro players from European leagues. Israel prevailed with a 5-3 win in which Berman was named Israel's MVP.

With the round robin portion of the tournament over, Israel, with six points, played Australia in the first playoff game. They lost 6-3 but "the game was closer than the score," said Berman, who played AAA midget hockey for North York Rangers. "We were really tired and they shadowed Zak really closely."

"They played a Canadian style also and it dominated the Russian style," Soreanu said. "The neutral zone trap we tried didn't work."

With six points, only one game left and with with Australia (seven points) playing Belgium (four points), Israel expected the gold medal was out of reach. But Belgium surprised everybody by beating the favored Australians and leaving them stuck with seven points. A win against Bulgaria, which also had seven points, would give Israel eight and the gold.

Israel jumped into a 1-0 lead but Bulgaria roared back to make it 3-1 by the end of the first period. From then on, it was a seesaw battle, Soreanu and Berman said, "a very close game."

Then, midway through the final period, defenceman Ran Oz, who played a couple of years ago with the Midget Marlies in Toronto, scored to make it 3-2.

"I thought it was going to go to overtime," Soreanu said, pointing out that Israel poured on the shots but were held at bay by the Bulgarian goalie. With time running out, Bulgaria won a faceoff in the neutral zone just outside their blue line, got control of the puck and put the game away with an empty-netter.

"It was a close game," Soreanu said. "We just didn't get lucky."

"I think if we'd have been healthy and had more time to prepare, we could've won the last game," Berman said.

Berman, who scored five goals in the tournament, along with Eddie Reynagaza and Zak were named Israel's best players.

A victory against Bulgaria would have elevated Israel into Pool C next year, but instead they'll have to regroup and compete again in Pool D. Berman is confident that Israel has what it takes to advance. This was definitely Israel's best tournament. "Next year, they have a really good chance of winning the gold," he said.

...pulls off soccer upset

JERUSALEM — Israel's soccer team is on a roll — unfortunately it comes a bit too late.

Israel, who failed to qualify for this summer's World Cup in France, defeated Argentina, one of the strongest teams in the world, 2-1 here April 15 in front of 15,000 jubilant fans. This despite having a player sent off.

Coach Shlomo Sharf called the win "a historic achievement." Haim Ravivo scored the winner with seven minutes remaining.

Last month Israel beat 1994 World Cup quarter-finalists Romania 1-0 in Bucharest.

Focusing on amnesty

Israel's 50th anniversary is a time to take stock of the country's unequaled achievements while discussing the challenges which lie ahead.

In the legal system one could expect, therefore, a discussion of the court's historic role in the protection of citizens' rights in the absence of a written constitution; of the fundamental laws which have been legislated and those which still need to come; as well as of the fascinating evolution of law out of a hodge-podge of Ottoman, British and continental European traditions.

While acknowledging the very real threats to the rule of law, Israelis can take pride in the fact that a country of people who mostly immigrated from places with no liberal democratic tradition has a modern legal system which rivals almost anything in the world.

Instead, the discussion in this area has been dominated by the question of amnesty. Legislators and other interested parties have been pushing for a law which would grant general amnesty to certain classes of criminals, reasoning that the jubilee is a time for the state to demonstrate compassion and grant people a new start. It has even been suggested that opponents of the amnesty are racist, since many of the criminals come from certain socio-economic backgrounds.

In fact, there seems to be no good reason to grant a general amnesty, and several good reasons not to. First of all, some background: the president of Israel has the authority to grant amnesty to criminals upon the recommendation of the minister of justice. Usually this power is used routinely but sparingly to ease the punishments of criminals who have demonstrated contrition and good behavior. Indeed, giving people a second chance at life seems to be the main justification for presidential clemency.

It is also worth noting that such powers are granted to heads of state in most countries, as a vestige of royal prerogative.

On the other hand, there is nothing intrinsic in a country's 50th birthday which justifies throwing open the prison doors. One wonders why a criminal who ordinarily does not deserve amnesty should suddenly not have to serve the punishment meted out for a crime committed. A similar mass amnesty was granted following the 1967 war, and a marked rise in crime was subsequently reported.

Also, if the government wishes to give the citizens a "birthday present", why should it be precisely those who have harmed society, instead of law abiding residents of the country?

Furthermore, victims and their families can ask why the jubilee should become a day when people who hurt them go free. The damage this would do to the credibility of the legal system far outweighs the benefits of demonstrating compassion. Once the party is over, society will be left with the consequences, and in addition to the hurt caused the victims by the original crimes, they will also live with the knowledge that the system failed them.

One can also not ignore the fact that several of the public figures who have been pushing for amnesty are themselves under investigation or on trial, and this fact certainly calls into question the real motives which lie behind their advocacy on behalf of compassion. The proposed amnesty would not only apply to convicted criminals but also to many who are only being investigated or tried.

At the moment the amnesty law has been defeated, and it appears that the president and the Justice Ministry will be beefing up their staffs to be able to review as many cases as possible and free those who deserve amnesty. People who committed minor misdemeanors may also have their records cleaned up.

There is nothing wrong with a country celebrating a special birthday, and indeed one could say that with all the problems it faces, it would not be remiss for Israeli society to also take an opportunity to recognize the many good things about this country and its accomplishments. For this very reason, the focus on amnesty seems to be a shame. Even after Independence Day has passed, therefore, it would be good for the Israeli legal system to pat itself on the back and then begin tackling the challenges it faces now and in the coming half-century.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My husband and I have been arguing about our son Josh's upcoming bar mitzvah. His birthday is in the early fall and I would really like to take the family to Israel on a bar mitzvah tour. I think this would be far more significant and easier than organizing a whole hooplah here.

My husband and son, however, would like to stay here and do the DJ, caterer and hall thing. Josh wants to invite all his classmates and my husband would like to recoup some of the presents we have spent on all of our friends' simchahs. Personally I think the whole thing would be quite meaningless this way.

This seems to be our major topic lately and I almost feel like throwing in the towel, but I'm afraid I'll regret it for a long time to come. What's your opinion?

Bar Mitzvah Blues

Dear Bar Mitzvah Blues,

How about changing this from bar mitzvah blues to bar mitzvah bliss. This should be a very special time for all of you.

Bar mitzvah means "son of the commandment." Josh will now be old enough and responsible for fulfilling religious obligations. You should teach him and set an example for him to follow. Don't let Josh see that becoming bar mitzvah is about arguments, DJs and gifts. There is nothing wrong with having friends and fun at the bar mitzvah, but don't lose sight of what this is all about.

Stop fighting and start investigating. All of you should keep an open mind about your options. Go to a travel agent that specializes in bar mitzvah tours. Speak to other people who have gone on these trips. This is Israel's 50th year of independence. There must be some very special programs planned on some of these tours.

You might even consider a small party for Josh's friends as well as a trip.

Once you have compiled all your information on both options, sit down as a family and weigh the pros and cons.

This should be an extraordinary time in your lives. Enjoy it and don't take it for granted. Have a wonderful bar mitzvah whatever you decide. Mazel tov.

ISSUE 7 SPRING 1998

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

THE BEST MEDICINE

REPORT TO OUR COMMUNITY

CAMPAIGN UPDATE

A commitment to be the best

Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto is busy gearing up to officially launch an ambitious new fund raising campaign this spring. Named "The Best Medicine," the campaign intends to raise $100 million. To learn more about the campaign's goals, The Best Medicine Report To Our Community interviewed Mount Sinai Hospital President and Chief Executive Officer Ted Freedman.

What is Mount Sinai's position within the reorganized health care system as you launch The Best Medicine Campaign?

Freedman: Following the recent review of Metro Toronto's hospitals by the Health Services Restructuring Commission, Mount Sinai emerged as an independently governed, major academic research and patient care facility with Centres of Excellence confirmed and even expanded in some cases. Now that these difficult decisions have been made, we need to recommit ourselves to continue providing high quality care. This, we know, will require significant resources. We all want to have access to the best and brightest medical minds and the most up-to-date equipment and facilities. We can't rely on the government alone; we must once again turn to our community for much-needed support.

Given current challenges, what does the campaign need to accomplish?

Freedman: The goal for The Best Medicine Campaign is to raise $100 million before the year 2000 — $45 million in new capital and $55 million in new endowment funds to support research and clinical excellence. Core program funding will continue to be a Ministry of Health responsibility. Philanthropy can buy us better equipment, technology and facilities for staff, as well as research funding and investments in new and innovative programs.

We need to ensure that funding is available to attract the best staff, provide the best facilities, and offer our patients the best in compassionate, humane care.

MSH nurse Leanna Swartman checks on her patient.

It was previously reported that the campaign needed to raise a minimum of $75 million in new funding before the year 2000. Why has the goal now been increased?

Freedman: As plans for the campaign unfolded, it became increasingly apparent that the need for funding has never been greater, especially for renovations, equipment and technology. In order to ensure the hospital has the resources it needs to move forward with its priority services and disciplines, we had to increase our goal to $100 million. Fortunately our Board and campaign

Mount Sinai celebrates its diamond jubilee

Diamonds may have been Marilyn Monroe's best friend but for Mount Sinai Hospital, which is celebrating its diamond jubilee this year, its best friends are its patients and donors who support the hospital's efforts.

One of the highlights for the hospital's 75th anniversary celebrations is the publication of the book, From Generation To Generation: A History of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital. The book documents the hospital's rich history, from its humble beginnings in a small house on Yorkville Avenue to its present status as a world leader in research and the provision of compassionate care.

Mount Sinai Hospital's original location at 100 Yorkville Ave.

Published by McClelland and Stewart and written by Lesley Marrus Barsky, the book was made possible through the generosity of W. Bernard Herman and his family.

leadership, especially our campaign Chairman Lawrence Bloomberg, have enthusiastically agreed to assume responsibility for this remarkable goal.

How will the funds be used?

Freedman: Funds raised will support five critical areas of need including enhanced patient care facilities; year 2000 equipment; information age technology; frontier research; and program support for clinical leadership.

In the area of enhanced patient care facilities, the hospital has identified the need for $12 million in new funding for construction and renovation to support several new concepts in care delivery and teaching. For example, we have plans to create a new Surgical Skills Training Centre, a new Pain Management Centre and to renovate the Cardiac Care Centre. Funds are also required to support the transfer or consolidation of medical programs from other University Avenue hospitals to Mount Sinai. As well, several areas — emergency, dentistry and the outpatient laboratory facilities, to name a few — require significant modernization.

Why equipment?

Freedman: We recognize our staff need the best tools available to support their work. Here, the need for new funds is $25 million. If the hospital is going to continue to provide the best medicine, we must have the latest in medical and diagnostic equipment. New equipment will contribute to better outcomes in patient care, provide information that can be disseminated quickly and reduce waiting times for procedures. Often, it also allows savings in operating costs.

What is needed in the area of technology?

Freedman: The need for information age technology totals at least $8 million to successfully meet the health information revolution of the 21st century. A significant investment is required to upgrade and expand capacity, purchase workstations, and enhance our networking capabilities. The hospital also has plans to invest in new systems and technology that will allow caregivers online access to patient medical information and will allow diagnostic images to be digitized, stored, and electronically reviewed and transferred. These investments will directly improve patient care.

What are the campaign's goals for frontier research in the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute?

Freedman: The Research Institute is crucial to our leadership role and is key to our ability to attract scientific and medical excellence. Support for frontier research involves directing new funds towards specific chairs, research endowments, and direct operational costs. These resources help the Institute recruit scientists and provide them with the latest technology to pursue their groundbreaking research. For example, research endowment funds already play a major role in helping to underwrite a portion of the infrastructure costs incurred in recruiting postgraduate and fellowship students to the Institute. These funds can also give scientists the head start they need to apply for further financial support from prestigious international and national granting agencies. The need for support totals $36 million to guarantee progress in the research enterprise.

What is the need for program support for clinical leadership?

Freedman: Our clinical leaders set the tone of the hospital with respect to quality. We can attract great people by providing funding in the form of endowed chairs or funds for excellence. This support will be used to attract the brightest physicians, surgeons, and nurses to our priority programs and help them to further enhance our internationally-recognized programs by continuing to integrate the latest developments in scientific research.

What do you think the chances are of achieving the goals you have outlined?

Freedman: Well, we have been pleased by the response to our efforts so far. Clearly, having access to high quality care is an issue that resonates with individuals, families, foundations and companies alike. When it comes to health care, we all want the best. It is going to be a challenge but I am confident that the $100 million goal is achievable. We hope that in the months ahead, we can communicate effectively as to the tremendous opportunity that exists at Mount Sinai as being a provider of the best medicine. Each person's gift, large and small, will help us make this campaign, this institution and this community a success.

The goal for The Best Medicine Campaign is to raise $100 million before the year 2000 to support research and clinical excellence.

A MESSAGE FROM FOUNDATION PRESIDENT, NICHOLAS OFFORD

Nothing but the best will do

The publicly funded health care system in the province of Ontario is under serious pressure.

As the provincial government works to usher in a new era of system-wide efficiency among health care providers, some problems, like we have experienced in our Emergency Department over the last few months, will have to be addressed. Everyone owes so much to our dedicated team of nurses, doctors, and service staff who are pulling out all the stops to get us through this difficult transition period.

In the face of these enormous challenges, Mount Sinai Hospital remains committed to you, as a patient, as a family member, and as part of our community, for whom our sole mission is to provide the very best in patient care. To achieve this, we have decided to embark upon the largest ever private fund raising drive for a public health care institution in Canada.

Our goal is simple: to reinforce our commitment to being the best by funding the necessary resources in capital equipment, outstanding medical leadership, best practice, and knowledge-based innovation through research, that will improve the quality of life for you and your family.

Our incredible success to this point, speaks to the priority that the citizens of this city and this province place upon having the highest quality health care available to them. I hope, too, that you will respond to the call to support this great enterprise.

With your help, we will provide the best medicine to you and your family in the coming years.

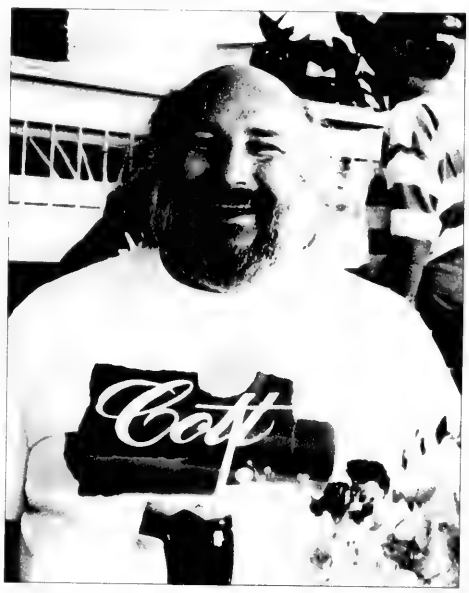
New endoscopy centre brings comfort to patients

Attractive, comfortable, private and state-of-the-art. These are words that describe Mount Sinai's newly renovated Gerald and Nancy Pencer Endoscopy Centre, located on the hospital's 6th floor. The centre, which opened to patients in March, was made possible through a major gift generously donated by Gerald and Nancy Pencer. Sadly, Gerald Pencer, the enthusiastic past Chairman, President and Chief Executive Officer of Cott Corp., died on February 3, 1998, following a courageous battle with brain cancer. The official opening ceremony to dedicate the Gerald and Nancy Pencer Endoscopy Centre will be held at a later date.



Gerald Pencer

"With the creation of this centre, the hospital will be able to greatly increase the quality of care we are able to provide to our endoscopy patients," comments Dr. Zane Cohen, Surgeon-in-Chief.

An endoscopy involves examining the body using an endoscope, a tubelike instrument with viewing lenses, a steering mechanism and a light source. Endoscopy enables a doctor to study and photograph an organ and perform a biopsy (removal of a small piece of tissue for microscopic analysis) for the purposes of diagnosis, treatment or research. Many medical procedures that formerly required a major surgical operation can now be performed much more simply by endoscopy. The procedure, which is often conducted on an outpatient basis, is a valuable aid in diagnosing disorders of the stomach, duodenum, pancreas, biliary tract, colon, ileum, lungs as well as other organs.

"Prior to the creation of the centre, our endoscopy patients received treatment in less than ideal surroundings since they often spent time waiting in hallways," says Nursing Unit Administrator Dr. Joan Donald. "Now with several specially designed procedure, waiting and recovery areas, patients will experience a better and more private level of care in the beautifully decorated centre," she says.

One of the features that makes the Gerald and Nancy Pencer Endoscopy Centre a state-of-the art facility is that it has been equipped with a special air handling system. The hepa filtration system, which cleans the air and creates optimal air flow patterns, enables the centre to have a designated area where it can safely manage potentially contagious patients in need of diagnostic procedures in endoscopy. An example of this is tuberculosis, which is an airborne infectious disease that can be transmitted when an infected person speaks, coughs or sneezes. As such, precautions must be taken to provide care in a clean air environment, protecting other patients and staff from exposure.

"A great deal of planning went into the centre's design to ensure that patients would be treated in the most private and the most comfortable environment possible," continues Dr. Cohen. "In particular, we have added new equipment to enhance patient monitoring and we've made improvements in managing the flow of patients." Mount Sinai Hospital treats approximately 3,000 endoscopy patients annually. One-tenth of these are lung or thoracic patients and the rest are patients who have or are at risk of developing gastrointestinal disease. In fact, gastrointestinal therapeutic endoscopy and inflammatory bowel disease have been slated as critical components of the hospital's priority programs and its Centres of Excellence. With the growing interest in bowel diseases at Mount Sinai, the Gerald and Nancy Pencer Endoscopy Centre will play a significant role in supporting several clinical research studies involving gastrointestinal diseases that are already under way as well as several exciting projects that are planned for the coming months.

"We are very grateful that as a result of Gerald and Nancy Pencer's phenomenal gift and vision, our endoscopy patients will receive the very best medicine, in the most comfortable setting possible," comments Nicholas Offord, Foundation President. "We are also excited that the centre's state-of-the-art facilities will help our research-clinicians as they continue to bring the best from the laboratory bench to the patient bedside, in keeping with our commitment to maintain an unparalleled continuum of patient care," he says.

"It is sad that Gerry Pencer did not survive to see his vision for this facility become such a marvellous reality."

community of Toronto and its full flowering into adulthood. It is a chronicle of sacrifice, of struggle for acceptance, of dogged pursuit of excellence. It is a story of individual men and women whose journey through life was steered by a selfless concern for the well-being of their neighbours. It is a story of inspiring vision and hard-won cooperation. It is a story that was, and continues to be, non-denominational in plot and structure, but thoroughly Jewish in spirit. Mount Sinai Hospital's 75-year ascent from the most humble beginnings in a small house on Yorkville Avenue to its present status as a leader in Canadian health care and a world-renowned medical and research institution is a story that is as rare as it is astonishing."

From Generation to Generation is available in the hospital's Gift Shop and also in book stores across the city. For more information on how to obtain a copy, see page 8.

Mount Sinai Hospital grows bigger and better under restructuring

Mount Sinai President and CEO Ted Freedman says he is delighted that the Health Services Restructuring Commission (HSRC) has approved the University Avenue Hospitals' plan to coordinate a number of clinical and non-clinical services.

"The Restructuring Commission has recognized the quality of care provided by our respective Centres of Excellence, especially in the areas of obstetrics and gynecology for which Mount Sinai has always been a leader," Freedman says.

Under the plan presented to the HSRC, Mount Sinai will assume leadership and be the major site for obstetric and gynecology services for Mount Sinai and The Toronto Hospital (TTH). This includes relocation of the specialty areas of Reproductive Biology, Neonatology and Prenatal Screening to Mount Sinai. Dr. Knox Ritchie, Joint Mount Sinai/TTH Chief of Obstetrics and Gynecology, will also assume management for a new 2,500 low-risk birthing unit at TTH-Western Division, linked primarily to primary and community care. All high-risk births and other low-risk obstetrics will be provided at Mount Sinai.

General gynecology will be located at Mount Sinai with clinics at TTH-Western Division, under Mount Sinai's supervision and management. Gynecologic oncology will be located at the Princess Margaret Hospital with major surgical procedures occuring at TTH-General site.

"This move will enable Mount Sinai to build upon and enhance its role as a leader in perinatal care," said Freedman. "With this expansion of our obstetric and gynecology services, we intend to create one of the most impressive and outstanding programs in North America."

Right now, Mount Sinai handles about 4,000 births a year. This augmented program will increase that number to approximately 5,500 births a year.

Other changes at Mount Sinai related to health services restructuring include construction of a new rheumatology centre on the 10th floor. This program is being transferred from The Wellesley Hospital. Four outstanding rheumatologists, under the direction of Dr. Ed Keystone, will move to Mount Sinai this spring.

Also, Mount Sinai will assume leadership for the University of Toronto's Division of General Psychiatry. In this capacity, Mount Sinai's Psychiatrist-in-Chief Dr. Joel Sadavoy was appointed Head, Division of General Psychiatry at the University of Toronto's Department of Psychiatry. He also became Head of General Psychiatry at The Clarke Institute of Psychiatry.

"These changes mean that Mount Sinai Hospital and the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute will play an expanded role in both Metropolitan Toronto and the Ontario-wide health care system," said Freedman. "Recognition of the leadership Mount Sinai provides through its Centres of Excellence and priority programs has once again been reaffirmed."

Mount Sinai will assume leadership and be the major site for obstetric and gynecology services for Mount Sinai and The Toronto Hospital.

THE WIND BENEATH OUR WINGS

Cancer patient inspires renovations for future patients and families

When Maria Petrungaro died at age 22 of Ewing's Sarcoma, a rare form of bone cancer, her smile, courage, and selflessness left an indelible impression on those who knew her.

Maria was first diagnosed with Ewing's Sarcoma at age 13. After major surgery in her right leg and a year of chemotherapy, Maria remained cancer-free for nine years. Sadly, the cancer returned and despite the best efforts of Mount Sinai's dedicated nurses, technicians and doctors, Maria passed away peacefully on July 9, 1997 surrounded by her loving family.

Inspired by Maria's wish to make the hospital a better place, her family founded the Maria Petrungaro Ewing's Sarcoma Fund at Mount Sinai and used the generous contributions from family and friends to give the patient lounge and pantry on the 11th floor a much-needed upgrade.

"In spite of the pain she experienced, Maria had a warm smile for everyone she met," recalls Tess Collantes, one of Maria's favourite nurses who befriended her during her illness. "When Maria walked around the 11th floor, hand-in-hand with her loving mother Joanne, she often wished there was a place within the hospital where they and others could go to relax. She really cared about people and she would have loved seeing that the hospital now has a wonderful place for patients and families to be together."

Maria Petrungaro

Through the generosity of their loving and supportive family and friends, the Petrungaro family was able to create something positive for future cancer patients and their families, which will make Maria smile in heaven forever.

The Petrungaro family would like to extend its gratitude to the following individuals and companies for helping to make the renovations possible through their generosity, compassion and understanding: TD Evergreen (Maria's employer); TD Securities; Bamford Produce Company; TVR Technologies Inc; Vegfresh; Home Depot (stockyards location); Future Shop; Pioneer Electronics; Inglis of Canada; Bad Boy Furniture; Business Depot; Sanyo Canada; Toys 'R' Us; Concord Kitchens; Vitullo Plumbing; Blockbuster Video; Jerrett Funeral Homes (St. Clair); and numerous individual donations.

"A special thank you to Mount Sinai staff Marion Johnson, Ellie Wasserman and Tom Kovendi for all their help and cooperation. We would like to express our eternal gratitude to all of the 11 South nurses, especially Tess, Christine, Carla, John, Pat; Sandra and Liz of 17 North, Dr. Burkes and the wonderful Dr. Martin Blackstein who cared for our beautiful daughter, sister and friend, Maria," says Ralph Petrungaro on behalf of Maria's family.

The pantry received new paint, kitchen cabinets, a microwave, refrigerator, toaster oven, and a new sink with running water. The renovations to the lounge included new paint and wallpaper, a new floor, stereo, television, VCR and state-of-the-art computer system with unlimited internet access and a children's play area. To honour the memory of Maria, patients and their visitors now have an inviting and comfortable place where they can relax.

Inspired by Maria's wish to make the hospital a better place, her family founded the Maria Petrungaro Ewings Sarcoma Fund at Mount Sinai.

Making a difference, one-to-one

In the true spirit of the holiday season, a friend of Mount Sinai found a way to help the hospital's most needy patients. For the past four Christmases, Mark Hanson, a successful Toronto area real estate developer, has contacted the hospital's Department of Social Work to ask staff to identify families, especially those with young children, who are in need. After learning about the challenging circumstances these families face, he provided a donation with which to purchase a range of gift certificates from grocery and department stores which were enclosed in holiday cards and signed by his family.

"Not only is their help unique, and extremely appreciated, it is a very personalized and respectful way of giving," comments Glenda McDonald, Director, Social Work. "The Hanson family is very considerate of the patients' privacy and by giving gift certificates, they don't presume to know what families would need or want. Often the gifts are used to pay for basic needs that these families otherwise wouldn't be able to meet. Sadly, the number of families in need has risen steadily over the past few years. When Mr. Hanson first approached us four years ago, we identified five families. This year his gift helped 10 families in need."

"We are deeply grateful to Mr. Hanson and his family for supporting our patients and for the tremendous and heart warming impact these gifts have truly made."

COMMUNITY SUPPORT

THE WIND BENEATH OUR WINGS

This year, the Hansons' generosity helped one woman and her daughter who was born prematurely at Mount Sinai. Her husband had died, leaving her with no family to whom she could turn for support. This year she became ill and required surgery. As a result, she was unable to work and had minimal income.

"The Hanson family's gift was an absolute godsend," recalls Frida Ardal, a Perinatal Social Worker. "It made a huge difference and meant so much to this particular family. It enabled her to buy the clothing she and her daughter desperately needed, but otherwise couldn't afford, and made it possible for her to have a Christmas dinner like she had never had before."

According to Hanson, being able to do something meaningful, one-on-one, for someone specific was what inspired his family to give this way.

"It is very gratifying to see these gifts at work," says Frida. "As social workers, we often feel quite helpless to do something to improve the difficult financial situations our patients face. Often, for a variety of reasons, they are not eligible for government

Palliative Care Centre officially dedicated at Mount Sinai

Mount Sinai Foundation Chairman Lloyd Fogler (left) presents a sculpture to Albert Latner in appreciation of his donation to the Temmy Latner Centre For Palliative Care.

The experience of watching a loved one pass away after a long illness is one that the staff of Mount Sinai's Division of Palliative Medicine has seen many times. For more than seven years, the Division of Palliative Medicine has helped families cope with the physical, psychological, social, spiritual, financial and legal concerns that accompany life-threatening illnesses.

Thanks to a major donation from Albert J. Latner, Chair of Dynacare Inc., the Division of Palliative Medicine has consolidated its offices into one location. The Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care was officially named in memory of Latner's late wife, Temmy. Mr. Latner has pledged $1.1 million to an endowment fund to support palliative care.

The centre, under the direction of Mount Sinai's Head of Palliative Care, Dr. Larry Librach, is located on the 10th Floor. Facilities include the Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg Memorial Library and the department's administrative offices, formerly located at 222 Elm Street.

The centre's services are available to inpatients at the hospital and to home care patients. Over 4,000 people have benefitted from these services since the program began seven years ago. The centre is now able to offer a Bereavement Support Program. Some of the services offered by this program include drop-in sessions, support groups, individual counselling and memorial services.

For more information about The Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care's Bereavement Program, contact Bonnie L. Barry at (416) 586-4800, ext. 6293.

Mount Sinai scientist first to win international award

Dr. Tony Pawson

In recognition of his ground breaking research into how cells communicate, Dr. Tony Pawson, head of the Program in Molecular Biology and Cancer at Mout Sinai's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, has been selected to receive the first AACR-Pezcoller International Award for Cancer Research.

The AACR-Pezcoller International Award for Cancer Research is a new award, given biennially to recognize a scientist who has made a major scientific discovery in the field of cancer research. Over the past decade, the Pezcoller Foundation has given a major award for outstanding contributions to cancer and cancer-related biomedical science. Now, this award is given in collaboration with the American Association for Cancer Research (AACR). The award is accompanied by a prize of $100,000(US).

In announcing the award, Dr. Margaret Foti, Executive Director of the AACR described Pawson's research as having the "broadest implications for understanding both the normal process of cell signalling and the breakdowns in signalling that underlie cancer. In addition, Dr. Pawson's research has suggested that blocking signalling pathways may be a promising new strategy for the design of novel cancer chemotherapeutic agents."

"Receiving this award is very exciting," says Dr. Pawson, "since it recognizes the general importance of our findings. When we first began this work 13 years ago, our ideas were considered quite heretical in the scientific community. We've come a long way since then."

Dr. Pawson was selected by an international committee of some of the world's top cancer researchers who are members of AACR. The Pezcoller

PLANNED GIVING

Use your will power to help Mount Sinai Hospital

By including Mount Sinai Hospital in your will, you'll be using your "will power" to help advance Mount Sinai's mission of health care and medical research for generations to come.

Making a bequest to Mount Sinai is a way you can make a difference — by providing for the hospital's future at no immediate cost to you. You can easily add a codicil to your present will to provide for a bequest to the hospital through the Foundation.

If you haven't yet made a will, this is the time to prepare one — for peace of mind for you and your family.

Did you know that, in the year of death, a bequest to charity will reduce the amount of taxes owed by the estate by up to 100 per cent of net income? Any contributions over this limit can be carried back to the previous year with a similar limit to reduce taxes paid in that year.

The simplest bequest wording

If the form of the bequest is not known, simply begin with: "I give to Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto _____...". Then state the purpose of the gift if there is one. Your lawyer can adapt the sample clauses provided below to specific situations. Gifts that are not designated to a specific purpose have the greatest value to the Hospital. When received, these funds may be directed to the area of most need at the time, thus providing the most flexibile gift possible.

Types of bequests

A bequest to Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto can be in any of the following forms:

1. Specific sum of money
"I give to Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto the sum of (amount)..."

2. Specific property(ies): Such as real estate, stocks, bonds, works of art, or other items. If the property cannot be used by Mount Sinai Hospital it will be sold and the proceeds, less any appraisals and selling costs, will be applied as per the terms of the bequest. "I give to Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto (description of property)..."

3. Residual bequest: The Foundation is given all or a percentage of what remains of the estate after paying debts, taxes, expenses, inheritances, and other bequests. "I give to Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto all (or stated percentage) of the residue of my estate..."

4. Contingent bequest: This gift takes place only if the donor is not survived by certain individuals, as described in the following sample: "If (name(s) of primary beneficiary(ies)) do(es) not survive me, or shall die within ninety (90) days from the date of my death, then I give to Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto (describe amount of cash, property, or percentage of residual estate)..."

Remember when leaving a gift to Mount Sinai Hospital in your will, our official name is Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto.

Making a bequest to Mount Sinai entitles you to become a member of our Friends for the Future Heritage Society and receive recognition in your lifetime. Let us know your intentions and we can send you information regarding Friends for the Future.

For additional information on these, or other forms of Planned Gifts, please contact the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation at 416-586-8203 (Fax: 416-586-8639).

Dr. Alan Bernstein receives national award

Dr. Alan Bernstein, Director of Mount Sinai's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, has received one of Canada's most prestigious scientific awards. The Eli Lilly Canada/National Cancer Institute of Canada presented Dr. Bernstein with The Robert L. Noble Prize.

Dr. Bernstein was honoured by the National Cancer Institute for "his outstanding and internationally recognized work in defining the molecular/genetic basis of cancer, in advancing techniques for gene therapy, and in making important advances in inherited developmental disorders and embryonic development. He continues to play a leading role in promoting scientific research in Canada."

Research team uncovers clue to learning and memory

The discovery of a protein's role in the process of memory and learning could lead to the development of new treatments for people with Alzheimer's disease and learning disorders, according to results of a study.

A team of researchers at Mount Sinai's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, the University of Toronto and The Hospital For Sick Children have studied the area of the brain involved in spatial memory.

"This is the part of the brain responsible for helping you find your way home after work," says Dr. John Roder, Department of Molecular and Medical Genetics at the University and the Research Institute.

The brain contains billions of nerve cells that produce and send small electrical signals responsible for all mental activity. Each neuron connects to another neuron at a specialized site called a synapse and it is at this location that information is transmitted from one neuron to another. Although it has been known for many years that learning and memory involves strengthening synaptic connections, how this is accomplished has been unclear.

The investigators have now determined that these connections are strengthened by activating a protein known as Src. Once activated, this protein initiates a cascade of events in the neuron that strengthens the synaptic connections and subsequently enhances the transmission of impulses between nerve cells in the brain.

Dr. Roder worked with Dr. Michael Salter from The Hospital For Sick Children, Dr. You Ming Lu, a second year PhD student at U of T and researcher at the Research Institute, and Jonathon Davidow, a summer medical student from McGill University working in Dr. Salter's lab. Funding for the study was provided by the Medical Research Council of Canada.

Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Centre officially opens

A ribbon-cutting ceremony officially marked the unveiling of new laboratories at Mount Sinai's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute. The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Centre for Molecular Medicine, a 20,000 square foot, state-of-the art facility located on the hospital's 10th floor will further enhance the Research Institute's internationally-recognized programs. The centre was named after Joseph and Wolf Lebovic whose $2-million gift will help finance the operational costs of the centre.

The Healthy Living Series expands into its second year

Mount Sinai's Healthy Living Series received an incredible response from the community in its first year. The Healthy Living Series is a series of free public education lectures designed to bring useful health information, featuring Mount Sinai experts, to consumers in the Greater Toronto Area. This year's expanded series was well-received by attendees.

Spring lecture series

Expanding on the successful partnership of last year's "Breast Cancer in the Ashkenazi Jewish Populations", Mount Sinai Hospital, the Jewish Women's Federation and the Bathurst Jewish Centre co-presented a three-part spring lecture series. The series featured lectures on Eldercare: A Growing Phenomenon, Osteoporosis Update, and still to come — Healthy Mind and Body.

The first lecture in this year's series, "Eldercare: A Growing Phenomenon", was held in conjunction with the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care at the Bathurst Jewish Centre. The presentations looked at many of the key issues facing adults who are caught between taking care of their children, themselves and their aging parents. Panelists featured were Dr. Judith Globerman, Department of Social Work at the University of Toronto; Maureen McGillivray, Department of Social Work at Mount Sinai Hospital; and Sorele Urman, Department of Social Work at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"Osteoporosis Update", the second lecture in the series had Mount Sinai experts Dr. Jerry Tenenbaum, Department of Medicine and Fran Berkoff, a dietitian/nutritionist, discuss the latest information on prevention and treatments for osteoporosis, a disease that affects approximately one in four women and one in eight men over the age of 50.

MOUNT SINAI HEALTHY LIVING SERIES

Still to come on June 2 is "Healthy Mind and Body" where guest speakers will provide some practical tips on what you need to do to keep your mind and body healthy throughout all stages of life. The evening's speakers include psychiatrist Dr. Jonathan Hunter, family physician Dr. Anne Biringer, physiotherapist Anne Cho, and dietitian/nutritionist Fran Berkoff. To reserve a seat, call (416) 538-8338.

Diabetes lecture

A new feature this year was a lecture called "Diabetes Discussion," held at Mount Sinai Hospital in partnership with the Canadian Diabetes Association. Panelists included endocrinologist and Director of Mount Sinai's Diabetes Clinical Research Unit Dr. Bernard Zinman, Clinical Nurse Specialist Helen Jones, and nutritionist Carol Seto. The evening provided information about diabetes and an update on the latest treatments and research.

Colon cancer lecture

Due to the success of "Colon Cancer: What You Need to Know" last year, a follow-up lecture on colon cancer is scheduled for this fall.

Annual breast cancer lecture

"Dialogue on Breast Cancer III" is assured to be a success again this year and in the years to come, due to Scotiabank's generous commitment. Taking place on Tuesday, October 20th during Breast Cancer Awareness Month, "Dialogue on Breast Cancer" will cover the latest information on the diagnosis, treatment and research of breast cancer.

If you would like advance notice of the Healthy Living Series lectures, please call (416) 586-5065 and leave your name and address.
